PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 99th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, April 14, 1986

The House met at 12 noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. MINETA].

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, DC, April 11, 1986.

I hereby designate the Honorable NORMAN Y. MINETA to act as Speaker pro tempore on Monday, April 14, 1986.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We pray, O gracious God, that You would give to us the vision to see the glory of justice and mercy, and also grant us the wisdom to find the right paths in order to gain these values. Give us also, we pray, the enthusiasm and vigor to search for the ways that make for peace. May we never be content to let selfishness or pride cloud our action, but may we seek Your righteousness and thus secure Your blessing. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1282) "An act to revise and extend provisions of the Public Health Service Act relating to primary care."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills, joint resolutions, and concurrent resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested.

S. 8. An act to grant a Federal charter to the Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc.;

S. 2054. An act to provide that the National Aeronautics and Space Administration may accept gifts and donations for a space shuttle which may be named Challenger II;

S.J. Res. 284. Joint resolution to designate the month of May 1986 as "Better Hearing and Speech Month";

S.J. Res. 300. Joint resolution to recognize and honor 350 years of service of the National Guard;

S.J. Res. 303. Joint resolution to designate April 1986, as "Fair Housing Month";

S.J. Res. 306. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning November 23, 1986, as "National Adoption Week".

S.J. Res. 307. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the week of April 18, 1986, through April 27, 1986, as "National Carpet and Floorcovering Week";

S.J. Res. 309. Joint resolution to designate the week of June 1, 1986, through June 7, 1986, as "National Intelligence Community Week";

S.J. Res. 315. Joint resolution designating May 1986 as "Older Americans Month";

S. Con. Res. 126. Concurrent resolution authorizing the rotunda of the United States Capitol to be used on May 6, 1986, for a ceremony commemorating the days of remembrance of victims of the Holocaust; and

S. Con. Res. 127. Concurrent resolution relating to predatory tied aid credits.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to clause 4 of rule I, the Speaker signed the following enrolled joint resolution on Friday, April 11, 1986:

S.J. Res. 261. Joint resolution to designate the week of April 14, 1986, through April 20, 1986, as "National Mathematics Awareness Week."

WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4515, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1986, AND PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF JOINT RESOLUTION RELATING TO CENTRAL AMERICA CONTAINING ONLY THE TEXT OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 283

Mr. BEILENSON, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. 99-529) on the resolution (H. Res. 415) waiving certain points of order against consideration of the bill (H.R. 4515) making urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes, and providing for the consideration of a joint resolution relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 only containing the text of Senate Joint Resolution 283, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF THE HONORABLE JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 416) on the death of the Honorable JOSEPH P. ADDABBO and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 416

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable Joseph P. Addabbo, a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of such Members of the House as the Speaker may designate, together with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That when the House adjourns today, it adjourn as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House have lost a very valuable and dedicated Member in the passing of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO]. He was one of the pillars of this House as the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, and he was a tireless proponent of a strong defense but not supporting a wasteful defense.

We have all recognized that the gentleman from New York has been fighting a personal battle over the last few months against illness, but he never gave up in that fight and he will certainly be missed.

One of the features, I think, of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] was that, although he occupied one of the most responsible assignments in the House of Representatives, he always proceeded at a low key, was humble certainly, and was highly responsive not only to his constituents but also to his colleagues in the House.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HORTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I join with the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] in sponsoring this resolution.

We truly have lost a friend in JOE ADDABBO. I have known him since I have been here in the Congress. I serve as the vice chairman of the New York bipartisan delegation and as the dean of the Republican delegation. We join in sympathy for his loved ones. My wife, Nancy, and I join with the other Members in expressing our deep sympathy and regrets to his wife, Grace, and to the members of his family.

We will truly miss JOE ADDABBO from the Halls of Congress.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GARCIA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to join with my colleagues, the gentlemen from New York [Mr. STRATTON and Mr. HORTON] and share their remarks.

I think probably the key to JOE ADDABBO was that in all the years that he spent here, he was always fair, and I would say to the public which is viewing these proceedings today that he was truly a nice guy. I think that is probably the hallmark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] a person who could be a nice guy and at the same time be a true American and do what was necessary for our country.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I would point out that we will, sometime next week, have a special order for our departed comrade. In the interim, let me advise Members that the Speaker will appoint a congressional delegation to attend the funeral services on tomorrow at 11 a.m. in New York City.

Members who desire to travel to that ceremony are advised to contact the Sergeant at Arms. The delegation will depart the House steps for Andrews Air Force Base at 7:30 a.m. The funeral mass will be in St. Patrick's Cathedral on Fifth Avenue at 11 a.m., and it is estimated that the delegation would return by 3:30 p.m.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING ON TOMORROW

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today, it adjourn to meet at 3:30 p.m. on tomorrow, Tuesday, April 15, 1986.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. MICHEL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I will not object, but might we have a little exchange here as to just what the program might be following the return of the Members from the funeral of our good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO]?

The way I gather it, and the gentleman can correct me if I am mistaken here, after we return we will have one-half hour of 1-minute speeches tomorrow, and then move immediately to consideration of the rule on the Contras and on the supplemental appropriation.

Then we would proceed with general debate on the Contra issue. There are 2 hours of general debate. There would not be a vote after general debate, but I would caution Members that after the 1-minutes, and then after a discussion on the rule, there could very well be a vote on the previous question and a vote on the rule prior to our going into general debate.

So that would suggest then that the session could last beyond 7 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. What the gentleman has said is correct. I would like to repeat what the minority leader said.

We go in at 3:30 on Tuesday. There would be 30 minutes of 1-minute speeches with 15 minutes on each side. There could be a possibility on the rule of two votes.

After the rule, we would take up 2 hours of general debate on the supplemental and Contra aid, and no votes, and it would probably be around 8 o'clock when we would finish our business.

Also, the suspensions, if there would be a vote called today, those votes would lay over until Wednesday, not Tuesday.

Mr. MICHEL. Then we will make a decision tomorrow as to what time we come in on Wednesday, because under a previous dialog with the majority whip, as I recall, we made a point that any votes demanded on suspensions would be the first order of business supposedly on tomorrow, but now that is being delayed 1 day. So we will make a determination then in conjunction with the majority leadership on time which we ought to begin then on Wednesday so that we can proceed with consideration of that supplemental.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

VOTE "NO" ON AID TO THE CONTRAS

(Mr. EDWARDS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, more proof surfaces daily that we should not be sponsoring the Contra invasion of Nicaragua.

Friday we learn that the Contras are being investigated in Florida for gunrunning and drug trafficking.

Sunday we learn that the White House by withholding economic aid is strong arming Costa Rica to support us.

Sunday we learn that the CIA has secretly funneled several million dollars to the Contras, in addition to the $27 million approved by Congress last year.

Finally there is overwhelming evidence that the White House pressured Honduras into describing the incursion incident as a major invasion.

Mr. Speaker, tomorrow and Wednesday we will vote on the President's request for another $100 in Contra aid.

All the evidence demands a "no" vote.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DELINQUENT ON TAXES

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, today is April 14, and the question being asked around the country is: Have you done your taxes?

I'm afraid the answer for the House is "no." Although taxpayers around the country will face severe questions from the IRS if they don't file their tax returns by tomorrow, this House does not face so much as a slap on the wrist, despite the fact that we have not obeyed our own law and completed action on the 1987 budget resolution.

We apparently hold ourselves above the law: We face no monetary penalties; no one is going to put a lien on our furnishings or padlock the doors of this House.

Actually, Mr. Speaker, if it were not for the fact that the Constitution makes us immune from prosecution for our actions on this floor—or lack of action—there is no doubt in my mind that the Federal marshals would be in here at midnight tomorrow, asking us to present either a budget resolution or ourselves.

I find it more than ironic that we insist upon penalty of jail that the taxpayers meet their obligation, but that we not only refuse to meet ours, and in doing so, refuse even to tell them what we are going to do with their money. We should be ashamed.

But believe me, the taxpayers know of our delinquency, and they will hold us accountable. Not tomorrow, perhaps, and not next month, but certainly next November, because that is the time when the tables are turned.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, DC,
April 11, 1986.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the permission granted in Clause 5, Rule III of the Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives, I have the honor to transmit sealed envelopes received from the White House at 3:05 p.m. on Friday, April 11, 1986, as follows:

(1) Said to contain a message from the President wherein he transmits the Report of the Department of Health and Human Services regarding the administration of the Radiation Control for Health and Safety Act during Calendar Year 1985; and

(2) Said to contain a message from the President wherein he transmits the Annual Report on International Activities of U.S. Government Agencies in the Fields of Science and Technology for Fiscal Year 1985.

With kind regards, I am,
Sincerely,

BENJAMIN J. GUTHRIE,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

REPORT ON ADMINISTRATION OF RADIATION CONTROL FOR HEALTH AND SAFETY ACT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Energy and Commerce:

ANNUAL REPORT ON INTERNATIONAL ACTIVITIES OF U.S. GOVERNMENT AGENCIES IN THE FIELDS OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Science and Technology:

NATIONAL FOOD BANK WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 234), designating the week of May 18, 1985, through May 24, 1985, as "National Food Bank Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but in the first instance, I would like to commend and congratulate the gentleman from California [Mr. MINETA] in his role as the Speaker pro tempore. It is a great honor to serve in the Chair, and especially to be named as the Speaker pro tempore, I think it is a great honor. I congratulate the gentleman from California in his role as Speaker pro tempore today.

Mr. Speaker, I do not object to this legislation. As a matter of fact, I concur in it, and the minority has no objections to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 234

Whereas substantial evidence indicates that poverty in the United States has risen in recent years, with the Census Bureau reporting that 35,500,000 people currently live below the poverty line, the greatest such number in over 15 years;

Whereas the correlation between poverty and hunger has been demonstrated in national, State, and local studies;

Whereas an estimated 20,000,000 people in the United States periodically go hungry;

Whereas non-profit food banks all over the United States are witnessing an increasing demand for food from families, children, the elderly, unemployed workers, and the homeless;

Whereas despite such increasing demand, food banks are meeting the challenge of collecting surplus food which would otherwise be wasted and distributing it to food kitchens, day care centers, homes for the elderly, halfway houses, church-operated meal programs and needy families;

Whereas Second Harvest has become the nationally recognized leader and pioneer of food banking, has forged a successful working relationship with the Nation's food and transportation industries, and has obtained voluntary private sector response to the needs of the Nation's hungry;

Whereas Second Harvest succeeded in working with 235 national companies to distribute 76,000,000 pounds of food products through its member food banks during 1984;

Whereas from May 18, 1985, through May 23, 1985, Second Harvest is holding its national conference in the District of Columbia, to bring together its member food banks and their member food banks, and to focus attention on the growing food needs of people in the United States; and

Whereas Second Harvest, its members, and other food banks all over the United States deserve commendation for their work with private sector and non-profit organizations to help feed the Nation's hungry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of May 18, 1985, through May 24, 1985, is designated as "National Food Bank Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GARCIA

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARCIA: Page 2, line 3, strike "1985" each place it appears and insert "1986".

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, what we are essentially doing is just updating this resolution. The resolution as it was prepared and submitted to the Clerk and to the House used the dates of 1985, and what we have done is just eliminated 1985 and inserted 1986.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed.

AMENDMENTS TO THE PREAMBLE OFFERED BY MR. GARCIA

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer amendments to the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments to the preamble offered by Mr. GARCIA: In the seventh paragraph of the preamble—

(1) strike "235" and insert "over 250",

(2) strike "76,000,000" and insert "over 100,000,000" and

(3) strike "1984" and insert "1985".

In the eighth paragraph of the preamble—

(1) strike "1985" each place it appears and insert "1986",

(2) strike "May 23" and insert "May 22",

(3) strike "in the District of Columbia,", and

(4) strike "and their member food banks, and" and insert ", affiliated food banks, and food industry representatives".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendments to the preamble offered by Mr. GARCIA.

The amendments to the preamble were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TITLE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GARCIA

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title amendment offered by Mr. GARCIA: Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution designating the week of May 18, 1986, through May 24, 1986, as 'National Food Bank Week'."

The title amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OLDER AMERICANS MONTH

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 315) designating May 1986 as "Older Americans Month," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object. As a matter of fact, I am one of the cosponsors of this Senate Joint Resolution 315 designating May 1986 as Older Americans Month.

The minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered, and we urge its approval.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 315

Whereas older Americans have contributed many years of service to their families, their communities, and the Nation;

Whereas the population of the United States is comprised of a large percentage of older Americans representing a wealth of knowledge and experience;

Whereas older Americans should be acknowledged for the contributions they continue to make to their communities and the Nation; and

Whereas many States and communities acknowledge older Americans during the month of May: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in recognition of the traditional designation of the month of May as "Older Americans Month" and the repeated expression by the Congress of its appreciation and respect for the achievements of older Americans and its desire that these Americans continue to play an active role in the life of the Nation, the President is directed to issue a proclamation designating the month of May 1986 as "Older Americans Month" and calling on the people of the United States to observe this month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL GARDEN WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 136), to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating the calendar week beginning with Sunday, April 13, 1986, as "National Garden Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object, but I will just take this occasion to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 136

Whereas the gardeners of this country produce an abundance of food for our people and enable us to export food to other countries which are in desperate need; and

Whereas the gardeners help to preserve and foster our traditional spirit of independence and individual initiative; and

Whereas gardening instills in our people, both young and old, a greater appreciation for nature, in general, and for our beautiful land, in particular; and

Whereas such appreciation naturally leads to a greater respect and care for our environment; and

Whereas gardening, in addition to being most beneficial for our country, furnishes a pleasant, healthful, and productive full- or part-time activity for a large number of our citizens; and

Whereas our gardens also yield flowers of great variety and breathtaking beauty; and

Whereas these flowers bring beauty into our lives and satisfy our aesthetic needs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation—

(1) designating the calendar week beginning with Sunday, April 13, 1986, as "National Garden Week"; and

(2) urging Federal, State, and local government agencies, as well as citizens and private organizations, to observe that week with educational efforts, ceremonies, and other appropriate activities which shall include the wearing of garden flowers as a symbol of our appreciation for the efforts and contributions of our gardeners.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EDUCATION DAY U.S.A.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 582), to designate April 20, 1986, as "Education Day U.S.A.," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object, but I take this occasion to inform the House the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered. As a matter of fact, I urge its approval because I am one of the cosponsors of this resolution (H.J. Res. 582) to designate April 20 as Education Day U.S.A.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words about House

Joint Resolution 582, requesting the President to designate April 20, 1986, as "Education Day, U.S.A."

Along with the distinguished majority leader, JIM WRIGHT, I am sponsoring this resolution. We joined forces last year and I'm happy to be part of this worthy venture today.

As I said last year, I think it is fitting that the majority and the minority leaders, should cosponsor such a resolution. It deals with a subject that transcends partisan consideration.

We are seeing a rebirth of the old American idea of progress through education for all Americans. That's still a great idea.

April 20 also happens to be the 84th birthday of a remarkable religious leader, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

He is the internationally renowned and respected leader of the Lubavitch movement which actively promotes education programs at more than 80 centers in 34 States.

The Lubavitch movement, founded in the 18th century, has as its philosophical foundation three basic elements—wisdom, understanding, and knowledge.

It is therefore appropriate that the movement, under the inspired leadership of the man called the rebbe, has been so active in promoting education.

Looking over my remarks from last year, I came upon a fact I want to share with you today.

The movement which the rebbe heads takes its name from a Russian city, Lubavitch, which, translated into English means, City of Love.

In the final analysis it is love of one's religious heritage, love of learning—that is at the heart of the Lubavitch movement and at the heart of our resolution.

I'm pleased once again to honor a great man and to support such a fine idea.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 582

Whereas Congress recognizes the historical tradition of ethical values and principles which are the basis of civilized society and upon which our great Nation was founded;

Whereas these ethical values and principles have been the bedrock of society from the dawn of civilization, when they were known as the Seven Noahide Laws;

Whereas without these ethical values and principles the edifice of civilization stands in serious peril of returning to chaos;

Whereas society is profoundly concerned with the recent weakening of these principles that has resulted in crises that beleaguer and threaten the fabric of civilized society;

Whereas the justified preoccupation with these crises must not let the citizens of this Nation lose sight of their responsibility to transmit these historical ethical values from our distinguished past to the generations of the future;

Whereas the Lubavitch movement has fostered and promoted these ethical values and principles throughout the World; and

Whereas Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, leader of the Lubavitch movement, is universally respected and revered and his eighty-fourth birthday falls on April 20, 1986: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That April 20, 1986, the birthday of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, leader and head of the worldwide Lubavitch movement, is designated as "Education Day, U.S.A.". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolutions, just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken on Wednesday, April 16, 1986.

COLLECTION OF STATISTICS ON CERTAIN INDUSTRIES

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 2721) to amend title 13, United States Code, to require the collection of statistics on domestic apparel and textile industries.

H.R. 2721

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 3 of title 13, United States Code, is amended by redesignating subchapters III and IV as subchapters IV and V, respectively, and by inserting after subchapter II the following:

"SUBCHAPTER III—APPAREL AND TEXTILES

"§ 81. Statistics on apparel and textile industries

"The Secretary shall collect and publish quartely statistics relating to domestic apparel and textile industries.".

(b) The analysis for chapter 3 of title 13, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out the item relating to subchapter III and inserting in lieu thereof:

"SUBCHAPTER IV—QUARTERLY FINANCIAL STATISTICS";

(2) by striking out the item relating to subchapter IV and inserting in lieu thereof:

"SUBCHAPTER V—MISCELLANEOUS"; and

(3) by inserting after the item relating to section 63 the following:

"SUBCHAPTER III—APPAREL AND TEXTILES

"81. Statistics on apparel and textile industries.".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2721 amends title 13 of the United States Code to require the collection of quarterly statistics on domestic apparel and textile industries.

The intention of the bill is to require apparel and textile manufacturing firms to report to quarterly production surveys given by the Census Bureau.

Under current law, participation in surveys are mandatory only for annual production surveys. Although Census Bureau carries out quarterly surveys, there have been response problems because these surveys are on a voluntary basis. Consequently, apparel and textile industries have experienced lack of quality up-to-date data to get an accurate picture of the domestic market conditions.

High quality data are critical in establishing an accurate description of the effect of imports on domestic apparel and textile industries.

During the past two decades the apparel and textile industies have faced increased competition in the U.S. marketplace from low-wage developing countries. To avoid market disruption, these industries rely on our Government's interagency group, Committee for the Implementation of Textile Agreements, to consult with exporting countries regarding import limitations. Requests for consultation must be accompanied by factual statements of domestic market disruption.

Because of the time involved in processing the annual surveys, often annual data are not the most current picture of the market.

Passage of H.R. 2721 will provide the information that can lead to proper administration of the import restraint programs which can lead to economically healthy and stable apparel and textile industries.

The Congressional Budget Office has found that enactment of H.R.

2721 would result in no significant costs to the Federal Government and in no costs to State or local governments.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 2721, which requires a quarterly report of statistics on the domestic apparel and textile industries. This bill would provide much needed information for a very volatile industry and hopefully lead to better administration of the import restraint programs. At a time when the domestic apparel and textile industry is searching for economic stability, this bill seems to be very timely, and I commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARICA] for his efforts.

While the administration has some reservations regarding the language of the bill, I am confident any problems can be resolved in conference and I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARICA] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 2721.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PREDATORY TIED AID CREDITS

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 127) relating to predatory tied aid credits.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. CON. RES. 127

Whereas tied aid and partially untied aid credits with low levels of concessionality are used by several governments as a predatory method of financing exports and result in market-distorting effects;

Whereas these distortions have caused the United States to lose export sales, with resulting losses in economic growth and development;

Whereas the Congress is preparing legislation intended to support the efforts of the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate a comprehensive arrangement restricting the use of tied and partially untied aid credits for commercial purposes; and

Whereas these negotiating efforts of the Secretary of the Treasury are fully supported by the Congress of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) a successful conclusion of an arrangement to regulate tied aid credits, so that their use for predatory commercial purposes is ended, would eliminate the need for the Congress to enact a special tied aid credit program;

(2) the Secretary of the Treasury should use the full resources of his office to promote such a successful conclusion to the negotiations; and

(3) the President should make the use of predatory tied aid credits a major topic of discussion at the Tokyo Summit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. NEAL] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. NEAL].

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 127. This is a very simple resolution, reaffirming congressional support for the administration's efforts to negotiate an end to the use of mixed credits. More specifically, the resolution states that it is the sense of the Congress that at the upcoming OECD conference, the Secretary of the Treasury should use the full resources of this office to promote a successful conclusion to negotiations on restricting the use of tied aid credits for commercial purposes.

The House Banking and Foreign Affairs Committee have both reported legislation to establish a so-called war chest with which we can combat the unfair and predatory use of tied aid credits by our foreign competitors. Successful negotiations to restrict mixed credits would eliminate the need for Congress to enact a war chest.

I would like to explain, briefly, the threat to our exports posed by foreign tied aid credits. As it now stands, the OECD arrangement permits governments to offer tied aid credit to finance their exports but only if the "grant element" exceeds 25 percent of the loan. Many countries have commenced an aggressive program of tied aid credits with grant elements around 25 percent to 35 percent. American exporters cannot, on their own, compete against foreign exporters armed with such tied aid credit, no matter how good our products might be.

Tied aid credit can be a useful and legitimate tool for assisting developing countries, but only when it is genuine foreign aid. To be genuine foreign aid it should contain a grant element considerably greater than 25 percent. Tied aid credit with a grant element just about 25 percent is not sufficiently costly to donor countries to dissuade them from using it, and abusing it, primarily for commercial purposes. This is a thoroughly predatory practice, nothing less than the stealing of potential markets from American exporters.

The exploitation of mixed credits is extensive. According to the administration, reported tied aid credit offers with grant elements under 50 percent have doubled since 1982. Actual mixed credits were expected to exceed $6 billion in 1985. Since the beginning of 1984, the OECD has received notification of over 600 mixed credit offers, with a total value of over $10 billion.

To put an end to this abuse of tied aid credit, we have been trying to negotiate a reform of the OECD arrangement to ensure that tied aid credit would be granted primarily as bona fide foreign aid for legitimate development purposes. For instance, an agreement to offer only tied aid credits with grant elements greater than 50 percent would impose much greater discipline than the current 25 percent threshold. The more costly it becomes, the more the temptation to use tied aid credits to steal commercial markets diminishes.

Mr. Speaker, we have, unfortunately, made little progress to date in negotiations to achieve this objective. The administration reports that a few countries, notably France and Italy, are blocking negotiations. Only when they see our resolve to discipline mixed credits will progress be made. With this support from Congress, we hope that the administration will succeed in engaging France in serious negotiations.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution which we hope will fortify the work of our negotiators at the upcoming Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development Ministerial Conference in Paris on export credit issues. It is my understanding that the administration has a real opportunity to make significant progress at this meeting, particularly if other countries are certain that we are serious about dealing with this issue of tied aid credits.

This resolution before the House today will not cost the American taxpayer 1 cent: its enactment could, in fact, help the Treasury save millions of dollars in susidies which go to support U.S. exporters in the event negotiations fail.

By being able to offer heavily subsidized official project financing, foreign firms have constantly underbid American firms, leading to one lost sale after another. In the past, the United States has tried to counteract tied aid or mixed credits by offering Export-Import Bank financing at arrangement rates or at subsidized rates through a joint Eximbank/AID program. This approach has not worked to date.

Over the past year, both the Banking and the Foreign Affairs Committees have reported out bills which would create a $300 million war chest which could support up to $2 billion in tied aid credit offers.

I would like to commend the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. NEAL] for his leadership in this regard.

I introduced President Reagan's original request as H.R. 3515, with broad bipartisan support. While the two committees have differing approaches on how to set up this tied aid fund, this resolution specifically avoids taking sides in this policy debate. When it comes to supporting Treasury Secretary James Baker and our negotiators, I believe there are no disagreements between the two committees.

It is my understanding that the other body has already passed an identical resolution.

This measure deserves bipartisan support insofar as it will promote efforts to level the playing field for American exporters who frequently have had to compete against a foreign treasury as well as a foreign company.

Mr. Speaker, I urge its immediate adoption to assist Secretary Baker and his team and to help American business and American labor.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. NEAL] that the House suspend the rules and concur in the Senate concurrent resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 127.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and include extraneous material, on Senate Concurrent Resolution 127, the Senate concurrent resolution just concurred in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

REAFFIRMING CONGRESS' RECOGNITION OF THE VITAL ROLE PLAYED BY MEMBERS OF THE NATIONAL GUARD AND RESERVE IN THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution, (H.J. Res. 220) to recognize the vital role played by members of the National Guard and Reserve in the national defense, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.J. RES. 220

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. RECOGNITION OF NATIONAL GUARD AND RESERVE

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress reaffirms its findings set out in section 1130(a) of Public Law 97-252 that—

(1) the National Guard and Reserve forces of the United States are an integral part of the total force policy of the United States for national defense and need to be ready to respond, on short notice, to augment the active military forces in time of national emergency;

(2) attracting and retaining sufficient numbers of qualified persons to serve in the Guard and Reserve is a difficult challenge during a period in which there is a decreasing number of young people from which to recruit; and

(3) the support of employers and supervisors in granting employees a leave of absence from their jobs to participate in military training without detriment to earned vacation time, promotions, and job benefits is essential to the maintenance of a strong Guard and Reserve force.

(b) RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS OF GUARD AND RESERVE.—It continues to be the sense of Congress that the citizen-military volunteers who serve the Nation as members of the National Guard and Reserve require and deserve public recognition of the essential role they play in the national defense, and particularly require and deserve the support and cooperation of their civilian employers, in order to be fully ready to respond to national emergencies.

(c) EMPLOYER SUPPORT FOR GUARD AND RESERVE.—The Congress reaffirms its statements expressed in section 1130(c) of Public Law 97-252 that it—

(1) recognizes, and requests all citizens to recognize, the vital need for a trained, ready National Guard and Reserve in the national defense posture of the United States; and

(2) urges and requests employers and supervisors of employees who are members of the National Guard or Reserve to abide by the provisions of chapter 43 of title 38, United States Code, by—

(A) granting a leave of absence for military training, exclusive of earned vacation, to employees who are members of the Guard and Reserve; and

(B) providing such employees equal consideration for job benefits and promotions as all other employees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. HOLT] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that for the minority side, the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. HOLT] will handle this very important piece of legislation. She has been very supportive of the National Guard and Reserve over the years, and I am very honored that she would be part of this resolution today.

Mr. Speaker, in the fiscal year 1983 Department of Defense Authorization Act, the Armed Services Committee expressed the sense of Congress recognizing the vital role of the National Guard and Reserve in the defense of our Nation. Language from that law states in part, and I quote:

The National Guard and Reserve forces of the United States are an integral part of the total force policy of the United States for national defense and need to be ready to respond, on short notice, to augment the military forces in time of national emergency.

That statement was true then and is true today. Since that law was enacted, there has been an even greater reliance on our Reserve Forces to help provide for the Nation's defense. I, along with the other members of the House Armed Services Committee, have long felt that our Reserve components offer a cost-effective means of providing for a significant share of the Nation's defense. I firmly believe that greater reliance on the National Guard and Reserves is an appropriate element in the battle to provide for an adequate defense at the lowest possible cost.

Because the vital role of our National Guard and Reserves becomes more apparent each day, the members of our Reserve components are being assigned more and more missions which require longer periods of training. In order to carry out their increased responsibilities, reservists and Guard members must have the support of the American people, and of employers in particular. It was because of this, that we introduced House Joint Resolution 220.

In reporting out this resolution, my colleagues on the Armed Services Committee have reaffirmed the feelings of Congress as expressed in the 1983 act which further stated, and I quote:

* * * The citizen-military volunteers who serve the Nation as members of the National Guard and Reserve require and deserve public recognition of the essential role they play in the national defense, and in particular, require and deserve the support and cooperation of their civilian employers, in order to be fully ready to respond to national emergencies.

Mr. Speaker, there seems to be little argument over the cost-effectiveness of reliance on our Reserve Forces. I believe this is a trend which will continue as we seek ways to reduce the Federal deficit. Although it is obvious to most of us here in Washington that our Reserve Forces represent the best buy for the taxpayer, this fact must be communicated to the American people, and to employers in particular.

During the development of a series of National Guard and Reserve initiatives last year, it became apparent to me that lack of awareness of the vital role being played by our Reserve Forces was still a problem. Hopefully, passage of this resolution will reemphasize this role and serve as a first step in establishing a broader base of support for the Guard and Reserve and also in bringing about a true national awareness of the professionalism and dedication of the members of our Reserve components.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to yield to the distinguished Representative from Maryland [Mrs. HOLT], who has long been one of the strongest supporters of the National Guard and Reserves. Without her work and support, many of the things which Congress has done for the Reserve components would never have happened.

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 220. This resolution is a tribute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] who for years has battled valiantly and tirelessly on behalf of the Nation's Guard and Reserve Forces. For years, the Pentagon's commitment to the important role of the National Guard and Reserve in the total force was primarily lipservice, lipservice that existed in a vacuum and was not translated into resources—the manpower, training, and equipment essential for military readiness.

Today, thanks in large part to the intervention of the Congress, the total force is a reality. The National Guard and Reserve are an integral part of the Nation's defense structure. The Guard and Reserve are expected to provide nearly one-half of the total Army's combat power and two-thirds of its combat support, service structure and wartime medical capability. Without the Reserves, the Active Forces would literally be unable to deploy and sustain the war effort. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] deserves the lion's share of the credit for this dramatic turnaround.

To fulfill mission requirements, National Guard and Reserve personnel must have the opportunity for meaningful and realistic training—both at monthly inactive duty training drills and 2 weeks' active duty for training. This is particularly the case for early deploying units that will be sent to the combat theater in the first hours and days following mobilization. As a result of congressional persistence, these early deploying units are at last getting the modern, first-rate equipment they would be expected to use in combat. Obviously, it is vitally important that they have an opportunity to train on that equipment.

Participation in Reserve training requires the understanding and cooperation of employers. House Joint Resolution 220 calls attention to the vital role that employers play in their employees' decisions to maintain active Reserve and Guard membership and urges strong employer support of the National Guard and Reserve.

I urge my House colleagues to join me in unanimously affirming their wholehearted support for House Joint Resolution 220.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. HOLT. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentlewoman for a very strong statement and also for her kindness over the years in working with the National Guard and Reserve. It has been a total team effort. It has not been just one individual.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know if we can carry on or not after the gentlewoman leaves us.

Mrs. HOLT. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 220. As a member of the House Armed Services Committee, I have supported the emphasis being placed upon our Reserve components as a cost-effective source of national defense.

Over the past several years, Congress has recognized the vital need for a trained and ready National Guard and Reserve. Seeing that this need continues to be met is becoming more difficult as the increased roles of the Guard and Reserve demand more and more training time for the individual reservist. This is a particularly difficult challenge as we enter a period in which the number of eligibles is decreasing and in which authority to induct persons for training in service in the Armed Forces is not provided for by law.

This resolution recognizes the sacrifices being made by the men and women serving as members of our Reserve Forces. It calls for the support of the American people, and of employers in particular. Without the support of employers, in the form of military leave and equal consideration for job benefits and promotions, the Reserve components cannot function. And without these forces, a significant portion of our total defense will be lost.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my call for this critically needed support for our Nation's citizens soldiers. They are true military professionals who help ensure the security of our Nation. They deserve no less than the full support of the American people.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of House Joint Resolution 220, a resolution which recognizes the critical role of the National Guard and Reserve in our national defense. I would also like to commend the chairman for bringing this resolution to the floor.

The National Guard and Reserve are an integral part of this Nation's defense structure. In recent years we have witnessed an increase in the role and responsibilities of the Guard and Reserve. As we attempt to find ways to cut the Federal deficit we should also recognize the fact that the Guard and Reserve are very cost efficient since these forces can perform certain missions at much less cost than our regular forces. The continuation of their success requires the vigorous support of the American people.

More important, this resolution is necessary because of the need to encourage employers to continue to be supportive of the National Guard and Reserve. Without this support from employers, our Guard and Reserve Forces would be unable to get the necessary training needed in the case of an emergency.

Today, we add our voices of support to those supportive employers in commending the excellent service provided by the men and women of the National Guard and Reserve.

Mr. BONER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in supporting H.J. Res. 220, which recognizes the vital role played by members of the National Guard and Reserve in the defense of our country.

Today the National Guard and Reserve are an integral part of the Armed Forces of the United States. Under the total force policy, the Reserve components will be used as the initial and primary back-up of the Active Forces in the event of national mobilization. In many instances, the active forces would be unable to deploy and accomplish their mission without the support of National Guard and Reserve members. In fact, the Guard and Reserve are expected to provide nearly one-half of the total Army's combat power and two-thirds of its combat support, services structure, and wartime medical capability.

To fulfill its mission requirements, National Guard and Reserve personnel must have the opportunity for meaningful and realistic training, both at the monthly inactive duty training drills and the 2 weeks' active duty for training. Clearly, participation in reserve training requires the understanding and cooperation of employees.

House Joint Resolution 220 calls attention to the role employers play in support of their employees' decisions to maintain active Reserve and Guard membership. The joint resolution urges strong employer support of the National Guard and Reserve.

More importantly, the joint resolution expresses the sense of the Congress that the volunteers who serve the Nation as members of the National Guard and Reserve require and deserve public recognition of the essential role they play in the national defense.

I join my colleagues in support of this resolution and, in particular, I want to express my appreciation to the members of the Tennessee National Guard and Reserve. Under the leadership of Major General Carl D. Wallace, the members of the Tennessee National Guard and Reserve are well prepared to meet their responsibility as part of our Nation's defense establishment. Tennessee is known as the volunteer State and the 18,000 members of the Tennessee National Guard and Reserve are among the very finest of this long tradition.

I join the citizens of Tennessee in saluting these men and women for their courage, sacrifice, and dedication.

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time. I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] that the House suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 220, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof), the rules were suspended and the joint resolution, as amended, was passed.

The title of the joint resolution was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to reaffirm Congress' recognition of the vital role played by members of the National Guard and Reserve in the national defense."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GARN-ST GERMAIN DEPOSITORY INSTITUTIONS ACT OF 1982 EXTENSION

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4551) to extend for 3 months the emergency acquisition and net worth guarantee provisions of the Garn-St Germain Depository Institutions Act of 1982.

H.R. 4551

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 141(a) of the Garn-St Germain Depository Institutions Act of 1982 (relating to emergency acquisitions) is amended by striking out "April 15, 1986" and inserting in lieu thereof "July 15, 1986".

(b) Section 206(a) of the Garn-St Germain Depository Institutions Act of 1982 (relating to net worth certificates) is amended by striking out "April 15, 1986" and inserting in lieu thereof "July 15, 1986."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO].

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 4551.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objecton to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield to myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Banking Committee and its chairman, FERNAND ST GERMAIN, who is unable to be here today, I ask for your support in passing H.R. 4551. This bill is cosponsored by almost the entire Banking Committee and is vital and absolutely noncontroversial legislation needed to enable our Federal bank and thrift regulators to continue to cope with the problems that now confront our banks and thrift industries.

H.R. 4551 would extend, with no change whatsoever, titles I and II of the Garn-St Germain Act of 90 days. The Garn-St Germain Act was originally passed by this House in 1982 to enable banks and thrifts to survive the high interest rates of that period.

Title I provides the Federal depository institution regulators with authority to arrange emergency interstate depository institution acquisitions to prevent the termination of essential deposit and loan services by problem bank and thrift institutions.

Title II authorizes the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation [FDIC] and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation [FSLIC] to extend capital assistance to certain problem bank and thrift institutions in the form of net worth certificates. Without this authority many depository institutions would be unable to continue operations. You should also be aware that title II contains an essential conservatorship authority that is critical to the ability of the Federal credit union regulator, NCUA, to handle problem credit unions.

Titles I and II of the Garn-St Germain Act were originally intended to expire October 15, 1985. However, the continuing problems in the thrift industry, and the emergence of real estate, agriculture, and energy lending problems around the country made necessary a 6-month extension until tomorrow, April 15. We continue to await specific legislation requested from the Federal Reserve, the other banking regulators, and the administration, addressing current depository institution problems. As a consequence, we must again seek an extension of the basic vital regulatory powers in titles I and II. To enable the regulators and committee members sufficient time to deliberate on proposed specific legislation, we seek an extension of 90 days.

A number of Members of this body have approached members of your House Banking Committee and, especially, the chairman of our committee, the Honorable FERNAND ST GERMAIN, to attempt to shorten the length of the extension contained in the bill before us from 90 to 30 days. This request, I am sure, was made with the best of intentions. We all know that a number of depository institutions, especially in the so-called energy and/or agriculturally oriented States, are in rather dire financial shape, as reported in the press, because of the loans they have made to agriculture and the energy sectors of our economy. Whereas we all hope this is a temporary situation for these financial institutions, the fact remains these depository institutions are not in the best of financial health at the moment.

It was the hope of those Members making the request that reducing the 90-day extension to 30 days would put the necessary pressure on the House Banking Committee to act immediately to solve the problems of these institutions and others in similar financial situations.

The administration—especially the financial regulatory agencies—as some of us know, is currently working on legislation concerning these matters which, if enacted into law, would alleviate the situation. As of the close of business Thursday, the regulators had not even come to a full agreement as to what precisely they wanted to propose to the Congress. I do not care to prolong this part of the discussion, but the Members should be informed that the Banking Committee is acting responsibly when it asks for this 90-day extension contained in the bill before us today.

In a Democratic caucus of the Financial Institutions Subcommittee, chaired by the chairman of the full committee, we considered all these problems and the need for prompt action. We are aware from extensive hearings of the full nature and extent of depository institution problems. The Members of the House should be advised that the Banking Committee has a history of acting in a timely fashion on all matters and especially matters which are of an emergency nature. The Members of the House should be comfortable in their knowledge that the Banking Committee will do the same in this instance.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I ask for your support in passing H.R. 4551 to extend for 90 days the authorities contained in titles I and II of the Garn-St Germain Act of 1982.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4551, the extension of the Garn-St Germain emergency acquisition and net worth certificate provisions. The gentleman from Illinois was an original cosponsor in 1982 and a strong supporter. These provisions have been extremely helpful to the regulators in resolving problems confronted by some of our financial institutions experiencing stress as a result of conditions in agriculture, energy, and other sectors of our economy.

The regulators have testified on numerous occasions that these provisions have materially increased their options in handling failures. The authorizations in Garn-St Germain have served not only to protect the reserves of the insurance funds and the safety and soundness of our financial institutions, but also have ensured that financial services will continue to be provided to many communities and depositors.

Mr. Speaker, this is a short-term extension of only 90 days. As Secretary of the Treasury Jim Baker and the regulators in a recent letter have stated, much more needs to be done. In view of the fact that some banking organizations may continue to experience severe and prolonged financial stress, the regulators' flexibility to deal with these more serious cases must be enhanced. The law needs to be broadened and improved to minimize the disruption of financial services to the communities involved and to provide the greater flexibility necessary to reduce the costs to the insurance funds. Prudent changes are necessary to maintain the safety and soundness of the banking system as a whole.

In this regard the Federal bank regulators—the Federal Reserve, the FDIC, and the Comptroller of the Currency—have recommended four specific changes in the emergency authorities. Based on their experience during the past 4 years and on the current outlook, the regulators have recommended that the law be changed to:

First, permit the out-of-State acquisition of failing banks, as well as of failed banks;

Second, permit the out-of-State acquisition of the entire holding company of a failed or failing bank under certain conditions;

Third, require equal treatment for acquiring banks in the State of acquisition; that is, an out-of-State purchaser would be accorded all of the branching and acquisition rights of any other holding company operating in the State of the acquired bank or holding company; and Fourth, reduce the asset size of banks eligible to be acquired pursuant to the emergency provisions from $500 million to at least $250 million.

Mr. Speaker, as stated in the letter from the regulators, it seems unavoidable that over the foreseeable future there will continue to be situations in which banks and thrifts will have problems so severe that they will be unable to continue to operate without an infusion of additional capital and management. The banking supervisors simply must have adequate tools to deal with such situations quickly and effectively so that the impact on local communities or regions and repercussions on the banking system generally are minimized.

This is one of the most important lessons we learned from the Ohio thrift crisis last year where the regulators clearly were not prepared. I don't want anyone anywhere in the country to have to experience the loss or disruption of daily banking services like so many Ohioans did last year.

My staff has been working with the staff of the distinguished chairman of the Banking Committee and I am hopeful that, after passing this short-term extension, we can agree on an expedited review of the regulators' recommendations and take quick action on a more permanent measure. I am also hopeful, Mr. Speaker, that the Banking Committee's review can be expanded to include other matters related to the safety and soundness of our financial system such as recapitalization of the FSLIC and other enhancements to the regulators' supervisory powers. I would like to personally thank Chairman ST GERMAIN for bringing this bill to the floor and state that I look forward to working closely with the chairman over the next few weeks in drafting a more comprehensive package to reform our deposit insurance system and give the regulators the tools they require.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER].

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the distinguished gentleman yielding me time on this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, today, as stated, we are considering legislation under suspension for yet another 90-day extension of the net worth certificate program for the thrift institutions of this country, and extending the emergency acquisition provision of the 1982 Garn-St Germain Act. I certainly support these efforts.

The first provision is certainly important, but I am very pleased that the extension is for only 90 days at this time. As I have earlier stressed to the chairman of the committee and the ranking member, I think it is important that we consider the possibility at least of extension of the net worth certificate concept to agricultural commercial banks, that is to say, commercial banks that are classified as agricultural lenders by the nature of their loan portfolio. And certainly the importance of extending the emergency acquisition powers is crucial, given the problems of those agricultural banks and the problems of banks in the energy-producing parts of the Nation; that is very evident to all. Therefore, this legislation is certainly timely.

Mr. Speaker, I do hope that some consideration is given to an approach like that embodied in legislation that I offered on March 3, 1986, H.R. 4289, which would extend the possibility in a revised form of the net worth certificate to agricultural banks of this country. I believe the net worth certificate program provides a valuable tool among the instruments necessary to help the troubled banks in the Grain Belt of this country and in farming States generally. Even the Government Accounting Office, in testimony before the Banking Committee, agrees with me in this respect for combating the problems of the thrift industry. It is now time that we broadened the use of this instrument for agricultural commercial banks. It is an approach that has proven its worth for the thrift industries of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the chairman of the Banking Committee [Mr. ST GERMAIN], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], and the ranking member of the Banking Committee [Mr. WYLIE] for their timely initiative in bringing us this legislation today. I urge its passage.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I support the legislation before us and the extension of Garn-St Germain for a 90-day period.

I think that in particular the acquisition powers of failed banks are necessary tools to deal with safety and soundness issues in 1986.

I do note the short-term nature of the extension. That is a 90-day extension, and I think that that 90 days, the short-term nature, is necessary and desirable as we consider the issues, because I do think it is necessary that over a short period of time, Congress visit the additional issues of the expansion of the emergency interstate acquisition of failing bank holding companies under Garn-St Germain, as has been proposed by the three principal regulators.

My own view, frankly, is that 90 days is longer than is necessary, and I had counseled last week with the bill's sponsors that we adopt a 30-day extension. But I do understand their concern, and I understand the need to take a reasonable amount of time to draft legislation that is lasting legislation. I have received, and the House has received, assurances from the leadership of the committee that they will act expeditiously, and I do very much appreciate that assurance.

I do believe that the Banking Committee should consider and then bring promptly back to this floor legislation that would be limited legislation to expand Garn-St Germain in a way that would resolve the problem, that is, to permit the emergency powers for emergency interstate acquisition of a failing bank holding company.

Frankly, I must say that I reached that conclusion somewhat reluctantly. I am not enthusiastic about the expansion, but I do believe that it must be done.

I would have preferred to deal with interstate banking legislation in a more orderly fashion, in a rational approach that would have first provided for, as is under the current laws and the current court cases, a State-by-State decision of regional compacts, thus leading over a multiyear period to interstate acquisition. But I do not think this legislation is designed to promote or to provide for interstate banking. I think the legislation is designed to solve a very real problem.

During consideration of the legislation, I do have, and will express, several concerns on the committee about the details of the bill that has been submitted. It is my judgment that the law that we come back with, the legislation, should be narrowly drafted, when possible, and we should preempt State laws only as necessary to resolve the problem and not in some way to propose an additional loophole for interstate banking.

My concerns from a quick review of the legislation that has been proposed include the following, and may include more as we go through hearings and the markup.

First, the definition of failing. I would judge that we should define failing in a way that it is a narrow definition of failing, so that in fact we define failing as an institution that is in danger of closing, and that an interstate acquisition is necessary to avoid a failure.

Second, I think we should be very careful about preempting State laws any more than is necessary. I am not satisfied that we are required to preempt State laws in a way to permit the additional acquisitions of banks within a State by an out-of-State bank holding company just because they have acquired a bank holding company in that State on an emergency basis. I will urge that we avoid such preemption, and if such preemption is included, at the very least, we should have a 3- to 5-year waiting period for forbearance rather than immediately preempt those State laws.

My other concerns include maintaining in-State priorities first, retaining participation by all three Federal regulators and requiring the participating and consultation with the chief State regulators, and providing sufficient authority to avoid inappropriate windfalls for either the bank holding company management or the shareholders when such windfalls would be inappropriate.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, again I say I support the 90-day extension. I am grateful to the leadership of the committee for their agreement to act expeditiously, and to bring back legislation to this floor well in advance of the 90 days as quickly as the Banking Committee can act.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for an excellent and very thoughtful statement.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4551.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTRA AID

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the Democratic leadership has indicated in news reports that it is unwilling to give us a straight up-or-down vote on Contra aid separate and apart from the supplemental appropriations because they are miffed or angry at the intimation that the things that the Nicaraguans are doing can be laid at their doorstep.

I wish to revise history so that we can sooth the egos of the Democratic leadership and proceed to a separate vote on Contra aid.

Mr. Speaker, I will state for the record that Ortega did not go to Moscow following the vote on the Contras last year. I will state for the record that the Nicaraguan Sandinistas did not venture into Honduras following the vote just taken on Contra aid. And I will also state for the record that tomorrow is not April 15 and the deadline for filing income tax returns.

JOHN D. CALLAWAY RECEIVES THE 1986 DANTE AWARD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call to the attention of my colleagues the achievements of the nationally known senior correspondent for the public broadcast station WTTW-TV channel 11, John D. Callaway, who will receive the 15th Annual Dante Award of the Joint Civic Committee of Italian Americans on May 9, at a luncheon given in his honor at the Como Inn in Chicago.

John Callaway joined WTTW-TV in 1974 after 17 years as a broadcaster and news executive with CBS Radio and Television in Chicago and New York, and currently he is host of the Emmy-award winning program, "Chicago Tonight With John Callaway," which appears every week night on WTTW-TV. Well-known and highly respected for his insightful and responsible interviews, and for maintaining the highest standards of integrity in his 29-year career as as broadcast journalist, John Callaway has received more than 50 awards and honors in recognition of his work, including five Emmys and the prestigious Peabody Award. He is a most deserving recipient of the Dante Award for his achievements and contributions to broadcasting and he has been representative of Dante Alighieri's statement in his "Divine Comedy" that "man should never be timid about the truth."

The Dante Award was established by the Joint Civic Committee of Italian Americans, an umbrella organization comprised of more than 40 civic organizations in the Chicago area, to extend recognition annually to an individual in the mass media communications field who has made positive contributions to the profession of journalism.

During his career, John Callaway has covered six national political conventions, and was the moderator of the Illinois statewide network broadcasts of the four gubernatorial election debates which took place in 1978. In addition, he has compiled an outstanding record of achievement by moderating since 1974 all the WTTW-TV special programs on the congressional, senatorial, and mayoral campaigns in Illinois.

John Callaway has distinguished himself as a most competent and thorough journalist in his coverage of the aftermath of the 1967 Arab-Israeli War, and the career and death of Mayor Richard J. Daley, as well as his coverage of the tragic 1958 fire at Our Lady of the Angels School, where 92 students and 3 nuns died.

Beginning his career in journalism in 1956 as a copy boy and police reporter for the City News Bureau of Chicago, 1 year later John Callaway became a general assignment reporter and documentary producer for WBBM-Radio and WBBM-TV, the CBS owned station in Chicago. From 1960 to 1968, he served in several major executive positions at the radio station, including editorial director, public affairs director, and news and program director, and he also was host of the award-winning CBS radio documentary discussion, and call-in program, "Nightline."

In 1964, John Callaway won 7 national awards for his production and narration of a 13-part commentary series which examined the American civil rights movement. Writing, producing, and broadcasting several documentary programs about prison problems in Illinois, he became the first Chicago journalist to gain membership in the Illinois Academy of Criminology.

John Callaway was instrumental in helping to initate WBBM-Radio's all-news format in 1968, and from 1968 until 1970, he served as vice president of program services for CBS-Radio in New York City, where he developed the expansion of CBS all-news stations throughout the country. In 1970, he began hosting the nationally broadcast interview program, "Crosstalk," and in 1973, he returned to Chicago as a reporter for WBBM-TV.

Joining WTTW-TV channel 11 in Chicago in 1974, John Callaway has hosted numerous nationally syndicated Public Broadcasting System series, including the most highly respected "John Callaway Interviews," "Campaigning on Cue," and the "Paper Chase Addendum." He has also authored two books, and has contributed articles to several newspapers and magazines.

The 15th Annual Dante Award Luncheon will be held under the auspices of the Anti-Defamation Committee of the JCCIA, chaired by Carl De Moon, at the Como Inn, and many political dignitaries, civic leaders, and leaders of the communications industry will be in attendance. Joe Weisman, senior editor and host of WTTW's "Chicago Week in Review," will serve as master of ceremonies of the luncheon, sharing this position on the dais with Emil Venuti, a member of the Anti-Defamation Committee of the JCCIA. The invocation will be offered by the Reverend Lawrence Cozzi, C.S., administrator of Villa Scalabrini, the Italian Old Peoples Home in Melrose Park. Charles C. Porcelli, president of the JCCIA, will present the Dante Award to John Callaway.

For the 11th straight year, the John Fischetti Scholarship will also be awarded at the luncheon. The scholarship, which this year is a $1,500 award, was established by the Joint Civic Committee of Italian Americans to further the study of Italian American students in communications and is named after the Pulitzer prize-winning political cartoonist.

Mr. Speaker, I extend my warmest congratulations to John Callaway on meriting this recognition, and for the strong and constructive impact he has made on the broadcast industry. His career, his character, and his splendid record of achievement prove that he is, indeed, a "friend of truth."

SPECIAL RULE ON CONTRA AID

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, today our distinguished Republican leader, Mr. MICHEL, and I are introducing a special discharge rule on the subject of assistance for the democratic resistance in Nicaragua. I think it should be clear by now that the Democratic leadership of this House is more interested in playing games with the issue than in expediting consideration of a separate measure that could be signed into law and provide this urgently needed aid to the Contras. By folding the Contra aid issue into the supplemental under the rule to be taken up tomorrow, the Democratic leadership is cynically counting on delays and veto threats to put Contra aid on a slow track.

The rule I am introducing today would make in order consideration of House Joint Resolution 283, relating to the internal situation in Nicaragua, introduced by Congressman MCCURDY last year. The joint resolution would be subject to 2 hours of debate. The House would then consider three substitutes in the following order, with an hour of debate on each: a substitute by Congressman HAMILTON printed in the RECORD by May 7; A substitute by Congressman MCCURDY printed in the RECORD by May 7; and a substitute by Congressman MICHEL printed in the April 21 RECORD. If more than one substitute is adopted the last one adopted would be reported back to the House, the so-called king-of-the-mountain approach. The joint resolution would then be joined with the Senate-passed measure, Senate Joint Resolution 283 to facilitate either sending it to the President or achieving an agreement between the two Houses.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to file a discharge motion on this rule next Wednesday. Hopefully, we will secure the necessary 218 signatures in time to bring this up on the next discharge date, Monday, May 12.

I regret it is necessary to resort to the discharge procedure on a matter on which we had thought separate consideration would be permitted. But this is apparently the only way we can accomplish that objective given the leadership's attempts to submerge and delay the matter.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I include a summary and the text of our special discharge rule. The items follow:

SUMMARY OF PROPOSED RULE FOR CONTRA AID

1. Immediately upon the adoption of the rule, the House would resolve into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of H.J. Res. 283, to promote internal reconciliation in Nicaragua on the basis of democratic principles and to further peaceful resolution of the conflict in Central America.

[Note: H.J. Res. 283 was introduced by Rep. David McCurdy on May 8, 1985 with 10 cosponsors, and referred to the Committees on Appropriations, Foreign Affairs, Intelligence and Rules.]

2. The joint resolution would be subject to two hours of general debate divided between the majority and minority leaders.

3. All points of order are waived against the consideration of the joint resolution.

4. The rule makes in order the following amendments in the nature of a substitute to be offered only in the following order, waives all points of order against them, makes them in order even if a previous amendment has been adopted, prohibits any amendments to the amendments or a division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, and provides one hour of debate on each, divided between the proponent and an opponent: (1) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record by May 7th by Rep. Hamilton; (2) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record by May 7th by Rep. McCurdy; and (3) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 21 by Rep. Michel. The last amendment adopted shall be reported back to the House (king-of-the-mountain).

5. After the joint resolution has been amended and reported to the House, the previous question is ordered to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

6. After passage of the joint resolution, the House would proceed to the immediate consideraton in the House of S.J. Res. 283, the Senate passed Contra aid bill, and it would then be in order to move to insert the House passed language or, if the Michel substitute has been adopted, it would be in order as a preferential motion to move the previous question on the Senate joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion.

H. RES. 419

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 283) to promote internal reconciliation within Nicaragua, on the basis of democratic principles, in furtherance of peaceful resolution of the conflict in Central America, the first reading of the joint resolution shall be dispensed with, and all points of order against the consideration of the joint resolution are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and the amendments made in order by this resolution, and which shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the majority leader and the minority leader, or their designees, the resolution shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. No amendment to the joint resolution shall be in order except the following amendments, which shall be in order any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding, which shall be in order even if a previous amendment in the nature of a substitute has been adopted, which shall be considered as having been read, which shall be considered only in the following order, and which shall not be subject to amendment or to a division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole:

(1) an amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the Congressonal Record by May 7, 1986, by, and if offered by, Representative Hamilton of Indiana, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Hamilton and a Member opposed thereto;

(2) an amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the Congressional Record by May 7, 1986, by, and if offered by, Representative McCurdy of Oklahoma, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative McCurdy and a Member opposed thereto; and

(3) an amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the Congressional Record of April 21, 1986, by, and if offered by, Representative Michel of Illinois, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Michel and a Member opposed thereto. If more than one of the amendments in the nature of a substitute made in order by this resolution has been adopted, only the last such amendment which has been adopted shall be considered as having been finally adopted in the Committee of the Whole and reported back to the House.

At the conclusion of the consideration of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit. After the passage of H.J. Res. 283, the House shall proceed to the immediate consideration of S.J. Res. 283 in the House, and it shall then be in order to move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the said Senate joint resolution and to insert in lieu thereof the provisions contained in H.J. Res. 283 as passed by the House, except that, if the joint resolution as passed by the House includes the provisions of the amendment offered by Representative Michel, it shall be in order as a preferential motion, any rule or precedent of the House to the contrary notwithstanding, to move the previous question on the said Senate joint resolution to final passage, without intervening motion.

By Mr. BLILEY:

By Mr. BOSCO:

—Add the following new section at the end of the bill:

SEC. USE OF AMERICAN-BUILT RIGS FOR OCS DRILLING.

Section 5 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1334) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(j)(1) Any vessel, rig, platform, or other structure used for the purpose of exploration or production of oil and gas on the outer Continental Shelf south of 49 degrees North latitude shall be built—

"(A) in the United States; and

"(B) from articles, materials, or supplies at least 50 percent of which, by cost, shall have been mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States.

"(2) The requirements of paragraph (1) shall not apply to any vessel, rig, platform, or other structure which was built, which is being built, or for which a building contract has been executed, on or before October 1, 1985.

"(3) The Secretary may waive—

"(A) the requirement in paragraph (1)(B) whenever the Secretary determines that 50 percent of the articles, materials, or supplies for a vessel, rig, platform, or other structure cannot be mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States, and

"(B) the requirement in paragraph (1)(A) upon application, with respect to any classification of vessels, rigs, platforms, or other structures on a specific lease, when the Secretary determines that at least 50 percent of such classification, as calculated by number and by weight, which are to be built for exploration or production activities under such lease will be built in the United States in compliance with the requirements of paragraph (1)(A).".

By Mr. FAUNTROY:

HAITI

Of the funds made available for the "Economic Support Fund" in Public Law 99-190, up to $21,700,000 shall be made available for assistance to Haiti, which shall be in addition to the assistance previously allocated for Haiti. Of this amount, $1,700,000 shall be transferred to the Inter-American Foundation for use by the Foundation for programs for Haiti.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Of the funds made available for "Military Assistance" in Public Law 99-190, up to $4,000,000 shall be made available to provide nonlethal military assistance for Haiti (such as transportation equipment, training, communications equipment, and uniforms). Such assistance may be provided notwithstanding the limitation on assistance to Haiti contained in section 705(e) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985.

GENERAL PROVISIONS—HAITI

SEC. 1. (a) The funds made available by this chapter under the heading "MILITARY ASSISTANCE" may be used for assistance for the Government of Haiti only with the understanding by and agreement of that Government that—

(1) it will not use the assistance to suppress legitimate protests,

(2) it will act to remove from the military personnel responsible for human rights abuses,

(3) it will act to investigate the killings of unarmed civilians in Martissant and Gonaives and to prevent any similar occurrences in the near future, and

(4) it will act to require former members of the Volunteers for National Security (VSN) to turn in their weapons.

(b) Half of such assistance shall be withheld until submission by the President of a report to the Congress 4 months after the date of enactment of this Act which details the extent to which the Government of Haiti is acting consistent with each paragraph of subsection (a).

SEC. 2. It is the sense of the Congress that the United States Government should cooperate with the Government of Haiti in recovering the wealth of the Haitian people that was illegally diverted by former president-for-life Jean-Claude Duvalier and his former government ministers and associates.

GENERAL PROVISION—DIPLOMATIC SECURITY PROGRAM

The funds made available by this chapter under the headings "SALARIES AND EXPENSES", "ACQUISITION AND MAINTENANCE OF BUILDINGS ABROAD", and "COUNTERTERRORISM RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT" shall be used in accordance with those provisions applicable to the diplomatic security program that are contained in H.R. 4151 (the "Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986") as passed the House of Representatives on March 18, 1986, except that this paragraph shall cease to apply upon the enactment of authorizing legislation (either H.R. 4151 or similar legislation) providing for enhanced diplomatic security.

By Mr. MICHEL:

—Page 33, beginning on line 19, strike out section 201 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 201. (a)(1) Paragraph (4) of section 1011 of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (hereinafter in this section referred to as "the Act") is amended to read as follows:

"(4) 'deferral resolution' means a joint resolution of the Congress which only expresses its disapproval of a proposed deferral of budget authority set forth in a special message transmitted by the President under section 1013; and".

(2) Subsection (b) of section 1013 of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b) REQUIREMENT TO MAKE AVAILABLE FOR OBLIGATION.—Any amount of budget authority proposed to be deferred in any fiscal year (as set forth in a special message under subsection (a)) shall be made available for obligation if a deferral resolution is enacted disapproving such proposed deferral.".

(3) Section 1017 of the Act is amended by striking out "impoundment resolution" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "deferral resolution".

(b)(1) Section 1013 of the Act if further amended—

(A) by redesignating subsections (b) and (c) as subsections (c) and (d), respectively; and

(B) in subsection (a), by striking out the matter following paragraph (6) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) LIMITATIONS ON DEFERRAL MESSAGES.—

"(1) A special message may include one or more proposed deferrals of budget authority, but the total amount of budget authority that may be deferred in any fiscal year shall not exceed $5,000,000,000.

"(2) Deferrals of budget authority shall be counted for purposes of paragraph (1) in the order in which submitted, except that if a message under section 1013 and a report under section 1015 are submitted on the same day, the deferral of budget authority described in such report shall be counted first. Once the limit contained in paragraph (1) has been reached for any fiscal year, any additional deferral of budget authority for such fiscal year shall be invalid, and the budget authority that is the subject of such deferral shall be made available for obligation.

"(3) Amounts which have been deferred but which are required to be made available by reason of the enactment of a deferral resolution or other provision of law shall not, after such enactment, be counted for purposes of paragraph (1).

"(4) Except to the extent that paragraph (3) applies following the enactment of a deferral resolution or other provision of law, amounts as to which the Comptroller General has made a finding under section 1015 (that the President has failed to transmit a deferral message) shall be counted for purposes of such limitation.

"(5) A deferral may not be proposed for any period of time extending beyond the end of the fiscal year in which the special message proposing the deferral is transmitted to the House of Representatives and the Senate.".

(2) Section 1015(c) of the Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(c) EXCEEDING LIMITATION ON DEFERRAL AUTHORITY.—If the Comptroller General finds that the total of—

"(1) the budget authority proposed to be deferred by the President under section 1013(a), plus

"(2) the budget authority with respect to which a finding has been made under subsection (a) that the President has failed to transmit a deferral message, equals or exceeds the total amount that may be deferred in such fiscal year under section 1013(b), the Comptroller General shall make a report to both Houses of Congress setting forth his reasons.".

(3) Section 1016 of the Act is amended by striking out "or 1013(b)" and inserting ", 1013(b), or 1013(c)".

(c)(1) Section 1011 of the Act is amended—

(A) in paragraph (1)—

(i) by striking out "includes—" and inserting in lieu thereof "does not include a reservation of budget authority, but includes—"; and

(ii) by striking out "(whether by establishing reserves or otherwise)";

(B) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (4);

(C) by redesignating paragraph (5) as paragraph (6); and

(D) by inserting after paragraph (4) the following new paragraph:

"(5) 'reservation of budget authority' means withholding or delaying the obligation or expenditure of budget authority by the establishment of a reserve in accordance with section 1512(c) of title 31, United States Code, and with paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 1018(c) of this Act; and".

(2) Part B of the Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"REPORTING AND RECLASSIFICATION OF RESERVATIONS

"SEC. 1018. (a) TRANSMITTAL OF SPECIAL MESSAGE.—Whenever the President, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the head of any department or agency of the United States, or any officer or employee of the United States proposes to establish a reservation of budget authority, the President shall transmit to the House of Representatives and the Senate a special message specifying, with respect to the budget authority proposed to be reserved, the same information as is required with respect to a deferral of budget authority under paragraphs (1) through (6) or section 1013(a).

"(b) REVIEW BY COMPTROLLER GENERAL.—The Comptroller General shall review each special message transmitted under subsection (a) to determine whether the proposed reservation of budget authority complies with the standards prescribed under subsection (c) of this section. If the Comptroller General determines that the proposed reservation does not comply with such standards—

"(1) the Comptroller General shall make a report to both Houses of Congress setting forth his reasons, and

"(2) the special message transmitted under subsection (a) shall be treated as if transmitted under section 1013(a).

"(c) STANDARDS TO ENSURE USE OF RESERVATIONS FOR ROUTINE MANAGEMENT PURPOSES AND NOT FOR PROPOSAL OF POLICY CHANGES.—The Comptroller General shall prescribe standards for determining whether a special message transmitted under this section proposes to withhold or delay the obligation or expenditure of budget authority—

"(1) exclusively for a purpose authorized by section 1512(c)(1) of title 31, United States Code; and

"(2) in a manner which improves the management and administration of the budget authority without diverging from the policies, purposes, and objectives of the Congress in making such budget authority available.".

(d)(1) The amendments made by this section shall be effective on the date of enactment of this Act, but shall not apply with respect any deferral of budget authority—

(A) for which the special message was submitted by the President under section 1013(a) of the Act before such date, or

(B) for which a report was made by the Comptroller General under section 1015 of the Act before such date.

(2) For purposes of applying section 1013(b) of the Act (as amended by this section) during fiscal year 1986, any deferral of budget authority—

(A) for which the special message was submitted by the President under section 1013(a) of the Act before such date, or

(B) for which a report was made by the Comptroller General under section 1015 of the Act before such date, shall excluded from the total budget authority counted for purposes of paragraph (1) of section 1013(b) of the Act.

(3) The terms used in this subsection have the same meaning as such terms had under the Act is in effect prior to the enactment of this section.

Funds appropriated by this or any other Act for the Department of Defense or the Department of Energy may not be obligated or expended to carry out an explosive test of a nuclear device until the President certifies to Congress that the Soviet Union has conducted, after April 10, 1986 an explosive test of a nuclear device.

H.J. Res.

By Mr. HAMILTON:

(Text of S.J. Res. 283.)

—Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

UNITED STATES POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

SECTION 1. (a) The primary objectives of United States policy in Central America should be—

(1) to preserve the security of the United States;

(2) to prevent the Soviet Union and its allies from seeking to destabilize the region or to develop or deploy an offensive military capability which directly threatens the United States;

(3) to achieve peace and reconciliation;

(4) to promote stability and economic development;

(5) to promote the observance of human rights and the strengthening of democratic processes; and

(6) to live at peace with Nicaragua so long as Nicaragua lives at peace with its neighbors.

(b) United States strategy for achieving the objectives stated in subsection (a) should include—

(1) an emphasis on seeking a negotiated, regional settlement;

(2) respect for the independence and territorial integrity of all nations;

(3) a clear commitment, through appropriate types and levels of military and economic assistance, to assist the nations of Central America in building and sustaining viable, democratic societies capable of withstanding aggression and subversion and of providing their people with an opportunity for better lives; and

(4) consistent diplomatic support on behalf of the observance of human rights by groups and governments, and support for democratic institutions throughout the region, in recognition of the fact that subversion feeds on repression.

(c) In furtherance of the objectives stated in subsection (a), United States policy with respect to Nicaragua should include the following:

(1) A commitment to preserve the security of the United States by preventing the Soviet Union and its allies from developing or deploying an offensive military capability in Central America that directly threatens the United States.

(2) A commitment to protect the security and territorial integrity of any nation of Central America from unlawful actions by Nicaragua, in conformance with the Charter of the Organization of American States and the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, which provide for collective action.

(3) Pursuit of a regional settlement through all diplomatic avenues, including—

(A) effective support for the Contadora process, which is addressing the questions of peace and security (including mechanisms for verification and enforcement) and internal reconciliation and political pluralism;

(B) giving priority to obtaining a ceasefire in Nicaragua;

(C) renewing bilateral talks with Nicaragua; and

(D) encouraging direct talks among the parties to the conflict in Nicaragua.

(4) The provision of incentives to Nicaragua if, over the long term, the Government of Nicaragua improves its conduct, including by agreeing to a ceasefire and to negotiate with its opponents, removing foreign military advisors, agreeing not to provide material support for insurgencies and agreeing to appropriate monitoring procedures under Contadora auspices to verify such agreement, respecting human rights and the independence of the media, and making progress toward national reconciliation and a pluralistic democratic system. Incentives should be structured to enable the United States to respond to positive steps by Nicaragua. These incentives could include—

(A) the suspension of United States military exercises in the region;

(B) the resumption of normal trade, including the resumption of nondiscriminatory trade treatment (MFN status), the restoration of benefits under the Generalized System of Preferences, and the restoration of Nicaragua's sugar quota;

(C) supporting bilateral and multilateral assistance for Nicaragua and providing technical assistance, help in agriculture and health, and volunteer services; and

(D) the creation of a Central American Development Organization (in accordance with section 464 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961) in which Nicaragua could participate.

(5) The imposition of further sanctions against Nicaragua should it intensify or expand activities hostile to United States interests and to peace and security within Central America. Such sanctions could include obtaining the cooperation of our allies in Western Europe and Japan, now Nicaragua's largest trading partners, in—

(A) cutting trade with Nicaragua;

(B) stopping bilateral assistance and blocking multilateral assistance to Nicaragua;

(C) imposing comprehensive economic sanctions against Nicaragua;

(D) breaking diplomatic relations with Nicaragua; and

(E) working with our Latin American allies, especially those in Central America, to isolate Nicaragua in regional affairs. Such sanctions can only be effective if taken together with our allies. Unilateral sanctions have not and will not be effective.

ASSISTANCE FOR HUMANITARIAN NEEDS

SEC. 2. (a) Of the funds authorized to be transferred by section 4, up to $27,000,000 may be used by the President to provide food, medicine, or other assistance for the humanitarian needs of those who have been displaced by conflict in Nicaragua, regardless of whether they have been associated with the Nicaraguan opposition forces.

(b) Assistance under this section may be provided only through the International Committee of the Red Cross or the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and only upon that organization's determination that such assistance is necessary to meet humanitarian needs.

ASSISTANCE IN SUPPORT OF THE CONTADORA PROCESS

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress reaffirms its support for the Contadora initiatives and is prepared to support the regional peace process with financial assistance. Accordingly, the President may use up to $5,000,000—

(1) to provide assistance to the Contadora nations of Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, and Colombia, and the Contadora Support Group nations of Argentina, Peru, Uruguay, and Brazil, to assist those nations in reaching agreement among the nations of Central America based on the Contadora Document of Objectives of September 9, 1983, including assistance for peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems; and

(2) to help implement any joint border commission agreement between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, or between Nicaragua and Honduras, which those nations enter into in furtherance of the purposes of the Contadora Document of Objectives.

(b) In addition to funds transferred pursuant to section 4, the $2,000,000 appropriated under the heading "ASSISTANCE FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF A CONTADORA AGREEMENT" by the Supplemental Appropriations Act, 1985, may be used to carry out this section.

TRANSFER OF DOD FUNDS

SEC. 4. The President may transfer up to $30,000,000 of the funds appropriated by the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1986 (as contained in Public Law 99-190), for use in carrying out sections 2 and 3. The funds transferred under this section may include funds that have been made available for obligation beyond September 30, 1986, as provided by law.

REPORTS ON USE OF FUNDS

SEC. 5. No less frequently than once every 3 months, the President shall submit to the Congress a written report containing an accounting of any funds used pursuant to section 2 or section 3.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON CONTADORA

SEC. 6. (a) There is hereby established the National Commission on Contadora (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Commission"). The Commission shall—

(1) monitor and review the efforts of the Contadora nations to achieve a political resolution to the conflicts in Central America; and

(2) make recommendations with a view to building a consensus on United States policy toward Nicaragua.

(b) The Commission shall consist of an even number of members, such number to be determined jointly by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Majority Leader of the Senate, who shall each appoint half of the members of the Commission. A vacancy in the membership of the Commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

(c) Not later than September 1, 1986, the Commission shall submit a report to the President and to the Congress with respect to its findings and recommendations. This report shall include—

(1) a detailed review of the status of the Contadora negotiations and United States support for those negotiations;

(2) a determination by the Commission of whether the Government of Nicaragua and the Nicaraguan opposition are facilitating the Contadora process;

(3) a recommendation on policies toward Nicaragua which the Commission believes represent a consensus that is sustainable and is supportable by the American people; and

(4) a recommendation by the Commission on whether the United States should furnish military assistance to the Nicaraguan opposition forces, including an estimate of the likely impact that furnishing such assistance would have on the Government of Nicaragua and on United States policy throughout the region.

(d) Members of the Commission shall receive no compensation on account of their service on the Commission, but while away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of their duties on the Commission, shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703 of title 5 of the United States Code.

(e)(1) The Commission may employ experts and consultants in accordance with section 3109 of title 5, United States Code.

(2) Upon a request by the Commission, the head of any Federal agency may temporarily assign employees of that agency to the Commission to assist the Commission in carrying out this section.

(f) The Administrator of General Services shall provide to the Commission, on a reimburseable basis, such administrative support services as the Commission may request.

(g) Funds for the expenses incurred by the Commission in carrying out this section, including travel expenses, shall be provided by Secretary of State.

PRESIDENTIAL REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL AUTHORITY WITH RESPECT TO NICARAGUA

SEC. 7. (a) After considering the recommendations of the National Commission on Contadora contained in the report submitted pursuant to section 6(c), the President may submit to the Congress on or after September 1, 1986, a request for authority to take specified actions with respect to Nicaragua. The request must be accompanied by—

(1) the President's assurance that he has consulted with the Contadora nations and the Contadora Support Group nations concerning the proposed actions; and

(2) a description of the response of the Contadora nations and the Contadora Support Group nations to the proposed actions.

(b)(1) The provisions of this subsection apply, during the 99th Congress, to the consideration in the House of Representatives of a joint resolution with respect to the request submitted by the President pursuant to subsection (a).

(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term "joint resolution" means only a joint resolution introduced within 3 legislative days after the Congress receives the request submitted by the President pursuant to subsection (a)—

(A) the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: "That the Congress hereby authorizes the President, notwithstanding any other provision of law, to take those actions with respect to Nicaragua which are specified in the request submitted to the Congress pursuant to the joint resolution entitled 'Joint Resolution relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985'.";

(B) which does not have a preamble; and

(C) the title of which is as follows: "Joint Resolution relating to Nicaragua pursuant to the joint resolution entitled 'Joint Resolution relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985'.".

(3) A joint resolution shall, upon introduction, be referred to the appropriate committee or committees of the House of Representatives.

(4) If all the committees of the House to which a joint resolution has been referred have not reported the same joint resolution by the end of 15 legislative days after the first joint resolution was introduced, any committee which has not reported the first joint resolution introduced shall be discharged from further consideration of that joint resolution and that joint resolution shall be placed on the appropriate calendar of the House.

(5)(A) At any time after the first joint resolution placed on the appropriate calendar has been on that calendar for a period of 5 legislative days, it is in order for any Member of the House (after consultation with the Speaker as to the most appropriate time for the consideration of that joint resolution) to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of that joint resolution. The motion is highly privileged and is in order even though a previous motion to the same effect has been disagreed to. All points of order against the joint resolution under clauses 2 and 6 of Rule XXI of the Rules of the House are waived. If the motion is agreed to, the resolution shall remain the unfinished business of the House until disposed of. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion is disagreed to shall not be in order.

(B) Debate on the joint resolution shall not exceed ten hours, which shall be divided equally between a Member favoring and a Member opposing the joint resolution. A motion to limit debate is in order at any time in the House or in the Committee of the Whole and is not debatable.

(C) An amendment to the joint resolution is not in order.

(D) At the conclusion of the debate on the joint resolution, the Committee of the Whole shall rise and report the joint resolution back to the House, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion.

(6) As used in this subsection, the term "legislative day" means a day on which the House is in session.

(7) This subsection is enacted—

(A) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the House of Representatives, and as such it is deemed a part of the Rules of the House, but applicable only with respect to the procedure to be followed in the House in the case of a joint resolution, and it supersedes other rules only to the extent that it is inconsistent with such rules; and

(B) with full recognition of the constitutional right of the House to change its rules at any time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of the House, and of the right of the Committee on Rules to report a resolution for the consideration of any measure.

By Mr. McCURDY:

(Text of S.J. Res. 283.)

—(1) In section 1, strike out "as requested" and all that follows through "(Public Law 99-88),".

(2) Strike out paragraph (5) of section 3(a) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(5) the lack of progress toward a peaceful resolution of the conflict in Central America based upon the comprehensive implementation of the September 1983 Contadora Document of Objectives.

(3) Strike out paragraph (1) of section 3(b) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) begin serious bilateral discussions with the Government of Nicaragua without requiring, as a precondition, negotiations between the Government of Nicaragua and the forces opposed to the Government of Nicaragua, provided a cease-fire, to be monitored by the Contadora countries and the Contadora Support Group countries, is established before the United States begins such negotiations; and

(4) In section 4(a) strike out "It is the policy of the United States to assist all" and insert in lieu thereof "The United States shall assist only those".

(5) Strike out section 4(c) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) The President shall use the authority provided by this joint resolution to encourage the Nicaraguan democratic resistance to take additional steps to strengthen its unity, increase the responsiveness of military forces to civilian leadership, pursue a defined and coordinated program for representative democracy in Nicaragua, and otherwise increase its appeal to the Nicaraguan people.

(6) Strike out section 4(d) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(d) In furtherance of the policy set out in this section, not less than $10,000,000 of the funds transferred under section 5(a) shall be available only for assistance to resistance groups otherwise eligible and not currently included within the United Nicaraguan Opposition (UNO), such assistance to be provided according to their needs and contribution to the resistance. In carrying out this subsection, not less than $5,000,000 of the funds made available pursuant to this subsection shall be available only for the Southern Opposition Bloc (BOS) and not less than $5,000,000 shall be available only for the Indian resistance force known as Misurasata.

(7) In section 5, strike out subsection (b) and redesignate subsections (c) and (d) as subsections (b) and (c), respectively.

(8) Strike out section 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

COORDINATION OF ASSISTANCE TO THE NICARAGUAN DEMOCRATIC RESISTANCE

SEC. 6. The Secretary of State (or his designee) shall be responsible for policy guidance, coordination, and supervision of United States Government activities under this joint resolution.

(9) In section 9(b), strike out "In furtherance" and all that follows through the end of paragraph (1) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) Of the amounts transferred under section 5(a), $30,000,000 shall be available only for the provision to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance of the following:

(A) assistance of the types authorized by section 722(g) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985, provided by the Nicaraguan assistance office established by Executive Order 12530;

(1) In subsection (b) of section 9—

(A) insert "and" at the end of paragraph (3);

(B) strike out "; and" at the end of paragraph (4) and insert in lieu thereof a period;

(C) redesignate paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) as subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D), respectively;

(D) strike out paragraph (5); and

(2) Of the $30,000,000 specified in paragraph (1), $3,000,000 shall be available only for strengthening programs and activities of the Nicaraguan democratic resistance for the observance and advancement of human rights.

(3) In furtherance of the objectives set forth in subsection (a), none of the funds authorized to be transferred by section 5(a), except the $30,000,000 specified in paragraph (1), may be obligated or expended for assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance unless the conditions specified in subsection (c) are met.

(11) Strike out subsections (c) through (f) of section 9 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) On and after July 28, 1986, the restriction in subsection (b)(3) shall cease to apply if—

(1) the President determines and reports to the Congress that—

(A) the Central American countries have not concluded a comprehensive and effective agreement based on the Contadora Document of Objectives,

(B) the Government of Nicaragua is not engaged in a serious dialogue with representatives of all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition, accompanied by a cease-fire, leading to regularly scheduled free and fair elections and the establishment of democratic institutions, and

(C) there is no reasonable prospect of achieving such agreement, dialogue, and cease-fire through further diplomatic measures, multilateral or bilateral, without additional assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance; and

(2) the Congress enacts under section 10 a joint resolution approving the provision of assistance under this joint resolution without regard to the restriction in subsection (b)(3).

(d) Upon the enactment of a joint resolution pursuant to subsection (c)(2), $25,000,000 of the funds transferred under section 5(a) shall be available for obligation and expenditure in accordance with this joint resolution (in addition to the funds provided for in subsection (b)(1)). Upon the transmittal after the enactment of that joint resolution of each report required by section 12, an additional $15,000,000 of those funds shall be available for obligation and expenditure in accordance with this joint resolution.

(e) If the conditions specified in subsection (c) are met, assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance under this joint resolution (other than the assistance provided for in subsection (b)(1)) shall no longer be provided if at any time—

(1) the President determines that—

(A) the Central American countries have concluded a comprehensive and effective agreement based on the Contadora Document of Objectives; or

(B) the Government of Nicaragua is engaging in a serious dialogue with representatives of all elements of the Nicaraguan democratic opposition, accompanied by a cease-fire, leading to regularly scheduled free and fair elections and the establishment of democratic institutions; or

(2) the Congress enacts under section 10 a joint resolution disapproving the provision of assistance under this joint resolution (other than the assistance provided for in subsection (b)(1)).

(f)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this joint resolution, on or after July 28, 1986, funds may be obligated or expended for assistance under this joint resolution for a Nicaraguan democratic resistance group only if the President determines and reports to the Congress that—

(A) that group has agreed upon a program of principles and objectives directed toward the attainment of democracy in Nicaragua, such program to include a plan to provide a significant measure of autonomy for Nicaraguan Indians;

(B) that group has instituted full and adequate human rights-related training programs;

(C) that group has removed from its ranks all persons responsible for past human rights abuses in Nicaragua;

(D) that group has established procedures to ensure severe punishment of any person within that group who commits human rights abuses in the future; and

(E) in the case of the groups currently within the United Nicaraguan Opposition (UNO), the United Nicaraguan Opposition has been restructured to allow complete and balanced representation of all democratic opposition forces within that organization and to ensure full subordination of military commanders to the political leadership.

(2) In making his determination under subparagraph (E) of paragraph (1), the President shall take into account the effectiveness and legitimacy of the political leadership of the United Nicaraguan Opposition, including the ability of that political leadership—

(A) to reflect the views and objectives of the internal and external Nicaraguan democratic opposition;

(B) to function as the spokesman for the Nicaraguan democratic opposition with Central Americans, international organizations, and the United States Government; and

(C) to represent the Nicaraguan democratic opposition in dealing with the Government of Nicaragua.

(12) Strike out subsection (a) of section 10 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(a)(1) A joint resolution described in subsection (c)(2) of section 9 shall be one without a preamble, the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: "That pursuant to section 9(c) of the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985', the Congress approves the provision of assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance pursuant that joint resolution without regard to the restriction in section 9(b)(3).".

(2) A joint resolution described in subsection (e)(2) of section 9 shall be one without a preamble, the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: "That pursuant to section 9(e) of the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985', the Congress disapproves the provision of any assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance pursuant to that joint resolution, other than the assistance provided for in section 9(b)(1).".

(13) In section 10(b), strike out ", (a)(2), or (a)(3)" and insert in lieu thereof "or (a)(2)"; and in paragraph (1), strike out ", subsection (a)(2), or subsection (a)(3)" and insert in lieu thereof "or subsection (a)(2)".

(14) In section 11(b)(1), insert "representatives of" before "all elements".

(15) Strike out paragraph (2) of section 11(e) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(2) not later than July 21, 1986, the Commission shall prepare and transmit to the Congress a report on whether the Nicaraguan democratic resistance groups receiving assistance under this joint resolution have implemented the measures described in section 9(f)(1) and, with respect to the United Nicaraguan Opposition, an evaluation of the factors described in section 9(f)(2).

(16) In paragraph (1) of section 12, insert "representatives of" before "the Nicaraguan democratic resistance".

(16) At the end of the amendment, add the following:

PLAN FOR ASSISTANCE TO CENTRAL AMERICA

SEC. 14. The Secretary of State, the Administrator of the Agency for International Development, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, shall—

(1) develop a plan for fully funding the assistance to the Central American democracies (Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras) proposed in the January 1984 report of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America; and

(2) provide a report describing this plan to the President and the Congress no later than May 31, 1986.

By Mr. MRAZEK:

Text of S.J. Res. 283.

—At the end of section 4, add the following:

(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of this joint resolution, no member of the United States Armed Forces who is on active duty or is performing inactive duty training, and, no employee of any department, agency, or other component of the United States Government, may participate, in Honduras, Costa Rica, or El Salvador, in the provision of any assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance pursuant to this joint resolution, except for the assistance described in paragraphs (1) and (3) of section 9(b).

—At the end of section 4, add the following:

(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of this joint resolution, no member of the United States Armed Forces who is on active duty or is performing inactive duty training, and, no employee of any department, agency, or other component of the United States Government, may participate, in Honduras, Costa Rica, or El Salvador, in the provision of any assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance pursuant to this joint resolution, except for the assistance described in subparagraphs (A) and (C) of section 9(b)(1).

SENATE—Monday, April 14, 1986

(Legislative day of Tuesday, April 8, 1986)

The Senate met at 12 noon, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Not everyone that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven.—Matthew 7:21.

Patient Father in Heaven, we thank You that our forebears took You seriously, however, they may have differed as to religious institutions. The Bible informed their lives and convictions out of which came a great republic. Forgive us, Lord, when we ignore You and the Bible as irrelevant. Help us see that the problem is not with those who deny that God exists, but with those who profess faith in God and behave as though He is nonexistent. Grant, Faithful God, that our lives will measure up to our profession. Forbid that we should forsake the faith of our fathers. Restore us in faith and life to Your glory and praise. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The able majority leader, Senator DOLE, is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each, to be followed by special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes each: Senator HAWKINS, whose statement will be read by the distinguished Presiding Officer, Senator THURMOND; Senator PROXMIRE; Senator WEICKER; and Senator CRANSTON.

Following the execution of the special orders, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

Hopefully, at that point or shortly thereafter, we can take up S. 1236, technical amendments to the crime bill. I understand there is an agreement that we can handle that without a rollcall vote.

Then, at some time in the afternoon I would attempt to proceed to S. 1774, the Hobbs Act and possibly file a cloture motion, on which the vote will occur on Wednesday.

It is also my hope that we can clear the joint resolution on farm credit offered by myself and other Senators, about 38 of us, so far as I know. They are pretty equally divided between Republicans and Democrats as a bipartisan issue. It is my hope that we can pass that early this week.

I hope to be able to advise the distinguished minority leader later today or the first thing tomorrow morning as to what the plans will be for the entire week so that that information will be available for our policy luncheons tomorrow.

Mr. President, I do not expect a late day today, and I do not expect any rollcall votes today.

On tomorrow, if there is an amendment or something offered by Senator HART concerning the hydro-relicensing bill, that will come at 3 o'clock. From 10 o'clock until noon, as I recall, if, in fact, Senator MELCHER has an amendment or amendments, I hope we can dispose of those amendments by voice vote. In any event, if there are rollcall votes, they will follow the vote on the Hart substitute if, in fact, there is a vote, which will be followed by final passage.

Hopefully, Mr. President, we can dispose of the hydro-relicensing bill fairly early on tomorrow.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EAST). The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, while the distinguished majority leader is on the floor, is he in a position to tell the Members of the Senate when we might expect the budget resolution to be brought up? I believe it was reported by the committee to the Senate 22 days ago, as I recall. How soon may we expect to have the budget resolution before the Senate?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would only say to the distinguished minority leader I will be meeting this afternoon with Don Regan, the President's Chief of Staff, as well as with Jim Miller, the OMB Director.

Mr. President, the problem with the budget as reported is it is not a very good budget. It contains a lot of new taxes and cuts defense spending but it does not cut domestic spending sufficiently. While I understand it is bipartisan, it has not been well received on this side of the aisle by about half of my colleagues. I would hope that, as I have indicated before, when we do bring it up, there will be an appropriate substitute that can be adopted by a bipartisan majority that will put back some of the defense cuts, reduce the revenue figures, and try to do more on the domestic spending side.

I may be in a position later today or tomorrow to advise the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader refers to the budget as not a very good budget. From what I have heard in talking with several members of the Budget Committee, they think it is a good budget, a moderate budget, a fair budget. It was reported out on a bipartisan basis, I believe with seven Republicans and six Democrats voting to report it.

If it is not a good budget, if it needs fixing, if it has some flaws, why not bring it up on the floor and let the light of public scrutiny and scrutiny by our colleagues develop ways, if there be such, to improve it?

I may want to offer an amendment myself, or others may want to offer amendments. With 50 hours of debate on the budget, it would seem to me that would be ample time to discover any flaws in it and to improve it, if necessary.

Of course, I am sure the distinguished majority leader is probably under some pressure from the White House to try to develop a substitute. That may or may not be the case. I am in no position to say. But it seems to me, with this being the greatest deliberative body in the world, we should be able to deliberate on this budget and improve it. If the White House has some problems with it, so be it. Maybe they can be corrected on the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, I yield.

Mr. DOLE. I want the record to reflect that we have actually had the budget on the Calendar, I think, for about 6 legislative days. We had a recess for a day in that period. Also, I want to reemphasize my hope that we will have some action on the House side. I understand there are a lot of politics in the budget. We are not waiting for the White House solution because I doubt that will come, to be very frank and candid with the distinguished minority leader. My view is that they do not see any real urgency with the budget.

There is some rumor that they may try to do it through the appropriations process, that they may be better off going that route. You would not have the revenue problem.

The budget is important, and I believe in the budget process, and I believe we have to preserve it and should make every effort to do so.

At the same time, I am certainly willing to admit that some of my friends are for it and some of my friends are against it, and I want to be with my friends. That is sort of a position I find myself in at this point.

It is my hope that not only can we discuss the budget with the White House, but also, if they are not willing to negotiate, as I understand they are not, based on the written reports I have read, public reports, then I think the best course to follow would be to bring it up and let the Senate work its will. I would certainly have amendments. The minority leader might have amendments.

I would also urge the House to come to the party. They also have a responsibility. We are both going to miss the deadline, which is tomorrow. But I hope, as we suggested to the Speaker in the letter, we might sort of march in lockstep on the budget issue. I have not yet had a response to that inquiry.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

With respect to House action, it seems to me that it is wholly irrelevant, as to when the House acts. I cannot understand why we should wait on the House to act. As I understand it, the House has not even reported the budget from the Committee. But that is wholly irrelevant.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished minority and the distinguished majority leader that this is a matter, in my judgment, on which the Senate should act. We had a resolution that we voted on, that we need to vote on this matter before we take up the tax bill.

In the judgment of this Senator, facing the enormous deficits we do face, we ought to reduce spending wherever we can. Having reduced spending as much as we can, we then ought to look at the revenue side and help reduce the deficit by reaching the revenue side as well.

I am familiar with the point of view of the White House—the President, at least—about no taxes. But although the President has consistently taken that attitude about taxes, he has bent to go along with ROBERT DOLE's bill which reduced the deficit, and he did yield a peg to go along on a 5-cent tax on gasoline, and he did go along with an increased Social Security tax to meet the problems of this sort, and he went along with the deficit reduction package in which many of us joined, in a bipartisan fashion, to pass and to help reduce this enormous deficit.

No matter what the President wants to do about the matter, we have a responsibility ourselves. What is the purpose of this budget process if it is not to try to get Congress to join forces and meet a very serious problem?

The budget committee could meet—and that is not on a Presidential recommendation and a bill signed by the President. They meet on the President's suggestions and recommend responsibility, or they are supposed to recommend responsibility, on this overwhelming problem.

If this matter can sit around and languish and wait until after the tax bill has been dealt with in the Senate, that is to convey a veto in advance, in effect, an irrevocable veto; because the chances are that we will not have an opportunity to send a big enough horse to carry that rider to the White House if we think taxes should be part of the answer to the problem.

So far as I am concerned, I want to do what is best for the country. I do not see how we can do it if we are going to continue to stall and put off action on this budget. There is no way I see that we can do the responsible job.

Mr. BYRD. Or the other body.

Mr. LONG. Or the other body.

Mr. BYRD. The Budget Act itself does not say anything about both Houses having to act concurrently. The act sets April 15 as the date when both Houses should have completed their work, conference and all, and here we are with the April 15 deadline tomorrow.

The measure has been reported by the Senate Budget Committee for several days. It has not been reported by the House committee. But it is irrelevant as to when the House acts. We have our own responsibility here. We have 50 days, and it seems to me that we should be moving ahead. I think we have to get down to the serious work that our constituents send us here to do.

Mr. LONG. I want to say, further, that although it was not my privilege to vote on who the majority leader would be, if I had been privy to vote, I would have voted for Mr. DOLE to be majority leader. So far as I am concerned, he was my candidate. Obviously, the Republicans were not going to let the Democrats agree as to who the majority leader should be. I was disposed to vote for Mr. BYRD to be the minority leader.

Mr. DOLE was my majority leader, even though I could not vote for him. He was the best man, I thought, for the job; and I am pleased that the Republicans chose Mr. DOLE to be their leader.

Mr. President, I want the majority leader to be our leader. I want him to represent us, rather than represent the President of the United States. I know how the White House works. I was in the leadership at one time, and I know that the White House would like our leader to be the President's messenger up here. BOB DOLE is not made of that kind of stuff. But from time to time I think we need to be reminded that he is supposed to be working for us. The President does not pay his salary.

Mr. BYRD. That is right—he is our leader. He is the Senate's man, not the President's man.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I once read a little book that inspired me for the rest of my life. It had one little passage in it that said there are two ways you can look at a problem. One, you could say, "Many are slaves because one is a tyrant. Let us hate the tyrant." Or, you could look at it another way and you could say, "One is a tyrant because many are slaves. Let us hate the slaves." I prefer to look at it that way, Mr. President.

It seems to me that the President has his responsibility and we have our responsibility.

We have no right to say that we would have done what is good for the country except that the President would not let us do it. We should do our duty in answer to our own conscience and let the President do what he wants. If he wants to veto, let him veto. At least we can say we did what we thought was right.

I have found, in serving in this body, that it is easy enough to vote for what the people in one State want. I believe that sometimes you can get away with voting contrary to what they want, if you convince them that you thought it was right, even though they did not. But what it is difficult to convince your people about is that you did it not because of what you thought was right or what they thought was right, but what somebody else thought was right, contrary to your judgment and contrary to the judgment of those you represent in this body.

I hope Senators will be Senators and take that attitude. If the President does not want to go along, fine. I still want to vote for what this Senator thinks is right, and have the privilege of doing so.

This Senator feels that if the budget process is not going to be permitted to work, we should get rid of it.

We should bring the matter up here and vote the committee up or down. I might differ with the committee in some parts; that is the way the process is supposed to work. Bring it out here and vote. I would like to support the Budget Committee in trying to reduce the deficit and see what happens. I hope the leadership on both sides of the aisle will help to bring that about, because as far as this Senator is concerned I am not running for reelection. I told everybody I am not going to run. So during the time remaining to this Senator, I can afford to vote for whatever I think is good for the country, without fear of consequences, you might say, except just to answer to my own conscience. I would like to vote for what is best for the country.

Mr. DOMENICI, for example, has provided courageous leadership on that committee and I believe Mr. CHILES and others have made it bipartisan. I would like very much to support them in their effort to make this budget thing work, because if it does not work we should get rid of it. The Senate should not be fiddling and faddling with a budget wasting all this time if we are not going to give the support that it takes to make that program work.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Louisiana and I thank the distinguished majority leader.

FBI SPECIAL AGENT JERRY DOVE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the town of Dunbar, WV, mourns today. It has lost one of its finest and bravest sons, FBI Special Agent Jerry Dove, who was killed last Friday in a hail of gunfire in Miami, FL.

Special Agent Dove was loved and respected by everyone who knew him. He was the type of man of whom this Nation can be most proud, who every parent wants for a son, and every decent, law-abiding citizen wants in the front line of defense against crime.

According to those who knew him, for as long as they can remember, Jerry Dove seemed to have one ambition—one dream—in life: to be an agent for the Federal Bureau of Investigation. After graduating from West Virginia University Law School in 1981 and serving as an assistant attorney general for the State of West Virginia for a year, he fulfilled that dream. During his visits to his hometown after becoming an agent, Special Agent Dove constantly told his friends of how he enjoyed and cherished every moment he was with the greatest law enforcement organization in the world.

Gunned down in the prime of his life, Special Agent Jerry Dove did not die in vain. He was performing his duty for the agency he held dear and performing his duty to his fellow man. He died protecting the innocent and pursuing those who would do them harm. He died fighting to push back that ever present web of evil that constantly threatens to encircle and engulf the free and honest people of this great country.

The death of this young and dedicated servant of the people is a reminder of how fragile life is. And it is a reminder of how people in law enforcement put their lives in jeopardy every day to safeguard society. How often we read about the excesses of a few people in law enforcement, while we take for granted the work of the vast majority of these courageous men and women until we read or hear of tragic events like that which took place last Friday in Miami.

To the people of Dunbar, especially the family and friends of Special Agent Dove, I say that while you mourn, you can be comforted with the knowledge that the young man you loved and respected is now in the embrace of an all-loving God.

To his mother, Patricia "Bobby" Dove, my wife Erma and I extend our most heartfelt condolences. I feel that I can speak for every Member of the U.S. Senate in saying that we thank you for your son and that we share your grief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from South Carolina will be recognized to speak for the Senator from Florida.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, will my good friend from South Carolina yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield to the Senator.

PROPOSED SWAP

Mr. WEICKER. I was privileged to be here on the floor as I heard the comments of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana. I say this: If he would like to participate in the Republican caucus I am sure the Republicans would be glad to swap WEICKER for LONG on an even enough basis.

Mr. THURMOND. I join in that, inviting him to come over on this side where he should have been all the time.

SENATOR HAWKINS' SPECIAL ORDER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. On behalf of Mrs. HAWKINS, I wish to present a statement.

It is entitled, "How Slow Spin the Wheels of Mexican Justice."

HOW SLOW SPIN THE WHEELS OF MEXICAN JUSTICE

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, it is true that we spend a great deal of time and effort pressuring poor countries to control narcotics trafficking. It is a fact that there would be no trafficking in the first place without the enormous demand in the United States and other affluent nations for cocaine and other illegal drugs. One hand washes the other. The cocaine trail leads from the jungles of Peru, to the lairs of unconscionable smugglers in Mexico and Colombia, through the sheltered waters off Fidel Castro's Cuba, and to the pathetic victims on the streets of New York, Washington, Miami, and other major cities of the United States. It's a mean, vicious trail of subterfuge, corruption, and terrorism, leaving in its backwash twisted minds, wrecked bodies, broken homes, and economic disruption.

Many countries pay lip service to the international effort to curb drug trafficking. Mexico and opium are a case in point. Mexican opium production in 1983 amounted to an estimated 17 metric tons. This year, production will range somewhere between 21 and 45 metric tons. Does that sound as if Mexico is making a concerted effort to reduce drug trafficking? In contrast, other major opium producers managed to achieve cutbacks. Production in Iran during the same three year period was cut in half. Other significant reductions were made by Pakistan, Iran, and Afghanistan. Marijuana shipments to the U.S. from Mexico grow. At the same time, Mexican eradication efforts falter. Marijuana eradication during the first six months of 1985 were 30 percent lower than for the first half of the previous year. One-third of all illegal heroin consumed in the U.S. originates in Mexico and another third passes through Mexico enroute to the U.S. Purity levels of Mexican heroin continue to rise while prices drop. The classic law of supply and demand holds forth—the larger the supply available, the lower the price.

Despite Mexico's role as a major producer and transit country of cocaine and heroin, local demand is slight. The drugs are made for export and I do not need to remind you who the number one customer is. Mexicans appear to prefer smoking marijuana and sniffing glue over "coke" and "horse."

The Mexican legal system poses a dismal picture when applied to drugs. The penal code is based on the Napoleonic tradition. Laws relating to narcotics generally are viewed as adequate, but enforcement is another thing altogether. The enforcement process is slow, cumbersome, and mired down in corruption at all levels. The lack of a computerized records system, or a centralized depository of criminal records that can be accessed by telephone, is a monumental handicap. Given the corruption level, there may be highly placed officials who do not want Mexico's legal record system to be state-of-the-art. It could be too efficient. Were it not for drug-financed corruption, the prison escape of Jose Contreras-Subias, a key figure in the Rafael Caro Quintero trafficking ring, could not have been engineered. Caro Quintero, you may recall, was indicted April 8, 1985 in connection with the brutal kidnap-torture-murder of DEA agent Enrique Camarena Salazar. He has yet to be tried. I think even Napoleon would raise his eyebrows over how the legal code that bears his name has been applied in the Camarena case. It's a textbook case of judicial foot-dragging. It has now been one year and six days since Caro Quintero was indicted. How slow spin the wheels of Mexican justice.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

THE UNITED STATES CAN NEGOTIATE ARMS CONTROL FROM STRENGTH RIGHT NOW

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, recently, President Reagan contended that this country must continue its feverish buildup of our military forces because the Soviet Union has a big military advantage over this country. He cited the vast superiority in Soviet tanks. He called attention to the much greater number of Soviet artillery pieces. He could have added the advantage the Soviets have in the number of troops, the number of ships, and even the number of planes. The President's facts were generally accurate. His implication that the Soviets have a stronger military force is wrong.

How does the Soviet military capability compare to America's military strength? Could the Soviets at will initiate a successful attack on the vital security interests of our country in Europe or in Asia or even directly against the United States itself? If so, what is the President recommending that this Congress do to respond to the Soviet military advantages that the President has highlighted? Does the President recommend that this country increase the number of our tanks to overcome the Soviet advantage? No. Does President Reagan ask this country to acquire the great number of artillery pieces necessary to put us on an equal plane with the Soviet Union in that respect? No. Does he call for an expansion of the number of troops in our armed services, so we can have the 5.7 million men under arms that the Soviet Union has? No. Does the President want us to step up the already accelerated production of ships? No. How about the increase in planes? Does the President call for this? No.

So why is the President making such a stir about the fact that the Soviets have such a massive advantage in so many military forces if he doesn't believe that Soviet advantage is significant enough for this country to overcome it? If the President could develop the case for this country matching the Soviets tank for tank, gun for gun, ship for ship, man for man, this country could do it, and Congress would appropriate whatever funds were necessary for the tanks, artillery, troops, ships, and planes. Our economy is twice as big as the Soviet's economy. The NATO economy is three times bigger than the Warsaw Pact economy. With far less effort than the Russians are making, we could easily match and surpass the Soviets militarily. So why doesn't the President call on us to do it?

The answer is that neither the United States nor the North Atlantic Treaty alliance needs to build up our military force in any of the specific areas the President has cited. The President knows that. That is why he has made no effort to ask for the tanks and artillery and planes and ships necessary to match the Soviets.

Is the President wrong in failing to call on the Congress to build up this country's capability in the military hardware where the Soviets have such a compelling advantage? No. The President is right, absolutely right. This country and its NATO allies have a devastating antitank capability. We have antitank guns mounted on mobile land carriers, antitank guns mounted on fast moving helicopters, antitank guns mounted on even faster planes. The Soviets have more combat aircraft. But they know that in conflicts between United States and Soviet aircraft in the Middle East, United States aircraft have prevailed and prevailed overwhelmingly.

How about the Soviet artillery advantage? Soviet and Warsaw Pact artillery is even more vulnerable to superior NATO land and air attack than Soviet tanks. How about the superior number of Soviet warships? Mr. President, numbers mean little. It means comparing Soviet patrol boats with United States cruisers. The real measure of naval strength is in naval firepower. How do the superpowers compare? There is no question that the United States has a huge advantage in naval firepower compared to the Soviet Union. When we compare NATO to the Warsaw Pact, the advantage becomes even greater. And in the combined power of air and sea forces represented by aircraft carriers, the advantage lies resoundingly with the United States over the Soviet Union. The United States has 15 aircraft carrier task forces. The Soviet Union as a couple of small helicopter carriers and one or two full-size aircraft carriers under construction.

Now consider the key element in military power in this nuclear world. Both superpowers have approximately the same number of nuclear warheads. The Soviets have the greater megatonnage and throw-weight. But the United States enjoys the crucial advantage. The U.S. nuclear deterrent is deployed in a far more survivable mode. Seventy percent of the Soviet nuclear deterrent is based in the most vulnerable kind of site, on stationary, land-based launchers—sitting ducks. Only about 25 percent is based on submarines and a mere 5 percent is deployed on bombers. Compare that with the far less vulnerable U.S. deterrent. Only 25 percent of the U.S. nuclear deterrent is stationary, land-based. A whopping 50 percent moves in mobile submarines, which the Secretary of the Navy has rightly described as virtually invulnerable. Twenty five percent—five times more U.S. nuclear weapons power—is deployed in bombers.

It may well be that in the nuclear age, military superiority between the superpowers is irrelevant because neither country could utterly destroy the other even after suffering a preemptive attack from its adversary. Both President Reagan and Secretary Gorbachev have said that a nuclear war must never be fought and can never be won. A war between the United States and the Soviet Union would very likely become a nuclear war. This is why the survivability of the nuclear deterrent is so absolutely critical. It is why the United States far less vulnerable deterrent gives our country the decisive military advantage. It is also why the President has not asked the Congress to match the Soviet Union in the numbers of conventional armament. And it is why the Reagan comparison of tanks and artillery pieces is so totally irrelevant.

Mr. President, this country does not need a major increase in military spending. The Congress should insist on using our superior economy and technology to maintain the kind of military quality advantage we hold over the Soviet Union, and we should use our great military strength now to negotiate arms control agreements that would stabilize the military deterrent of both superpowers and ease the immense economic burden that the arms race imposes on both countries.

THE GRIM TRUTH ABOUT THE ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

Mr. PROXMIRE. The American economy is weak. It is not strong. How can I say this when the stock market has been breaking one record after another? How can I say this when inflation has moderated to a level that has not been seen for 20 years? How can I say this when interest rates have been going down, down, down? Here is why: Here we have been rolling along in the 5th consecutive year of triple digit deficits. At this very moment the annual rate of the Federal Government deficit during the first 6 months of the current fiscal year that will end next September 30 exceeds $200 billion. With this kind of super stimulative deficit, of course, the American economy has been growing. It is being force fed. Our fiscal policy is not just stimulative. It is wildly, irresponsible stimulative.

How about monetary policy? For more than a year an extraordinarily expansive monetary policy has pushed the American economy along. In the past 12 months the money supply has rocketed ahead at an astonishing rate of a 12-percent increase. Inflation putters along at less than a third of the rate of increase in the supply of credit. So here we have the super combo: All out truly reckless fiscal policy pushing the economy, plus a virtual explosion in the money supply. In nearly 30 years in this body this Senator cannot recall a time when fiscal and monetary policy have been so spectacularly expansive. And yet interest rates are falling. Why? Can anyone wonder why interest rates are down? The supply of credit is breaking all records for abundance. But that is only half of the reason. The other half is that the demand for credit is pitifully weak. In the past quarter of calendar 1985 the economy grew at the anemic rate of 0.7 percent. That means it was stumbling, staggering, crawling.

And why is inflation behaving so well in spite of this runaway fiscal policy and explosive monetary policy? Several reasons. But there is one simple and widely neglected answer. Inflation has been staying down not because of the free fall in oil prices. That has helped, but it has not been fundamental. Inflation has stayed down not because farm prices have fallen through the floor and taken tens of thousands of farmers down the heartbreaking road to bankruptcy in the process. The consequent low food prices have been marginally helpful to keeping inflation under control, but they have not been the prime factor. So what has caused inflation to behave so well? Answer: The same force that has kept interest rates down—the feebleness of the economy. What has always been the major reason prices rise? The major cause of inflation has been wage increases that exceed productivity improvements. Productivity has been wretched in our economy lately. So wage costs might be expected to rise and take prices up with them. Why hasn't that happened? Because this country still has more than 7 percent of its work force—an enormous 8 million plus Americans—out of work. Unemployment has hit specially hard in those industries that are heavily unionized. With union workers weakened by low demand in the manufacturing industries, the unions cannot lead the way. The huge pools of unemployed persons prevents nonunion wages from rising much in any major industry.

If the economy is weak now, what is the outlook? It is poor. First, there is little pent-up demand. Housing sales have been fairly high in recent years. They appear to be coming down in spite of the decisive fall in interest rates. The other major consumer purchases—automobiles—also shows no big potential. The last few years have been fairly big ones for the auto industry. There seems little demand in sight for new cars. And meanwhile the savings rate of the American people hit an all-time low last year. The consumers' reserves are running on empty. Suppose the American consumer returns to the 5 percent to 6 percent of income saved in the next couple of years. What does that mean? That means American consumers spend less. So sales and production and jobs fall. In fact, they will go through the floor. Corporations too are far more likely to save than to invest in new plant or equipment. They have just broken all records for debt. Like American consumers, American business is in very fragile shape. Many corporations are too near to survive a major recession. With equity razor thin, a year or 2 of losses would make many American firms insolvent.

This brings us to the most serious threat to economic recovery—the sudden, sharp shift in Federal deficits from the present $200 billion level down to zero in the next 4½ years. This Senator will do everything in his power to support those reductions. But let's face it. These reductions will contribute to a prolonged and deep recession. Then why will I fight for them? Because the alternative is worse, much worse. The alternative simply postpones the evil day. The alternative would give the country not just continued $200 billion deficits but $300 billion and $400 billion dollar deficits. The alternative will give us a national debt that will literally require most of our Federal revenues just to service the national debt that is for interest payments. And, of course, whenever we try to come off a $400 billion deficit and move toward a budget balance, the recession and unemployment will be far worse.

Mr. President, this country does not face happy times. It faces grim, tough, painful recession times. If we are to save this greatest economy in world history, we must recognize that cruel fact fully and squarely. We must take the painful budget cutting and tax increasing steps to meet it. And we must do it now.

MYTH OF THE DAY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, there is a line in Isaiah (30:7) that "In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength." And that quote is something we should keep in mind whenever we think about star wars.

Confidence is a wonderful thing. It implies a whole world of faith and trust in our ability to succeed. You can see that strength of confidence in athletes who are sure they can sink the next putt, or hit a homerun, or a violinist who faultlessly plays a Bach partita.

But how about confidence in the things we build, like automobiles or airplanes? Or how about the things we are thinking of building, like the star wars missile defense system?

We are pretty confident that our cars and planes will operate as they are supposed to. Every once in a while, however, something shakes up our confidence in these mechanical devices. Witness the tragic explosion of the space shuttle Challenger, or a plane that inexplicably crashes.

Now, you might ask why am I so concerned about this? Simply this: Take star wars or SDI. How much trust can you have in something so monumentally complicated that human brains cannot begin to comprehend the mathematics involved? Something so complex that in laboratories across the country our best scientific minds are searching for answers to its most basic questions? Something so complex that research costs alone, according to the fiscal 1987 budget, is $4.9 billion. By the way, that is 75 percent above the $2.75 billion Congress appropriated in 1986. Star wars is something so complicated that no one, I repeat no one, has any idea what its final cost would be.

Mr. President, the myth of the day is that we can ever have confidence in a star wars defense system.

SDI advocates would have us believe that in the quietness of outer space, an SDI system faithfully could warn us of any impending attack, flawlessly track thousands of nuclear warheads and decoys and then swiftly destroy the threat.

President Reagan's notion of making nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete is wonderful. What brighter hope for mankind could we have than ridding the world of nuclear weapons? But what a wrong way to go about it. Why do I say this?

Here is why: the computer softwear, the programming instructions that control the entire system, is flawed.

Are computers important to star wars? You bet they are. Without computers to digest the incredible amounts of raw information that would pour in during an attack, nothing could be done. No human mind is up to this task. The simple, distressing fact is that we could spend hundreds of billions of dollars on star wars and end up with the space age equivalent of an Edsel. I am sure all the battle stations and satellites would look impressive whizzing around in space, yet without functioning computer softwear, star wars could not destroy a fly, let alone a swarm of attacking missiles.

So what is the flaw with the computer softwear? It is this: we can never make a realistic test of the system. Oh, sure, we could run test after computer test of star wars, and computers could spit electrons back and forth to simulate an enemy attack. But the key fact is that the tests would never tell us if a star wars system would really work if we needed it. Star wars would have to work perfectly the first time. There can be no margin for error. Less than perfect means lost cities and millions killed as missiles escape a defective star wars.

We have to come back to this basic point, Mr. President. Can we have confidence in star wars? Could we place the security of our country in something so fatally flawed? I think not.

TRIBUTE TO IRVINE H. SPRAGUE FORMER CHAIRMAN AND DIRECTOR OF THE FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I rise to pay tribute to a good friend and a long-time public servant who is just now entering retirement after 29 years of service with the Federal Government.

I have known Irvine H. Sprague almost since he came to Washington with Congressman John McFall of California in 1957, the same year that I arrived. I became better acquainted with him in the late 1960's when he was at the White House working as an assistant to President Lyndon Johnson. And I got to know Irv very well after he was appointed by President Johnson to his first term on the board of directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Irv was appointed to a second term at the FDIC, this time as chairman, in 1979 by President Carter, thus becoming the only director in history to be appointed by two Presidents. Overall, Irv served 11½ years on the FDIC board, the second longest tenure in the agency's history. He was on the board during some of the most difficult and challenging times in the history of our banking industry.

During his long career in public service, Irv also worked for Speaker TIP O'NEILL as executive director of the House Steering and Policy Committee, and earlier he was California Deputy Director of Finance under Gov. Pat Brown. Prior to that, he was a California newspaperman.

Now that he is retired, Irv is reverting to old habits. He has announced that the first thing he will do is write a book about his experiences at the FDIC.

On the legislative side, Irv was always interested, both at the White House and a chairman and director of the FDIC, in helping Congress pass laws which he felt would benefit the nation. Foremost among those is the extraordinary interstate acquisition law for large troubled banks, the very measure which has had to come to Congress for renewal this month.

Irv has led a very active, interesting and accomplishment-filled life during this wide-ranging public career. I wish him a long, active and just as fulfilling retirement.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR WEICKER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

S. 2294—HANDICAPPED EDUCATION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise today on behalf of myself and Mr. KERRY, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. STAFFORD, to introduce legislation to amend and extend for 3 years programs authorized under the Education of the Handicapped Act.

Ten years after enactment of Public Law 94-142, we can be proud of the great strides we have made in meeting the mandate of that law: That all handicapped children be provided a free, appropriate public education in the least restrictive environment. Last year, over 4.1 million handicapped students received educational services as a result of this landmark legislation, and 93 percent of those were educated in our public schools.

We are all aware of the tremendous impact this legislation has had on the lives to children with handicaps. The doors of our Nation's schools are now open to all these youngsters, no matter how severe their disability. No longer do school districts have the freedom to legally abdicate their responsibility to educate handicapped children. No longer are the parents left helplessly on the sidelines while others decide on an educational strategy for their handicapped child. Today, parents and educators work together to develop individualized programs for these children.

What was once an idealistic concept—that we should be "mainstreaming" handicapped children into the public schools with their nonhandicapped peers—is now a reality. And it works. Everybody wins: The handicapped child who benefits socially, emotionally and intellectually from a normal environment, as well as the so-called normal child whose life is enriched by his association with children with handicaps.

The legislation I am introducing today will strengthen our national commitment to special education programs. It contains a major new initiative in the area of early intervention services for handicapped children. This new initiative is actually comprised of two sections. The first will create a new State grant program, authorized at $100 million in fiscal year 1987, to enhance services for handicapped children from birth through age 2. States wishing to apply for funds under this new grant authority will have to meet several requirements. These requirements include the development of an overall plan of service and establishment of a service delivery system for all eligible children within 2 years. This new service delivery system will be interagency in nature and the Governor of the State will designate a lead agency to administer the program. In addition, the due process protections established under Public Law 94-142 will be applicable to this new grant authority, as well.

States wishing to participate in the early intervention grant program must conduct a multidisclipinary assessment of each eligible handicapped child and develop an individualized program describing the necessary education, health and social services for that child. Appropriate support for the child's transition to school must also be provided. All of these services will be available at no cost to the parent, as are all other programs currently authorized under this act.

The need for these early intervention services cannot be denied. The State of the art is such that there is no excuse for waiting until a handicapped child reaches the age of 3 to begin to assist that child reach his maximum potential. In fact, the 1985 report to Congress of the Department of Education states: "studies of the effectiveness of preschool education for the handicapped have demonstrated beyond doubt the economic and educational benefits of programs for young handicapped children. In addition, the studies have shown that the earlier intervention is started, the greater is the ultimate dollar savings and the higher is the rate of educational attainment by these handicapped children." Yet the administration requests no legislative changes in the Education of the Handicapped Act to follow through on these findings. Instead, it supports only a simple extension of the existing programs and requests less than the 1985 levels of funding.

The second part of this initiative will be to mandate services to all handicapped children between the ages of 3 and 5 under Public Law 94-142. Although that law does mandate educational services to all handicapped children between 3 and 21, there is a large loophole. States whose laws do not require the provision of special educational services to those in the 3-5 age group are exempt from this aspect of the Federal mandate. As a result, although most States are providing some services to some eligible youngsters, approximately 239,000 children are still being deprived of these essential educational services. This new requirement will ensure that no person in this age group is denied the services that will assist them to reach their maximum potential. The estimated cost to the Federal Government of this requirement is $100 million, for a total of $200 million for both parts of the early intervention initiative.

This week, during Senate consideration of the budget resolution, I will be offering an amendment to add $600 million for handicapped education programs. These funds will cover the roughly $200 million necessary for the early intervention initiative I described earlier, and $400 million to modestly increase the Federal Government's share of the cost of educating our handicapped children. In 1986, the Federal Government's contribution to the cost of special education was only 9 percent of the average per pupil expenditure—although the law envisions a 40-percent Federal share—and in 1987 the administration wants to reduce that commitment even further, to a paltry 7 percent. My amendment would bring up the Federal share to 12 percent of the total cost, a level reached only once before, in fiscal 1979.

In general, this reauthorization bill provides that discretionary programs under the Education of the Handicapped Act continue in their present form, and receive inflationary increases above the fiscal year 1986 appropriated level to maintain current services. There are a few exceptions, however.

Increases of 10 percent are provided for two areas where there are critical needs: personnel preparation and transitional services. During recent hearings of the Subcommittee on the Handicapped, we were presented with startling data documenting critical nationwide shortages of qualified special education professionals. One recent national survey found all but four States reported that the current supply of new graduates was not sufficient to meet the demand, and it is no secret that the educational services for handicapped children are meaningless without qualified teachers and specialists to deliver these services. In fact, special education experts now estimate that we will need over 100,000 new special education teachers by 1990.

For all of us, the transition from school to adult life is one of the most critical and challenging periods in our lives. It is even more so for those individuals with handicaps. As a result, we authorized in the 1983 Handicapped Education Amendments a pilot program to develop model secondary and transition programs to assist handicapped youth and their families face this challenge. Such demonstration programs have been funded around the country and have made a significant difference in facilitating the transition of handicapped students to the community. But again, the need is greater than the services available. Therefore, I am convinced that we need to continue and expand these model programs if we ever hope to reverse the grim unemployment statistics given to us by a recent Lou Harris poll: Two-thirds of handicapped adults are currently unemployed, and of those individuals, two-thirds of them want to work.

This Nation has moved quickly along the learning curve since pioneers like Senator Robert Stafford and then-Congressman, now Senator PAUL SIMON first wrote Public Law 94-142. Today, armed with 10 years of experience, we seek to build upon their work, expanding both education and equity.

This legislation represents an important step forward in fulfilling a Federal commitment to those most vulnerable in our society, who require our special care. It is the right thing to do, in both human and economic terms. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2294

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Education of the Handicapped Amendments of 1986".

ALLOCATIONS

SEC. 2. (a) AGE CATEGORY LIMITATION REVISION.—Section 611(a)(5)(A)(i) of the Education of the Handicapped Act (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Act") is amended by inserting before the semicolon, a comma and the following: "except that the age category for the number of all children subject to the per centum limitation under this clause shall, in the case of a State which actually provides free appropriate public education for a different age category, be the age category which the State actually serves".

(b) SUPPORT SERVICES.—Section 611(b)(2)(B) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(B) the remainder shall be used by such State to provide support services and direct services, in accordance with the priorities established under section 612(3), and for the administrative costs of monitoring and complaint investigation, but only to the extent that such costs exceed the costs of administration incurred during fiscal year 1985.".

ELIGIBILITY

SEC. 3. (a) GENERAL RULE.—Section 612(2)(B) of the Act is amended by striking out "aged three to five and".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) of this section shall take effect two years after the date of enactment of this Act with respect to States which, in order to comply with the amendment made by subsection (a), have to qualify under State laws.

AUTHORIZATION FOR EVALUATION

SEC. 4. Section 618(g) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(g) There are authorized to be appropriated $3,800,000 for fiscal year 1987, $4,000,000 for fiscal year 1988, and $4,200,000 for fiscal year 1989 to carry out the provisions of this section.".

EARLY INTERVENTION PROGRAM FOR HANDICAPPED INFANTS

SEC. 5. (a) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—The Act is amended—

(1) by inserting after the heading for part B the following:

"SUBPART 1—EDUCATION OF ALL HANDICAPPED CHILDREN";

(2) by redesignating sections 621 through 628 as sections 631 through 638, respectively;

(3) by redesignating sections 631 through 635 as sections 641 through 645, respectively;

(4) by redesignating sections 641 through 644 as sections 651 through 654, respectively;

(5) by redesignating sections 651 through section 654 as sections 661 through 664, respectively; and

(6) by adding after section 620 the following:

"SUBPART 2—EARLY INTERVENTION FOR HANDICAPPED INFANTS

"PROGRAM AUTHORIZED

"SEC. 621. (a) The Secretary shall make grants, in accordance with the provisions of this subpart, to States to carry out an early intervention program for handicapped infants.

"(b) There are authorized to be appropriated $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1987, and for each succeeding fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1989.

"(c) During any fiscal year in which the amount appropriated for this subpart is less than $100,000,000 each State shall be entitled to receive its allotment under this subpart if the Secretary determines that the State is making a good faith effort to comply substantially with the provisions of this subpart.

"ALLOTMENT TO STATES

"SEC. 622. (a)(1) From the sums appropriated to carry out this subpart for any fiscal year, the Secretary shall reserve 1 per centum for payments to Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Republic of the Marshall Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia, the Republic of Palau, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, to be allotted in accordance with their respective needs.

"(2) From the remainder of such funds the Secretary shall allot to each State an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount of such remainder as the number of eligible handicapped infants served to the number of such infants served by all States, except that no State shall receive less than 0.5 per centum of such remainder.

"(b) If any State elects not to receive its allotment under this part, the Secretary shall reallot, among the remaining States, amounts from such State in accordance with subsection (a) of this section.

"ELIGIBILITY

"SEC. 623. In order to qualify for assistance under this subpart in each fiscal year, a State shall demonstrate to the Secretary that the State has—

"(1) met the eligibility requirements of section 612;

"(2) a State plan approved under section 613;

"(3) a State Early Intervention Council which meets the requirements of section 624(a) for the purpose of ensuring that the State provides a comprehensive system of early intervention for handicapped infants;

"(4) beginning two years after the date of enactment of this subpart, a comprehensive early childhood plan for services to handicapped children from birth to age five, inclusive, which address service delivery to all handicapped infants and includes the transition school;

"(5) beginning two years after the date of enactment of this subpart, a statewide comprehensive system of early intervention services available to serve all handicapped infants; and

"(6) a State agency administration which meets the requirements of section 624(b).

"EARLY INTERVENTION COUNCIL; STATE ADMINISTRATION

"SEC. 624. (a)(1) The Governor shall appoint an Early Intervention Council which shall be composed of members who represent each public agency within the State providing services to handicapped infants including the grant recipient under section 627 and one member representing the Governor.

"(2) The Early Intervention Council shall—

"(A) identify the sources of fiscal and other support for services for early intervention programs and ensure that each State agency is making a financial contribution to support;

"(B) promote the development of formal interagency agreements for services for handicapped infants;

"(C) assist the State agency in the development of and approval of the comprehensive early childhood plan for handicapped infants and the application for assistance under this subpart;

"(D) ensure that the application for assistance under this subpart is coordinated with grants awarded in the State under section 627;

"(E) disseminate information regarding early intervention programs; and

"(F) prepare and submit an annual report to the Governor and to the Secretary on the status of early intervention programs operated within the State for handicapped infants.

"(3) The report required by clause (E) of this subsection shall include recommendations on the appropriate use of Federal and State funds, together with a statement of statewide policy for the early intervention program for handicapped infants within the State.

"(4) A summary of the data required by this section shall be included in the annual report of the Secretary under section 618 of this Act.

"(5) The Early Intervention Council required by this section shall meet at least quarterly in each fiscal year.

"(b)(1) The Governor shall establish or designate a State agency for the purpose of administering this subpart in accordance with the provisions of this subsection. In carrying out this paragraph, the Governor may designate the State educational agency, the mental health agency, the mental retardation agency, a State health or social service agency, or a State Early Intervention Council.

"(2) The agency designated under paragraph (1) shall have responsibility for the general administration, supervision, and monitoring of the comprehensive system of early intervention services for handicapped infants within the State including the delivery of services to such infants. The State agency shall also be responsible either directly or by contract or other agreement with other agencies or organizations for coordinating multidisciplinary referrals of handicapped infants, conducting indepth assessments of such infants, and coordinating early intervention services for handicapped infants within the State.

"(c)(1) The Governor shall appoint an advisory panel to the Early Intervention Council consisting of individuals involved in or concerned with the needs of handicapped infants, including but not limited to parents, educators, rehabilitation specialists, social workers, medical experts, and psychologists, as well as one member of the State Advisory Council on Special Education, one member of the Developmental Disabilities Council, and one representative of the Parent Training Center established under part D of this Act.

"(2) The advisory panel shall—

"(A) advise the Early Intervention Council of unmet needs within the State in early intervention of handicapped infants;

"(B) comment publicly on the status of early intervention programs; and

"(C) make such recommendations to the Early Intervention Council as the advisory panel considers appropriate.

"PROGRAM COMPONENTS

"SEC. 625. (a) Each State shall develop and carry out a comprehensive plan to serve handicapped infants in accordance with the provisions of subsections (b), (c), and (d).

"(b) The State has or will establish an early intervention services program serving all handicapped infants from birth to age two, inclusive, within the State.

"(c) Each handicapped infant shall have—

"(1) a multidisciplinary assessment of individual needs and services required to meet such needs;

"(2) an individualized program plan developed by a multidisciplinary team, including the parent describing necessary services which may include but is not limited to—

"(A) special education;

"(B) speech and language therapy;

"(C) occupational therapy;

"(D) physical therapy;

"(E) psychological services;

"(F) health services;

"(G) parent and family support services; and

"(H) social services; and

"(3) access to all services described in the early intervention program plan without cost to the parent or guardian.

"(d)(1) Each individualized program shall be reviewed at least annually.

"(2) Services under the individualized program shall be provided by qualified personnel.

"(3) The individualized program shall include provisions which support the transition of handicapped infants to services provided under subpart 1 of this part.

"APPLICATION

"SEC. 626. (a) Each State meeting the eligibility requirements set forth in section 623 and desiring to participate in the program under this subpart shall submit an application to the Secretary through the Early Intervention Council at such time, in such manner, and containing or accompanied by such information, as the Secretary may reasonably require.

"(b) Each such application shall—

"(1) specify the role and financial contribution of each State agency providing services to handicapped infants;

"(2) describe the services which shall be available to handicapped infants and their families;

"(3) describe the procedures used to identify and serve handicapped infants;

"(4) set forth policies and procedures designed to assure that, to the extent consistent with the number and location of handicapped infants in the State, provision is made for the participation of such infants in the program assisted or carried out under this subpart by providing for such children community based early intervention services;

"(5) provide assurances that Federal funds made available under this subpart (A) will not be commingled with State funds, and (B) will be so used as to supplement and increase the level of State and local funds expended for the purposes described in this subpart and in no case to supplant such State and local funds; and

"(6) provide assurances that the State will not expend more than 10 per centum of its allotment on administrative costs of carrying out the early intervention services for which assistance is sought.

"PLANNING AND DEVELOPMENT GRANTS

"SEC. 627. (a) The Secretary shall make one of the following types of grants to each State through the State agency for services for which handicapped children aged birth through 5 are eligible. Grants under this section may be made to any State which submits an application which meets the requirements of this section:

"(1) PLANNING GRANT.—A grant for a maximum of two years for the purpose of assessing needs within the State and establishing a procedure and design for the development of a comprehensive early childhood State plan which includes parent participation and training of professionals and others.

"(2) DEVELOPMENT GRANT.—A grant for a maximum of one year for the purpose of developing a comprehensive early childhood State plan, and gaining approval of the plan from the State educational agency, the Secretary of Education, or other designated official of the appropriate State agency.

"(3) IMPLEMENTATION GRANT.—A grant for a maximum of one year for the purpose of implementing and evaluating the comprehensive early childhood State plan.

"(b) Each State educational agency or other State agency desiring to receive a grant under this subsection shall submit an application at such time, in such manner, and containing or accompanied by such information as the Secretary considers necessary. Each such application shall contain assurances and evidence that—

"(1) The State agency receiving the grant will coordinate with other appropriate State agencies (including the State educational agency) in carrying out the grant.

"(2) The State plan will address the early intervention and the special education and related service needs of all handicapped children from birth through five years of age with special emphasis on children who are often not identified and children who are not now served.

"(3) The State plan will be closely coordinated with child-find efforts under section 612(2)(C) and with preschool incentive grant activities under section 619 of this Act.

"(c) The Secretary shall include in the annual report under section 618 of this Act the following:

"(1) The States and State agencies receiving grants under this subsection and the types of grants received.

"(2) A description of the activities in each State being undertaken through grants under this subsection.

"(3) Beginning in fiscal year 1987, in consultation with the National Council on the Handicapped a description of the status of early intervention programs for handicapped children from birth through five years of age (including children receiving services through Head Start, Developmental Disabilities Program, Maternal and Child Health Services, Mental Health/Mental Retardation Agency Services, and State child-developmental centers and private agencies under contract with State agencies or local schools).

"(d) Any planning or development grant application submitted pursuant to section 623(b) prior to the date of enactment of the Education of the Handicapped Amendments of 1986 shall qualify for a grant under this section.

"RESTRICTION

"SEC. 628. Nothing in this subpart shall be construed—

"(1) to permit the State to reduce medical assistance available, or to alter eligibility, under title XIX of the Social Security Act, relating to medicaid, for handicapped infants within the State; and

"(2) to encourage the reduction in benefits paid under other public or private insurance coverage.

"APPLICABILITY OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF LAW

"SEC. 629. The provisions of sections 615, 616, 617, 618, and 620 of this Act shall apply to the program authorized by this subpart, except that any reference to a State educational agency shall be deemed to be a reference to the State agency established or designated under section 623(b).".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—(1) Section 601(c) of the Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma the following: "and to assure that all handicapped infants have available to them a free appropriate early intervention program designed to meet their unique needs".

(2) Section 602(a) of the Act is amended by inserting after paragraph (1) the following new paragraph:

REPEAL

SEC. 20. Section 604 of the Act is repealed.

(By request of Mr. BYRD, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, today I rise to join with my distinguished colleague from Connecticut in introducing legislation to reauthorize the discretionary programs under the Education of the Handicapped Act. The act has proven its value over the years by integrating our disabled children into their schools and communities, and allowing them an opportunity to participate in a way that was impossible only a decade ago. And today I am proud to be a partner in sponsoring legislation that adds to the act by further expanding educational services for handicapped children. Today's reauthorization package reflects thoughtful input and consultation from experts across the country. This is genuinely demonstrated in the clear intent of the bill which is to improve our educational system in a manner that increases the developmental and learning potential of handicapped children, contributing to their full growth into adulthood.

This reauthorization increases that goal by providing for early childhood intervention which has proven highly effective. Our bill mandates services for children beginning at age 3. It allows for State and local flexibility so that existing programs may be continued and new ones will have the support necessary to provide the early intervention needed by "at risk" children. Recent research has indicated that this timely assistance makes a critical difference in educational progress of "at risk" children. In order to understand the overwhelming need for early childhood intervention, one only has to point to the fact that in the past decade, the number of handicapped preschoolers has increased by over 30 percent. Just last year, over 250,000 preschoolers were given educational services and this is but a fraction of the overall number of children who need these services. Currently only 19 States mandate services to all 3-to-5-year-olds. Yet, over 30 States cover a portion of this age category. The reauthorization not only mandates early childhood services nationwide and provides a reimbursement formula which covers the services, but it also amends the existing allotment formula to ensure that States will no longer be penalized for serving additional children.

The discretionary programs provide a critical support system to upgrade the service received by the more than 4 million children nationwide who are in special education programs. These programs provide new authority for early childhood research and personnel preparation. Interagency coordination and transition plans for students are required for the secondary transition programs. This assures that handicapped students enter the adult level of the community with the support and aid they require. Personnel preparation programs target areas of shortage, priority status is given to the establishment of parent training centers and staff is specifically permitted to assist parents in due process hearings. The appropriateness of physical education is stressed in several programs. The bill includes monitoring and complaint investigation in the administrative cost set-aside which realistically reflects school district needs.

Embodied in this legislation is the essential principle that the Federal Government has a critical role in devising a progressive and responsible approach to create an effective system designed to promote education for all handicapped children. These provisions, combined with past novel approaches implemented under the Education of the Handicapped Act, have allowed millions of children to maximize their potential, despite their handicap.

Mr. President, our bill builds on the existing mechanism and helps further integrate our disabled children into their schools and communities, helps their parents and families understand what resources are available to them, and establishes research and training so that future innovations can be encouraged to assist our handicapped youth.

Over the years, the Congress had made a commitment to our handicapped children and our proposal further strengthens this commitment in a manner that enhances the lives of disabled youth throughout our society.●

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator WEICKER as an original cosponsor of S. 2294, the Education of the Handicapped Amendments of 1986. It has been 10 years since this landmark legislation was first enacted by the Congress. In that time, countless school districts have opened their doors to handicapped children who were previously denied a free and appropriate public education. Approximately 10 percent of the children attending public schools receive special education services that are paid for in part by Federal funds. Children with every kind of disability have taken their rightful places in their neighborhood schools. Handicapped young adults are now graduating from our public schools, with educational attainments, employment skills, and the expectation that they will live and work independently in the mainstream of their communities. That is remarkable progress for a decade. The task, however, is far from complete. Unemployment figures among disabled adults are as high as 60 percent. Many adults who would choose to live independently must remain in institutional or family settings because local alternatives are not available. I do not mention these facts to be discouraging. Rather, they reinforce the importance of the mandate that Public Law 94-142 has provided.

Senator WEICKER is to be congratulated for the new initiatives included in this legislation which will bring services to handicapped children from birth. It is well-documented that early intervention equates to less expensive programming for handicapped children once they are school-aged. By encouraging local school districts to intervene in the lives of handicapped youngsters at birth instead of ages 5 or 6, we are increasing the likelihood that these children will leave school and enter the workplace with adequate skills and self-esteem to be wage-earning, taxpaying citizens. This initiative represents a major step toward achieving the ultimate goal of full integration of handicapped children and adults in society.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR CRANSTON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized.

THE GENERAL MOTORS PRICE INCREASE

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, whenever anyone mentions automobiles, a lot of people automatically think of California.

Cars may be an important part of life, even an essential part of life, everywhere in the United States.

But in California, cars are a way of life.

We have over 14 million passenger cars on the road—far more than any other State.

We have 26 million people—also more than any other State.

And at any one time, more than 1 million Californians are in the market for a new car.

That is why the news that the price of General Motors cars are going up an average of 2.9 percent today comes as such a shock to this Senator from California.

What is General Motors thinking of? Or are they not-thinking at all?

General Motors and the American automotive industry have been pushing Congress for protectionist legislation, complaining that they are being beaten by foreign competitors.

And they are being beaten—with the possible exception of Chrysler.

Twenty-five percent of the new cars sold in the United States in 1984 were foreign imports—mostly Japanese.

Fifty percent of the new cars sold in California that year were foreign imports—mostly Japanese.

And now, when their No. 1 competitor has boosted its prices because of the increase in the exchange rate of the yen, what does General Motors do?

Does GM cut its prices to become more competitive and try to win back some of the American market it has lost?

Does it at the very least hold the line on the price of GM cars?

No, GM raises its prices.

Someone once said that what is good for General Motors is good for the United States.

I never could make much sense out of that.

General Motors' price increase is not good for the United States.

What is good for the United States is to reduce our trade deficit by producing better cars at lower cost.

That is good for the American consumer.

And it could even be good for General Motors.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

THE W.M. KECK OBSERVATORY: TO SEE THE BEGINNING OF TIME

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am very pleased that my colleague, Senator Matsunaga, has agreed to introduce legislation on behalf of the University of California, Caltech, and the University of Hawaii, to premit the duty-free entry of essential telescope components for installation in the W.M. Keck Observatory under construction on Hawaii's Mauna Kea.

The Keck telescope, when it is completed in 1992, will be the world's most powerful telescope, powerful enough to see a single candle at the distance of the Moon.

This marvelous instrument will function as a time machine peering 12 billion years into the past nearly three-quarters of the way to the birth of the universe, according to Caltech scientists.

The Keck telescope will measure 10 meters across compared to the well-known 5-meter hale telescope on Palmar Mountain. The final mirror assembly will consist of 36 hexagonal segments each individually controlled by a computor making 300 corrections a second to a tolerance of 3.75 nanometers. The Keck telescope will be enhanced by additional technological developments which will mean a 600-fold increase in productivity over present telescopes.

The bill which Senator Matsunaga is introducing will permit the duty-free entry of mirror components manufactured in West Germany. The duty-free entry provision is necessary because the telescope must be imported in components parts. Ironically, if the telescope were imported as a unit, it could enter duty-free.

I urge my colleagues on the Finance Committee to act promptly on this matter and to my colleagues in the Senate, I ask their wholehearted support of this significant contribution to an important scientific effort.

I ask unanimous consent that an article describing the project which appeared in the Caltech publication, Engineering & Science, be printed in the RECORD together with correspondence between California Institute of Technology and the U.S. Customs Service.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Engineering & Science, January 1985]

THE W.M. KECK OBSERVATORY

It will be powerful enough to see a single candle at the distance of the moon. But the Keck Telescope won't be lookng at anything so mundance as the moon. Its faceted eye will look at the center of the galaxy to see if there's a black hole there. It will look at the clouds of hot gas that are the birthplace of stars. It will function as a time machine, peering 12 billion years into the past three-quarters of the way to the birth of the universe. When construction is complete in 1992, this telescope, the most powerful in the world, will be set to answer fundamental questions in the fields of optical and infrared astronomy.

And it will do so from a most unworldly landscape—the remote high ridge of an extinct volcano already dotted with the white domes of observatories. Perched at the 13,600-foot level on Hawaii's Mauna Kea (White Mountain), a site that has some of the best "seeing," astronomically speaking in the world, the Keck Telescope will be the culmination of a 15-year, $85 million project to design and build the premier weapon in the astronomical arsenal.

With the largest private gift ever made for a single scientific enterprise—$70 million from the W.M. Keck Foundation—Caltech will provide most of the funds for the observatory's construction. The University of California, whose scientists began designing the ten-meter telescope in 1977, will provide funds for the scope's continuing operation. Observation time will be split evenly between UC and Caltech astronomers, with a fraction of the time going to astronomers from the Universtiy of Hawaii, which is providing the site.

The observations these scientists will make should help answer some of the most perplexing of astronomical riddles. One of these involves the large-scale structure of the universe. Galaxies cluster in groups ranging from small ones only a million light years across, to superclusters, which span nearly a billion light years. Scientists link the small and medium-sized galactic clusters to tiny density irregularities arising among fundamental particles during the Big Bang. But they find the superclusters much more difficult to explain. Some scientists believe that superclusters owe their existence to primordial fluctuations in the density of as-yet-unidentified elementary particles, so particle physicists are vitally interested in the results of these studies as well.

Often superclusters occur in enormous filaments or chains, and the details of these structures that the telescope will reveal may provide important clues to their orign. Computer simulations indicate that the clustering process continues to this day. The ten-meter telescope will be able to trace this back in time by capturing light that's been traveling our way for billions of years. Present day telescopes, like the five-meter (200-inch) Hale Telescope on Palomar Mountain, are just barely able to make out then most distant (and hence the oldest) galaxies, but they can't collect enough light from them to determine their redshifts, a measure of astronomical distance. (The further away an object is, the faster it recedes from us. The faster it recedes, the further its light is shifted to the red end of the spectrum.) Redshift information is indispensable in mapping the structure of these ancient clusters. The ten-meter telescope, with its huge light collecting area, is admirably suited for this sort of work.

The telescope may also provide a solution to one of the major problems in astronomy—the question of why, where, and how stars form. Thick clouds of dust obscure most star-forming regions. But though the dust blocks visible light, infrared light gets through and the ten-meter telescope will be the biggest infrared instrument in the world, with a resolution three times that of its nearest competitor. The ten-meter telescope will be able to differentiate actual stars from nearby clumps of dust that scatter light and mimic stars. It will also be able to separate one nascent star from another in these densely packed areas. And the telescope may help solve the mystery within a mystery of certain small, young stars, which come into being as the result of an unknown mechanism operating outside the usual star-forming regions.

The telescope's infrared capabilities make it an ideal source of information about our galactic center, which is also obscured by layer upon layer of dust. Studies to date indicate that this is a most peculiar region, containing remnants of supernovae as well as chaotically moving clouds of ionized gas. Many astronomers believe that these constitute the gravitational signature of a black hole located precisely at the center of Milky Way galaxy. The Keck Telescope will peer through the dust, searching for the high velocity regions that will distinguish a black hole from a compact star cluster, the other major candidate for the structure at the galactic center.

One technique that will be applied to the telescope is known as Multiple Object Spectroscopy (MOS), a process in which the spectra of as many as 100 objects from a single field of view are obtained simultaneously. One of the advantages of MOS is a lengthening of the maximum tolerable exposure. An astronomer may be willing to invest 10 or even 20 hours in a single exposure if 100 good-quality spectra will result. In other words MOS, coupled with the great light-gathering power of the ten-meter telescope, will mean a 600-fold increase in productivity over present telescopes.

Despite the Keck Telescope's high resolution, when construction is completed in 1992 it will not be the highest resolution instrument in use. The Hubble Space Telescope, scheduled for launch by the Space Shuttle in 1986, will have a resolution ten times better than any ground-based instrument because of its freedom from atmospheric blurring. The Space Telescope will also have advantages in ultraviolet spectroscopy (since most ultraviolet light is filtered by the ozone layer) and in certain parts of the infrared region that are attenuated by atmospheric water vapor. But the Space Telescope's primary mirror is only 2.4 meters in diameter. At more than 4 times the diameter and 17.4 times the area, the ten-meter mirror will be better able to provide the large amounts of light demanded by the exacting requirements of spectroscopy. Spectroscopy is needed in quantitative astrophysical studies to determine abundances of the constituents of stars and galaxies, as well as to determine redshifts. The two telescopes will therefore complement each other. The ten-meter telescope will often be used to conduct detailed spectrographic studies of objects first discovered or imaged by the Space Telescope.

Designing a ten-meter telescope, which must have a virtually perfect 76-square-meter optical surface, requires much more than merely scaling up a five-meter mirror like the one at the Palomar Observatory. According to University of California astronomer Jerry Nelson (Caltech BS 1955), who headed the design team, scaling these designs up by a factor of two introduces a number of formidable problems, most of them associated with the primary mirror itself. A ten-meter mirror blank has never been made, and even if it were possible, its cost would be enormous. Polishing such a blank would take a very long time and require extremely large and expensive machinery.

Perhaps even more difficult is the problem of properly supporting the mirror against the force of gravity, since the deflections of a ten-meter mirror are 16 times those of a five-meter mirror. These deflections must be limited to about a thousandfold less than the thickness of a human hair, says Nelson. Such a large mirror would require a massive telescope structure and a dome of enormous proportions, leading, again, to unacceptable costs.

To avoid these difficulties, the telescope's designers have developed a primary mirror design composed of a mosaic of 36 hexagonal mirror segments only 1.8 meters in diameter. Many of the problems are thus reduced to those of a 1.8-meter telescope. This allows a much lighter mirror, and modern computer-aided structural design tools have also made an extremely lightweight telescope structure possible. In fact, at 158 tons, the Keck Telescope will weigh less than one-third as much as the Hale Telescope.

But construction of the ten-meter telescope is not without problems of its own. Polishing the mirror is complicated by the fact that each segment is neither flat nor symmetrical, but rather is one of six off-axis sections of a shallow paraboloid. The design team developed a method called "stressed mirror polishing" to arrive at each of the six shapes. This technique takes advantage of the ease with which opticians can polish a spherical surface. It involves first applying precisely calculated forces to a circular mirror blank, intentionally warping it. The mirror blank is then polished to a concave, spherical surface. Once the applied force is released, the mirror blank springs into the desired final shape. Its edges are then cut off to form the hexagonal outline.

During the cutting of an initial test blank, larger than desired warping occurred. This led to the idea of putting a "stressing" jig on each segment to remove the warp. This dewarping method, whose feasibility has been demonstrated, may also lead to a faster mirror production by allowing more relaxed tolerances during the polishing phase.

These difficulties in polishing the hexagonal segments are minor compared to the problem of polishing a single large mirror. But the multi-segment approach introduces other problems. A single mirror could be held steady in a rigid but passive support. But a system of multiple mirrors must be continually realigned, since the forces that tend to disrupt the aim (gravity, wind, and heat are the most important of these) act differently at each mirror location and change over time. Each segment, therefore, has edge displacement sensors on its back surface that bridge the gaps between one segment and its neighbors. If one segment should move relative to another, these sensors will send a signal to the computer control system. The computer will then make the necessary corrections by adjusting the three actuator pistons that support each segment. In order to maintain a sufficiently stable image, the computer will make such corrections 300 times a second to a tolerance of 3.75 nanometers. In this way the 36 segments, each individually controlled, with constitute, for all intents and purposes, a single mirror.

Light falling on this mirror will be directed to the telescope's six focal points, where various instruments such as cameras, spectrographs, photometers, and polarimeters will be housed. The designers have deferred decisions on the exact specifications of many of these instruments because of the rapid pace of technological advance. Light detectors in particular are currently undergoing dramatic improvements in sensitivity coupled with decreases in size, and these characteristics are fundamental starting points in some instrument designs. This flexibility to take advantage of the latest advances in instrument and detector technology is a further advantage ground-based telescopes have over space platforms.

But even a telescope in the best location in the world can have its seeing degraded by thermal inhomogeneities causing local atmospheric turbulence. Experience has shown astronomers that, ironically, the most damaging source of such turbulence is often the observatory itself. Ideally, all parts of the telescope would maintain the same temperature as the surroundings, but in practice this is not possible. To minimize damaging temperature gradients the designers will take a number of steps. These include painting the dome with a special, heat-reflective paint; actively controlling the temperature of the dome floor so that this massive structure will be neither a source nor a sink of heat; and locating much of the heat-producing electronic equipment in the heavily insulated observatory building.

This one-story building will contain the control room, offices, a library, and mechanical and electrical shops, including an aluminizing facility where the mirrors will be cleaned and resurfaced. Some of these rooms will be supplemented with oxygen, since the atmosphere at 13,600 feet contains only 60 percent of the oxygen present at sea level. This low oxygen level significantly degrades a person's mental and physical performance, but often people don't notice this reduction in performance soon enough. Several of the other observatories on Mauna Kea provide masks and bottle oxygen to their personnel, but although this is a much less costly option than oxygenating whole rooms, studies show that these aids are underused. The supplemental oxygen will not provide a sea-level environment, which would be prohibitively expensive. Instead, the oxygen levels will simulate conditions at the Hale Pohaku base camp at 9,200 feet, where the astronomers and support staff will study, eat, and sleep.

Although there's a strong tradition of astronomers making their observations while in residence at a telescope, full remote control of the Keck Telescope will be possible. This will allow astronomers to make their observations from their home offices around the world, which will significantly reduce travel and housing costs. Although some astronomers may be secretly disappointed by this, since justifying a trip to tropical Hawaii will be more difficult, the fact that the temperature atop Mauna Kea is usually between 30° and 50° Fahrenheit may assuage their disappointment.

Mauns Kea is already home to a number of major observatories including the Canada-France-Hawaii 3.6-meter telescope, the NASA 3.0-meter Infrared Telescope Facility, the United Kingdom 3.8-meter Infrared Telescope and the University of Hawaii 2.2-meter telescope. In addition, the Caltech 10.4-meter telescope for submillimeter wavelengths and a United Kingdom-Netherlands 15-meter telescope for millimeter-wave observations are under construction. Caltech scientists anticipate that the Keck Telescope will be linked to the 10.4-meter telescope to form a 400-meter-baseline interferometer at submillimeter wavelengths. This will allow them to examine sites of star formation, for example, in unprecedented spatial detail.

Future hopes for the site call for the construction of a second, identical ten-meter telescope that may be used in conjunction with the first to perform optical interferometry. The effective resolving power of such tandem observations, with both telescopes trained on the same area of the sky, would be equivalent to that of a telescope having a single mirror with a diameter equal to the distance between the two scopes. No funds have yet been raised for the second telescope, which could cost an additional $60 million.

Even without its twin, the Keck ten-meter telescope will be the source of significant advances in astronomical knowledge for decades to come. Considered together with the Hubble Space Telescope and a number of other observatories that may come on line within the next decade, the Keck Observatory will set the stage for possibly the fastest increase in our understanding of the cosmos since the time of Galileo.

G.M. SMITH, Project Manager,
W.M. Keck Observatory Project, California Institute of Technology, Pasadena, CA.

DEAR MR. SMITH: This is in response to your application of August 23, 1985, for duty-free entry under item 851.60 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (TSUS), of astronomical telescope mirror blanks. The blanks will become part of the reflector for an optical telescope to be installed on Mauna Kea on the island of Hawaii.

It is our determination that the blanks are components within the meaning of 15 CFR 301.2(k), of the regulations of the Commerce Department and the Treasury Department. Components (other than repair components) are not eligible for duty-free treatment under this program. Therefore, we must deny your application.

Any additional facts or evidence concerning the conditions existing at the time of entry which might alter this determination may be submitted to the undersigned prior to notice of liquidation of the entry. In the absence of such a submission this determination is considered final. However, after notice of liquidation a protest may be filed in accordance with Part 174 of the Customs Regulations (19 CFR Part 174). In this regard see also 15 CFR 301.8(c) for the regulations of the Department of Commerce and the Department of the Treasury.

Sincerely,

JOHN E. ELKINS, Chief,

Mr. JOHN C. ELKINS,
Chief, Disclosure Law Branch, Department of the Treasury, U.S. Customs Service, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. ELKINS: I have in hand your letter dated December 17, 1985 to G. M. Smith, Project Manager for our W. M. Keck Observatory Project. In your letter you deny our application for duty-free entry under item 851.60 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States for the astronomical telescope "mirror blanks" which we are purchasing from Schott Glass Technologies, Inc. in West Germany. These so-called "mirror blanks" will be combined to form the primary reflector (i.e. mirror) for the large (ten-meter) optical and infrared telescope to be installed on the summit of Mauna Kea on the Island of Hawaii. The primary reflector will be composed of 36 hexagonal, 1.8 meter segments, each of these to consist of one of the "mirror blanks" (further polished, of course) to be purchased from Schott Glass Technologies, Inc.

Actually, the problem here appears to be one of semantics, a problem caused by us when we described these mirrors as "mirror blanks." "Mirror blank" is clearly a misnomer. These mirrors, when received from Scott Technologies, Inc. will already have been worked and precision ground to a diameter of 1900 mm +/− .5 mm and to a thickness of 77 mm +/− .2 mm. And the surface will have been ground to form a meniscus with a radius of curvature of 35350 mm on the concave side and 35426 mm on the convex side.

Headnote 6. to part 4 (of which item 851.60 is a part) describes which "instruments and apparatus" are exempt under item 851.60. Included are the "instruments and apparatus" listed in schedule 7, part 2 (except subpart G).

Subpart A of schedule 7, part 2 clearly lists the mirrors in question (item 708.07). Thus the items for which we are requesting exemption are, in fact, a line item "instrument [or] apparatus" coming within the included class described in headnote 6.

It seems clear that anything rising to the status of a stand-alone line item in one of the exempted parts qualifies for an exemption under item 851.60. To conclude otherwise would be to change the obvious intent of Congress. These mirror blanks are not "components" of some "instrument and apparatus" listed in the schedules. They are one of those exempt items themselves. Please note that the qualifying legislative definition is "instrument and apparatus", not merely "instrument." A reference to Webster's Third New International Dictionary, 1976, will show that "apparatus" includes anything which is a "collection or set of materials, instruments, appliances, or machinery designed for a particular use." These so-called "mirror blanks" being purchased from Schott Glass Technologies, Inc. are in fact the set of mirrors which will form the primary reflector for the Keck Observatory.

I can understand why as set forth in 15 CFR 301.2(k) "components" of "instruments" or "apparatus" are not exempt. However, that quite simply is not the case here. As we have shown, these precision ground mirrors from Schott Glass Technologies, Inc. are line item "instruments and apparatus" entitled to exemption. Furthermore, the only feasible way to fabricate, ship and install a telescope of this size and complexity is in pieces. It literally would not be physically possible to build a telescope of this size and transport it across the oceans and up the mountainside intact, as contrasted with a telescope or other scientific instrument which would fit on a desk or even in a normal laboratory room or bay. This telescope must be fabricated and transported to the Mauna Kea summit in pieces and then erected and installed there. It would be totally unreasonable and a complete distortion of 15 CFR 301.2(k) to call these prime elements of the telescope "components," so as to exclude them from exemption. And there is nothing in the legislation to support such a view. For your further information, I am enclosing a copy of an article in the January 1985 issue of Engineering and Science which describes in some detail this rather incredible new telescope.

We would appreciate your prompt reinstatement and further processing of our application. The completion of this exciting new optical and infrared telescope on the top of Mauna Kea, which will be the largest such telescope in the world, is dependent upon a steady flow of these precision ground mirrors from Schott Glass Technologies, Inc. Deliveries from Scott Glass are due to begin in March 1986, so prompt action is absolutely essential.

Your cooperation will be much appreciated.

Very truly yours,

DONALD R. FOWLER,
General Counsel.

DONALD R. FOWLER, Esq.,
Office of the General Counsel, California Institute of Technology, Pasadena, CA

DEAR MR. FOWLER: This is in response to your letter of January 17, 1986, in which you appeal the denial of December 17, 1985, of an application for duty-free entry under item 851.60 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (TSUS), of mirror blanks for the multiple mirror telescope being erected on Mauna Kea. Duty-free entry under item 851.60, TSUS, was denied on the grounds that the mirror blanks are components as defined by 15 CFR 301.2(k) of the regulations of the Department of Commerce and the Department of the Treasury.

The mirror blanks were not ruled ineligible because they were not completely optically worked and thus did not fail within the allowable tariff schedule items, although it might, in fact, be argued that they are not optically worked. Rather, they were denied duty-free entry because they are components, and components may not enter duty-free under item 851.60, TSUS. A telescope, for example, is an instrument. The primary mirror of a reflecting telescope is an component of the telescope, that is, a necessary part of the instrument, but not itself a complete instrument. The mirrors under consideration here will be assembled into the equivalent of a primary mirror in the Keck Telescope, and therefore cannot be considered an instrument or instruments.

If the entire multiple mirror telescope were purchased from one foreign manufacturer and imported in several shipments to be assembled in the United States, the instrument could obtain duty-free treatment under this provision. However, this is not the case here. The telescope was designed by the University of California and California Institute of Technology, and parts were purchased from various foreign and domestic manufacturers. The instrument is to be constructed in the United States. Section 301.2(k), Title 15, Code of Federal Regulations, states in part, "'Components' of an instrument means parts or assemblies of parts which are substantially less than the instrument to which they relate. A component enables an instrument to function at a specified minimum level . . . Applications shall not be accepted for components of instruments . . . being manufactured or assembled by a[n] . . . entity in the U.S." Therefore, we must affirm the denial of duty-free entry for the mirrors on the basis that they are components of a larger instrument, which did not enter duty-free under tariff item 851.60, TSUS.

This determination is considered final. However, if an entry has been filed a protest may be filed after notice of liquidation in accordance with 19 U.S.C. 1514 and Part 174, Customs Regulations (19 CFR Part 174). Once an entry has been liquidated the importer has 90 days in which to file a protest.

Sincerely,

B. JAMES FRITZ,
Director, Regulations Control and Disclosure Law Division.

SENATOR DOLE DEFENDS RIGHTS OF GUNOWNERS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it has come to my attention that majority leader ROBERT DOLE is the subject of a recent false and unfair attack regarding his record on gunowners' rights issues. This attack was carried out in a mailing conducted under the auspices of the Gun Owners of America. J.E. Reinke, the president of the National Rifle Association, promptly protested the mailing and in response, Bill Richardson, the founder and chairman of Gun Owners of America, has submitted a formal apology. The mailing did not go out over Mr. Richardson's signature and I am confident that he had no prior knowledge of the mailing. I request that both their letters be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the end of my remarks. Right now, I would like to take a few moments to present my own point-by-point response to the charges that were made in this mailing.

The fact of the matter is, Majority Leader DOLE has been a staunch advocate of the rights of gunowners.

He has been a cosponsor and strong, consistent supporter of the Federal Firearms Owners Protection Act since its original introduction in 1979. Once he became majority leader, he made the bill a top legislative priority. In July 1985, he brought the bill up on the Senate floor for the first time since it had been introduced. A few days later, the Senate passed the bill by an overwhelming vote of 79 to 15. As floor manager for that bill, S. 49, I can personally attest to the critical contribution made by the majority leader that resulted in approval of this important initiative.

But this is hardly the first time BOB DOLE has demonstrated his commitment to the rights of gunowners. In 1981, he introduced a package of amendments that in some respects went farther than the McClure bill in correcting overreaching by the 1968 Gun Control Act.

For instance, there was his amendment, enacted into law in 1982, removing .22-caliber rimfire ammunition from the Gun Control Act. He also offered an amendment, enacted into law in 1984, removing the act's restrictions on military surplus imports. These were the first progun amendments to the 1968 act to be enacted by Congress. He also sought enactment of an amendment which would have downgraded technical and bookkeeping violations of the 1968 act. This Dole proposal would have handled technical regulatory infractions with a regulatory system of civil fines rather than with Federal felony prosecutions.

Incredibly, one of the allegations made in this mailing was that BOB DOLE tried to "tax and register" guns when in fact, Senator DOLE wrote the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, at the request of the person responsible for the mailing, protesting proposed regulations and any other attempt by the IRS "directly or indirectly to require gun registration of any sort." In response, the Commissioner wrote back stating that the "IRS has no intention of requiring firearm registration of any sort"—a commitment which so far has been kept.

The mailing also attacked possible amendments to the National Firearms Act being circulated by Senator DOLE's staff for comment which BOB DOLE has never even seen.

What's more, I have been advised that these amendments, which were given to my staff and other interested parties many months ago, were designed to head off more sweeping changes to the national act. This staff draft was designed to help gunowners in many different ways. For instance, one change would give amnesty to certain individuals acting in good faith who possess automatic weapons now required to be registered by law. Another would allow law enforcement agencies to release from their arsenals for sale to collectors surplus automatic weapons with high collectors value, such as Thompson machineguns. These kinds of changes are highly unpopular with gun control advocates, so I was quite surprised to see the mailing also opposed to Senator DOLE's staff's efforts.

Contrary to what the mailing said, the staff amendments were never written to classify all semiautomatics as machineguns. On the contrary, Senator DOLE's staff have taken great pains to ensure that the amendments could not be so interpreted. Indeed, the most recent language being circulated goes so far as to repeat weapons covered by the national act remains the same.

Finally, the letter attacks Senator DOLE for supporting the KTW bill, S. 104, and its House counterpart. The letter fails to mention that Senator DOLE was among the first to caution against an overly broad approach in dealing with this issue. In 1982, his individual views on S. 1040, the McClure bill of that year, criticized the sweeping attempts being made at that time to prohibit the manufacture and sale of certain kinds of handgun ammunition. Instead, he offered an amendment to impose mandatory prison terms for the use of this kind of ammunition during the commission of a crime. This proposal was endorsed by the Reagan administration and interested progun groups and enacted into law in 1984.

During consideration of S. 104, Senator DOLE made every effort to accommodate Senator SYMMS and supported the successful Symms amendment because it was consistent with views held by the majority leader since 1982 concerning the need to ensure that the coverage of the legislation be carefully circumscribed. It should also be emphasized that as majority leader, Senator DOLE has a responsibility to accommodate the interests of the entire Senate. When a bill passes by a margin of 97 to 1, as did S. 104, and is supported by such staunch gunowner's rights advocates as Senators MCCLURE, THURMOND, and DECONCINI, I would say the majority leader is doing his job right.

What I find very difficult to understand is why this mailing would make such charges when now, more than ever, gunowners' rights advocates need to be pulling together to get the McClure-Volkmer bill finally enacted into law. I applaud the fact that such leaders as J.E. Reinke and Bill Richardson so quickly rose to Senator DOLE's defense. Senate DOLE has been unfairly attacked and it is important that responsible gunowners speak out to ensure the record stands corrected.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, in addition to the Reinke and Richardson letters, an article which appeared in the March 29 Congressional Quarterly entitled "Miscues Costly in Politics of Obstruction" be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This article contains an excellent summary of Senator DOLE's contributions on behalf of gunowners.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL RIFLE
ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
Washington, DC, March 19, 1986.

Hon. BILL RICHARDSON,
The State Capitol, Sacramento, CA.

DEAR BILL: I very much regret the need to advise you of my overwhelming sense of outrage and disappointment at the vicious, totally uncalled for attack on Senator Robert Dole by your employee, Larry Pratt—see enclosed.

I do not have the time to list all of the many outstanding contributions made by Senator Dole to the cause of the National Rifle Association and all law abiding gun owners. For the purpose of this letter, it will suffice to say that without the Majority Leader's courage and forceful leadership, we would not have seen the United States Senate pass the Firearms Owners' Protection Act in July of 1985. I would remind you that this momentous event occurred during the first year of Senator Dole's term as Majority Leader of the Senate after languishing in that body since 1979.

As a veteran member of the California State Senate you, better than most, know the critical importance of having any majority leader on your side during heated legislative debate. If it's required that a U.S. House-passed pro-gun bill be returned to the Senate for confirmation, we will all lean heavily on the advice and direction of Senator Dole. I call upon you to do everything in your power to repudiate the scurrilous attack upon the Senator by Pratt, as I feel that you personally and the Gun Owners of America will want to disassociate yourselves from Mr. Pratt as quickly as possible.

If his actions reflected only upon himself and GOA, then I would never make such a request. However, those of us who have labored long and hard to reform the 1968 Gun Control Act will, in some eyes at least, be tarred with the same brush, and I intend to advise every member of the Congress not only that Pratt speaks for a misguided few, but that the National Rifle Association denounces both the individual and his utterances.

I am sorry that I must use such harsh language, but Pratt's actions deserve no less.

Sincerely,

J. E. REINKE,
President.

GUN OWNERS INC.,
Sacramento, CA, March 25, 1986.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Majority Leader, U.S. Senate, Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: I would like to apologize for some copy written by one of my employees in a recent Gun Owners newsletter. It was intemperate and ill-advised. It assuredly did not reflect my opinion nor the opinions of the rest of the leadership in Gun Owners.

I had a long conversation on the matter of this copy with two of my very good friends, Warren Cassidy and Jim Reinke of the National Rifle Association. I concur with them that you have been one of our leaders in the preservation of our Second Amendment Rights, and they made a good selection in choosing you as our speaker at the convention. I, too, had the pleasure of serving as director of the NRA for better than a decade.

I know of the difficulties you now face as a leader of the Senate. Hopefully Gun Owners can be an assistance to you in the years to come.

Sincerely,

H.L. RICHARDSON,
Founder and Chairman.

MISCUES COSTLY IN POLITICS OF OBSTRUCTION

(By Nadine Cohodas)

For much of the last 5½ years, House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino Jr., D-N.J., has acted like the little Dutch boy with his finger in the dike.

Ever since Ronald Reagan became president and the Republicans took control of the Senate, Rodino has been fighting to hold back a tide of legislation pressed by the conservative right: anti-abortion constitutional amendments, anti-busing legislation, constitutional amendments to require a balanced budget and to allow school prayer.

He has learned how to play obstructionist politics very well. Not one of these pieces of legislation has cleared Congress, although Rodino did have a scare in 1982 when the House was forced to consider a balanced-budget amendment after the Senate passed one. The amendment was defeated with the help of some deft moves choreographed by the House leadership.

But Rodino may not be so lucky on another issue set for floor action April 9. That day, the House is to consider two pieces of gun legislation. One, favored by the National Rifle Association (NRA), would loosen restrictions in the 1968 Gun Control Act. The other, approved by the Judiciary Committee, would ease some of the law's requirements but would keep restrictions on handguns.

The Judiciary bill is given little chance of passage against the NRA-backed bill, and Rodino and his allies have drafted amendments to the NRA proposal, trying to preserve elements of the 1968 law.

Since 1979, when the NRA accelerated efforts to change the 1968 act, Rodino has bottled up the gun issue in the House. But this year his fortunes changed, and the fight over gun control nicely illustrates the amorphous and mercurial nature of obstructionist politics.

To succeed, the obstructionist must have an accurate measure of his own strength and his opponent's. He rarely is acting in isolation, especially in the House, where the rules make it difficult, though not impossible, for one person to sway the actions of the other 434.

In Rodino's case, he has not been acting only for himself. His ability to keep divisive matters off the floor is supported by dozens of members who privately applaud him and his committee for saving them from controversial votes. As a result, they don't flock to sign "discharge petitions" on abortion, busing or school prayer that would push these issues onto the House floor. (When 218 members sign a petition, they can force action.)

But guns are different. And this time around, it appears that Rodino and William J. Hughes, D-N.J., chairman of Judiciary's Crime Subcommittee, misjudged congressional sentiment.

They probably didn't bargain for the relatively quick Senate action in 1985; the NRA bill bypassed the Senate Judiciary Committee and went directly onto the Senate calendar. And they might have forgotten to watch the key Senate player—not James A. McClure, R-Idaho, the bill's sponsor, but Majority Leader Robert Dole, R-Kan. Dole gave the NRA something they couldn't get under his predecessor, Howard H. Baker Jr., R-Tenn.: floor time.

Although the Senate Judiciary Committee had approved gun legislation in 1982, Baker refused to let it come to the floor. But when Dole became majority leader, he decided there had been enough debate and that it was time for action.

It was not the first time Dole had done something for gun owners. In a 1982 catch-all spending bill he quietly inserted an amendment that lifted record-keeping requirements for .22-caliber bullets. And he inserted a provision in a 1984 trade bill that lifted import restrictions on many World War II weapons.

After the Senate acted in July, Hughes and Rodino apparently underestimated the momentum generated by its overwhelming 79–15 vote for the NRA bill.

Rodino was an unwitting catalyst. He pronounced the Senate bill "dead on arrival" in the House, and his comment, while catchy, was inflammatory. It helped convince some members that once again he would bury gun legislation. And it played into the hands of Harold L. Volkmer, D-Mo., who was circulating a discharge petition to get the bill on the floor.

Hughes seemed to misjudge the atmosphere as well. He waited until September to announce that his panel would hold hearings on gun control in Washington, D.C., and several other cities. The hearings didn't begin until late October, and contrary to the advice of gun control advocates, the out-of-town sessions were held in San Francisco and New York, two cities the gun lobby portrayed as too liberal and unrepresentative. Hughes' supporters had wanted him to go to the heart of gun country, Dallas and Denver, and get testimony from police and citizens there about how important gun control was.

With Volkmer and 203 supporters breathing down his neck by February, Hughes was still planning to hold more hearings. But the House leadership realized the threat, and told him to move a bill.

Hughes and the full committee promptly complied. Judiciary even managed to get a 35–0 vote on a consensus measure that was reported March 14. But the bill was immediately attacked by the NRA and its House supporters as unworkable and misguided.

The law enforcement community likes the bill, however, and for the first time, police groups are actively lobbying for the legislation. Rodino ultimately may be able to salvage some of what he wants in the gun fight April 9. But in this instance he is not marching smartly into battle. He's been pushed.

THE RETIREMENT OF MAYOR CLAYTON LODOEN

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, recently one of North Dakota's outstanding public servants stepped down from the office of mayor of West Fargo. While Clayton Lodoen may be retiring as mayor, a position he has held since 1966, he will continue to serve North Dakota in the State senate. Few Americans can boast of providing the strength and leadership so fundamental to State and local government that has embodied Clayton's public service. He has long been a friend of mine, and I salute his personal dedication and 20 years of work on behalf of his fellow North Dakotans.

I ask unanimous consent to have the following editorial from the Fargo Forum printed here in its entirety so my colleagues and fellow North Dakotans may read the tribute to this truly outstanding American.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LODOEN GAVE LEADERSHIP

Mayor Clayton Lodoen, West Fargo's man for all seasons, is stepping down after 20 years of presiding over this anomalous kind of town, one part suburb and one part Chicagoland. Packing plant, stockyards, rapid growth, waterfront problems, (Sheyenne River), West Fargo has fought the good fight and progressed marvelously.

Lodoen, a former U.S. Marine, has led the way to preserve the tax base, zone for orderly growth, provide utilities and services, fight floods, and clean up the night life. All this in a city that has tripled in size since Lodoen was first elected in 1966.

Lodoen didn't run for re-election this year, feeling it was time to cut back on his activities an give someone else a chance at the helm. Florenz Bjornson was elected to succeed him.

The grey-haired, ramrod straight Lodoen, at 63, isn't about to retire from public life. He is still a North Dakota state senator, where he is president pro tem, and still carries on some real estate and insurance business in West Fargo.

So we are not saying farewell to Lodoen, but writing a concluding chapter to his career as mayor and congratulating him for a job extremely well done.

We like the way he has:

Fought spring floods, and led the city's efforts to get a Sheyenne River Diversion around the city that appears near passage by Congress.

Helped keep city revenues in the black while also keeping taxes down.

Worn two hats—senatorial and mayoral—in passing legislation to allow the city to bar nude go-go dancing in night spots. West Fargo had been fighting prostitution that emanated from some of these places. The legislation is a model that is used by other cities.

Fought pollution in sewage disposal through expansion of the city's sewage treatment plant.

Built a new city hall suitable to this community that has grown to 11,000 on the western edge of Fargo.

Fargo taxpayers may not appreciate the fact that the West Acres shopping center, while a part of Fargo, remains in the West Fargo School District. But without this commercial property in that city's school district, it is difficult to imagine how enough schools could have been built to handle growing enrollments. The legislative coup that accomplished this was led by Lodoen, wearing his Senate hat.

Clayton Lodoen deserves our congratulations as he retires as West Fargo mayor.

THE MHD GAP

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I would like to call attention to two articles regarding the role of magnetohydrodynamic [MHD] generators in the SDI Program. I am concerned that the United States is overlooking an important alternative power source.

A November 1985 document, "Soviet Strategic Defense Programs," released jointly by the Department of State and the Department of Defense, states:

> The Soviets appear generally capable of supplying the prime power, energy storage and auxiliary components needed for most laser and other directed-energy weapons. They have developed a rocket-driven magnetohydrodynamic generator which produces over 15 megawatts of electrical power—a device that has no counterpart in the West.

The generator the document refers to is an open cycle generator which runs on special solid fuels. The use of high-power sources of short, single current pulses makes it possible to avoid the use of forced cooling systems for the generator, to simplify the systems of receiving stations and to be more flexible in selecting the time for conducting a measurement session while achieving the most favorable signal-to-noise ratio.

The MHD generator was introduced in the U.S.S.R. around 1968 by Dr. Y.P. Velikhov, president of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences and chairman of Soviet Scientists in Defense for Peace and Against Nuclear War. Dr. Velikhov recognized the vast potential of the MHD generator, and today the Soviets have further developed the unit for use in ballistic shields and laser weapons.

This power source could undoubtedly be a valuable asset to the U.S. SDI Program. It is a proven, effective generator whose capability exceeds any in present use.

Why then is the MHD generator technology not being exploited in the United States? Further research turned up an interesting twist to this question—not only do we have the capability, we are the initial developer, and still it is not in use.

The preliminary stages of the MHD development began in the early 1960's at the University of Tennessee Space Institute [UTSI]. At that time there was a great deal of interest and cooperation from the Department of Defense. Toward the late 1960's, however, military interest began to wane. Only the Air Force continued its involvement in the testing, and even that was scaled down considerably.

In the early 1970's the oil embargo hit. The early testing at UTSI had resulted in a coal-fired generator, thus increasing the desirability of MHD during this critical period. The United States increased its development programs, as did several other nations, including the Soviet Union. This trend continued until the mid-1970's when the pulse-generator era started to wind down.

The Soviet Union did not slow its program, however. Their development programs are continuing today, with research proving that they were correct in their belief in the potential of the MHD generator.

Over the past 25 years, all the data, experiments and accomplishments of the MHD generator support the conclusion that the combustion-driven MHD pulse generators are a viable power supply for space or remote terrestrial applications. We have the technology, the capability and the facilities; I believe the United States should resume and intensify its research and application of the MHD generator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have these articles printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"SOVIET STRATEGIC DEFENSE PROGRAMS"

(By Department of Defense and Department of State)

ADVANCED TECHNOLOGIES FOR DEFENSE AGAINST BALLISTIC MISSILES

In the late 1960s, in line with its long-standing emphasis on strategic defense, the Soviet Union initiated a substantial research program into advanced technologies for defense against ballistic missiles. That program covers many of the same technologies involved in the U.S. Strategic Defense Initiative, but represents a far greater investment of plant space, capital, and manpower.

Laser Weapons

The USSR's laser program is much larger than U.S. efforts and involves over 10,000 scientists and engineers and more than a half dozen major research and development facilities and test ranges. Much of this research takes place at the Sary Shagan Missile Test Center where the Soviets also conduct traditional ABM research. Facilities there are estimated to include several air defense lasers, a laser that may be capable of damaging some components of satellites in orbit, and a laser that could be used in feasibility testing for ballistic missile defense applications. A laser weapon program of the magnitude of the Soviet effort would cost roughly $1 billion per year in the U.S.

The Soviets are conducting research in three types of gas lasers considered promising for weapons applications: the gas-dynamic laser; the electric discharge laser; and the chemical laser. Soviet achievements in this area, in terms of output power, have been impressive. The Soviets are also aware of the military potential of visible and very short wave-length lasers. They are investigating excimer, free-electron, and x-ray lasers, and have been developing argon-ion lasers for over a decade.

The Soviets appear generally capable of supplying the prime power, energy storage, and auxiliary components needed for most laser and other directed-energy weapons. They have developed a rocket-driven magnetohydrodynamic generator which produces over 15 megawatts of electrical power—a device that has no counterpart in the West. The Soviets may also have the capability to develop the optical systems necessary for laser weapons to track and attack their targets. Thus, they produced a 1.2-meter segmented mirror for an astrophysical telescope in 1978 and claimed that this was a prototype for a 25-meter mirror that would be constructed in the future. A large mirror is considered necessary for a space-based laser weapon.

Unlike the U.S., the USSR has now progressed in some cases beyond technology research. It already has ground-based lasers that could be used to interfere with U.S. satellites, and could have prototype space-based antisatellite laser weapons by the end of the decade. The Soviets could have prototypes for ground-based lasers for defense against ballistic missiles by the late 1980s, and could begin testing components for a large-scale deployment system in the early 1990s.

The remaining difficulties in fielding an operational system will require still more development time. An operational ground-based laser for defense against ballistic missiles probably could not be deployed until the late 1990s, or after the year 2000. If technology developments prove successful, the Soviets may deploy operational space-based antisatellite lasers in the 1990s, and might be able to deploy space-based laser systems for defense against ballistic missiles after the year 2000.

SOVIETS TAKE LEAD IN SPACE LASERS

(By Jack Anderson and Dale Van Atta)

The superpowers' contest for military supremacy in space continues, and the Soviets appear to be substantially ahead in the latest round: laser weapons.

CIA sources have told us they've discovered a major laser test center at Krasnoarmeysk, 30 miles northeast of Moscow. Even more alarming, the facility is believed to be actually producing laser weapons.

Evidence of the priority the Soviets place on the Krasnoarmeysk weapons plant, the CIA has determined, is that it is operated by an integrated design bureau.

Ordinarily the Soviets borrow the capitalist technique of competing design bureaus for everything from tanks to ballistic missiles. They have found that the competition eventually produces better weapons—but it's too time-consuming for a top-priority program.

"The Soviets have had a research program under way since 1970 aimed at developing lasers with weapons applications," notes a top-secret CIA report.

The program includes at least a half-dozen major research and development facilities and test ranges. More than 10,000 scientists and engineers are involved.

By way of comparison, the CIA estimates that a similar U.S. laser weapons program would cost about $1 billion a year. But the United States only began playing catch-up during the Reagan administration, with about $800 million earmarked for laser weapons research in 1986.

One of the unique features of the Soviet laser program is the development of a rocket-driven magnetohydrodynamic (MHD) generator, which produces 15 megawatts of short-term electricity as a fire-power source for the lasers.

A secret State Department report on the MHD explains that "it generates current by passing a conducting fluid through a magnetic field." The report adds this disturbing comment:

"Their [the Soviets'] MHD work is the largest in the world and continues to grow. Power outputs already achieved exceed those in the West several fold, and both rocket power and liquid metal system inputs could have potential for military programs in high-energy lasers, charged particle beams and space-borne laser power supplies. MHD is a technology area where the Soviets clearly lead the U.S. in demonstrated capability."

In fact, there is no counterpart device in the West.

Both the CIA and the Pentagon believe that the Soviets already have ground-based lasers that could interfere with U.S. satellites, and they estimate that by the late 1980s the Russians could have at least prototype space-based laser weapons that could incapacitate U.S. satellites.

The actual development of space-based lasers for antisatellite use is a tricky business, however, and the intelligence experts figure that the Soviets won't have mastered this before the 1990s.

The various reports and estimates, which accumulate with virtually every top-secret satellite photograph and analysis of it, all demonstrate that the Buck Rogers "ray gun" won't wait for Dr. Huer to come along in the 25th century.

THE WASHINGTON POST PRAISES THE SENATE'S WATER RESOURCES BILL

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, just prior to the recess, the Senate passed S. 1567, the omnibus water resources bill, then substituted the Senate-passed language as an amendment to H.R. 6, and requested a conference with the House.

While the Senate was in recess, the Washington Post carried an editorial discussing the Senate's version of this water resources development bill. This editorial referred to the Senate's bill as "sensible," and noted that "Congress seems headed down the right path."

Mr. President, I agree.

This editorial is a tribute to the Senate. It is also a great tribute to our colleague, JIM ABDNOR, chairman of the Subcommittee on Water Resources. Senator ABDNOR worked hard and effectively to shape this bill and to win Senate passage of this legislation.

He led the fight for a disciplined, realistic bill. He deserves the special thanks of the Senate for this editorial.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 28, 1986]

WATER BILLS

Passage of a rivers and harbors bill used to be an important festival in Congress. Not since the early 1970s has there been one of any size. The main reason has been a dispute, first with President Carter, then with President Reagan, over the extent to which the federal government should any longer bear the cost. Now it appears that dispute may be ending. The Senate this week passed a sensible bill that, on the one hand, authorizes $11 billion in new projects but, on the other, requires beneficiaries to share the cost. The House passed similar albeit less disciplined legislation last year—$20 billion in projects and less cost-sharing. The administration has said the House bill is unacceptable, but the matter now goes to conference. A fair compromise ought to be possible.

The Reagan administration has insisted on cost-sharing on fiscal and philosophical grounds. It likes user fees, in part for the money they save, in part on the theory that government subsidies distort investment decisions and detract from efficient use of resources. The Senate bill would require the immediate beneficiaries of flood control projects to put up a fourth to a third of the cost. Communities will think twice about projects they used to accept happily because they were "free." That at least is the theory. There will be cargo fees to help pay for work on ports and a barge fuel tax increase to support work on inland waterways.

These partial deterrents may also have useful environmental effects. That was one of the reasons the Carter administration was drawn to them. Large water projects disturb the environment almost by definition; some do serious damage. Environmentalists tend to think the fewer the better.

Some of the projects in both bills remain dubious, both on environmental grounds and because the benefits don't match the costs. Not all these will be dropped in conference; they never are. But some will also be caught up by the new cost-sharing rules, and all these projects are authorizations only. It remains for the appropriations committees to choose—and to spread the expenditures so as not to burden the deficit.

It is tempting for all who live at a distance to write off all public works expenditures as pork. Not fair. Kept from excess, this is a necessary process in national investment; the cost-sharing principle is important. Congress seems headed down the right path.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 2:30 P.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there are a number of us who will be attending a luncheon today with the Prime Minister of Japan, Mr. Nakasone. Because of that, and the fact we are waiting on one or two Senators with reference to the crime bill legislation, I move the Senate now stand in recess until 2:30 p.m. today.

The motion was agreed to; and, at 12:59 p.m., the Senate recessed until 2:30; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. ABDNOR).

JOHN Q. PUBLIC OF THE REAL WORLD

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the concerns on which attention is currently focused here in Washington, DC, the seat of the government of the world's strongest country, are not the center of reality for the people of the United States.

The real world for most Americans is in the job place, and that is shaky; hanging on to the family farm, liquidation threatens; or business endeavors; basic industries are going under.

The family pocketbook and savings accounts are getting flattened and drained. Family and business debts are big worries. In short, these are the pressing real world concerns of the citizenry.

In contrast, we find the government of this country concentrating on Qadhafi and Libya, Nicaragua and the Contras, and David Stockman's book about his and the White House economic failures.

Each of these concerns intertwine in an unholy trinity to dominate the Federal Government's attention. They can only dominate the attention of the people in terms of frustration that their elected officials ignore the real problems of the country.

For those who take former Budget Director David Stockman too seriously, such as President Reagan and his staff plus national party leaders, they all deserve each other and Stockman's barbs.

On Libya and Nicaragua, there is a common problem—both countries of about 3 million people have misguided, irresponsible heads of state threatening terrorism or killing their neighbors. The use of overwhelming U.S. naval strength against Qadhafi should be approached with caution.

What next? President Reagan has not said.

But the President has not proposed, as he probably should, similar U.S. naval patrols in the Caribbean to stop armament shipments into Nicaragua from the Soviets and/or Cuba.

Instead, he tells John and Mary Q. Public that the rag-tag Nicaraguan Contras, with $100 million in United States aid now and more later with which to kill a few hundred more people, is the United States policy. The Publics only shake their heads in profound disbelief.

Imagine, with me, what John and Mary Q. Public must think as they contemplate the realities of Hometown, U.S.A.

The family paycheck has shrunk. Their 23-year-old son's job is irregular and low paying, and their college-trained daughter's best job so far is at a fast food counter. One of the next door neighbors' kids, because college loans were not available, dropped out of college.

But they are even more concerned that Mrs. Public's brother and nephew seem to be losing the old family farm. They have been told to contribute some of their time and assist with donations at their church food bank, which helps the community's jobless families after their town's manufacturing plant closed down last year. Despite hearing from their farm kin and reading press accounts of huge surpluses of commodities in Federal storage, none of it has trickled down to be used in their church food bank.

Television portrayals of terrorist attacks draw their attention and are discussed at the supper table. They ponder, wondering if the Federal controls on air travel safety should be beefed up. One of them recalls an acquaintance who is a flight controller never rehired after the strike. They ponder whether air traffic is safe but wonder if it has been cut too much. While the family favors the National Aeronautics and Space Administration [NASA], space exploration and space shuttles, they have noted the speedup in launches—11 of them scheduled in 1986—and they wonder how much they had to do with the President's plan for expanded star wars research.

All of the John Q. Public family have tightened their belts. They worry over the economy and are convinced that it is outrageous that some of the Pentagon procurement is wasted on high-priced equipment or canceled weapons that do not work. They particularly note as April 15 approaches and passes that profitable megabuck corporations still pay no income taxes.

Their puzzlement is growing and their anger is simmering.

Their city and school taxes are on the increase because Federal funds have been cut. That has resulted in municipal garbage and landfill curtailment and a slowdown in a toxic dump cleanup on the edge of town.

Mary, a former schoolteacher, is particularly concerned that federally funded reading and math teaching assistance has been cut in the local schools.

But the over-coffee talk that John Q. has picked up about foreign aid increases has sparked more than one evening's family discussion. He is a World War II veteran. One of his Army buddies is having difficulty qualifying for sorely needed veterans health care. The health of their immediate family has always been good, but his parents have needed help in meeting hospital costs, even though both are covered under Medicare, because the couple's savings virtually evaporated.

The John Q. Public family is not too concerned about Stockman's book, hopes the President knows what he is doing about Qadhafi, but what is this about $100 million for Nicaragua—and just who are the Contras? They agree it is about time they write their Congressman and their Senators.

Well, if that is not the way it is happening in the real world of the John Q. Public family in Hometown, U.S.A., at least these are the concerns expressed that I find in my letters.

There is real work to be done for Hometown, U.S.A., and the Publics know it even if Washington does not.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PROPER RESPONSE TO THE LIBYAN THREAT

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, certainly it has been established beyond doubt that Libyan leader Mu'ammar Qadhafi has threatened the United States and many other nations. I am convinced that it would be in our best interests if he no longer served as head of that country.

The best way to achieve that result would be to help those who have their own good reasons to seek his removal. I am not suggesting that we abandon our current prohibition on assassination. I am certainly not talking about putting out a contract on him. I am suggesting a program of assistance to those Libyans who oppose his regime and would like to see their country rescued from Qadhafi's wild adventures and repressive rule.

By all accounts, there is strong domestic opposition to Qadhafi—from segments of the military, from the middle class, from ordinary Libyans who have not benefited from his one-man revolution.

There have been over a dozen serious coup attempts directed against Qadhafi in this decade. Libya is thus ripe for a coup, and we should be supporting those who could bring it about.

Instead of aiding this opposition, current U.S policy has the effect of legitimizing Qadhafi among his countrymen and rallying them around him in patriotic fervor.

We also should be working quietly with other Arab nations who fear Qadhafi's expansiveness, his diplomatic intrigue, and his outright terrorism. They have their own good reasons for opposing Qadhafi, but they have felt compelled to show Arab solidarity in response to America's gunboat diplomacy.

Instead of such a policy—low profile, but tough and smart—we have been sailing warships around the Mediterranean and threatening unspecified additional military actions. We are not practicing the wise counsel of Theodore Roosevelt, to "speak softly but carry a big stick."

It would surprise no one—least of all Libyans at possible target sites—if we launched an attack. But such a retaliatory strike is not likely to be effective at eliminating either Qadhafi or the vicious terrorism which he supports.

There is no doubt in my mind that Libya has been directly involved in recent terrorist incidents, including the West Berlin bombing. What is at issue is not the question of guilt, but the question of how best we ought to respond to Qadhafi's terrorism in the context of both short-range and long-range foreign policy goals. This requires a balance, which does not appear we have achieved.

In recent days, U.S. officials have been publicly pressuring our European allies to join with us in denouncing Qadhafi and taking tough economic sanctions. Thus far, the European response has been disappointing, for they too should recognize and work to counter this Libyan threat. Unfortunately, our loud public efforts have led mainly to calls for U.S. restraint.

A lower profile is more likely to be effective than our current posture of blustery confrontation and imminent conflict. The terrorist threat is too real, and Qadhafi is too great a danger to civilization, for us to be diverted by military displays which offer little promise of promoting our true national interests in this situation. Threatening Qadhafi by destroying a missile battery or two and sinking a couple of patrol boats may be gratifying, but actions such as these, when they are ends in themselves, may in fact be counterproductive.

We discovered in Lebanon that a limited military response risks American lives without accomplishing our objectives. We should not send our men into harm's way when there is a better alternative still available. Our real goal is that of ending the terrorist threat that Libya's current ruler poses to the world. I do not believe that our present policy will reach that end.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

Morning business is closed.

ANTI-VIOLENCE AMENDMENT TO THE HOBBS ACT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of Calendar No. 353, S. 1774, the Hobbs Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SPECTER. Objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 353, S. 1774, the Hobbs Act, and I send a cloture motion to the desk. I understand the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania wanted to speak on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 1774, a bill to amend section 1951 of title 18 of the United States Code, and for other purposes.

Bob Dole, Jesse Helms, Malcolm Wallop, Gordon Humphrey, Paul Laxalt, Don Nickles, Mack Mattingly, Phil Gramm, Steve Symms, Thad Cochran, J. Denton, Al Simpson, Chuck Grassley, Jake Garn, Mitch McConnell and Orrin Hatch.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would inform my colleagues a vote on the cloture motion on the motion to proceed would come on Wednesday. It may be that prior to that time we could reach some agreement on maybe letting us proceed to the bill. But in any event, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania advised me last Thursday that he wanted to be present when this effort was made and so we have waited. The Senator was available and he would now like to make a statement. I would hope that perhaps after some debate, if we cannot complete action on the so-called technical amendments on the crime bill, we would not stay in too late this evening because both the distinguished minority leader and I have other engagements all afternoon.

Mr. BYRD. Will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader. We on this side were cleared for action on the motion to proceed. I had informed the distinguished majority leader to that extent, that we were not going to in any way attempt to delay the motion to proceed to take up the measure. But that consent has been objected to by the Senator who is acting within his rights and within the rules. I just wanted to say for the RECORD that the majority leader at least as far as this side is concerned was cleared to proceed to the measure.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator is correct; we did have that conversation and that indication was made.

Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for scheduling proceeding on the amendment to the Hobbs Act to allow this Senator to be present. I have registered my objection to the unanimous consent request propounded by the majority leader to proceed because it is my sense that this is a matter of fundamental importance and it ought to be debated at each step of the way so that this body can focus attention of this important issue. Moreover, the public ought to be informed as to what is involved and the Members of this body must have ample opportunity to focus on this issue which is, realistically viewed, the purpose of our extended considerations and extended debate.

The issue which is before the Senate at this time on the underlying merits contains an effort to amend the Hobbs Act to make alleged assault and battery cases on a union picket line a matter of a Federal violation warranting criminal prosecution in the Federal courts. It is my view that that is most unwise, and I say so having had substantial experience as a prosecuting attorney on matters involving labor violence.

Based on that experience, it is my view that the State courts and State prosecutors are well equipped to handle these matters if union violence is involved and that it is unwise to bring that matter to the Federal courts, to make a Federal case out of it, to bring the Federal Government into the picture at a time when there is a heavy emphasis on limiting the Federal role and leaving the majority of action to State and local governments.

The issue of picket line violence is properly a matter, under American law and American jurisprudence, to be handled at the local level.

Criminal prosecution in every State gives a responsibility to a district attorney in States like Pennsylvania, a county attorney in States like Kansas, a prosecutor of the pleas in some States, and it is the responsibility of the county official to make the baseline determination. County prosecutors are equipped to do so.

I cite my own experience as an assistant district attorney in the case of Commonwealth of Pennsylvania versus Local 107 Teamsters. Six Teamster officials were indicted in Pennsylvania in 1959 arising out of evidence acquired by the McClellan Committee, which investigated union corruption and union violence in a series of celebrated hearings in the U.S. Senate. In the hearing procedure in this body, back in the mid-1950's, a very well-known and very distinguished committee undertook that investigation.

At the conclusion of the hearings, the committee then turned evidence over to a variety of State prosecutors and turned over an abundance of evidence to the district attorney's office of Pennsylvania. I was assistant district attorney and brought the case to trail in March of 1963. It was a complex case which lasted for more than 10 weeks and involved some 250 witnesses who took the stand. Some 1,160 exhibits were presented in that case. As a result, all six of the Teamster officials were convicted, and all went to jail.

A significant part of that prosecution involved union violence on picket lines, where there were beatings, severe beatings, where there was assault and battery, and where there was aggravated assault and battery. The local prosecutors' office was fully equipped to handle that kind of case. There was no need for the Federal prosecutor to intervene, no need to bring the Federal Government into the matter, no need to make a Federal case out of it.

Mr. President, there are ample procedures for redress short of making an assault and battery case a Federal matter, even if the local prosecutor, for one reason or another, fails or refuses to act.

In Pennsylvania, which is illustrative of the general rule, the State attorney general may supersede the district attorney in cases where the district attorney fails or refuses to act. There are solid common-law precedents generally—although I do not purport now to comment on the detailed laws of all 50 States which give the attorneys general in the United States the authority to supersede local district attorneys where DA's act improperly or refuse to prosecute.

If the attorney general should similarly refuse to act, there is a statute in Pennsylvania—a statute duplicated in many States in the United States—which authorizes the private injured party to file a petition with the court showing that the district attorney has failed or refused to act, and the presiding judge of that county, in any one of Pennsylvania's 67 counties, then has the authority to appoint private counsel to act as the prosecuting attorney in that case.

So that if you have a matter where there is some overtone of inaction, inappropriate inaction, and there are strong reasons to proceed with the prosecution—and customarily in matters of this sort, there are well-represented parties on both sides—the case may go forward. In cases which have been heard by the Judiciary Committee, for example, frequently several injunction proceedings are pending at the same time. These are matters where counsel are present, and certainly there is an opportunity for private counsel to come in and file such a petition and act and displace the district attorney, if that is warranted under the facts of the case.

There is a solid precedent for private counsel acting in criminal prosecutions, with the vast majority of the States in the United States having case law which supports private counsel, for example, and for assisting the district attorney when there is a strong private reason for intervention.

Mr. President, this issue has been heard extensively by the Committee on the Judiciary. A number of the matters have involved incidents arriving out of Pennsylvania. This Senator has inquired into those matters and has found in every one of them that there were ample opportunities for full redress of any valid interest on the part of the injured party or full opportunities for redress by having a criminal prosecution which could have been brought, had the parties really wished to do so.

In some situations, there is not a possibility for identifying who the assailants are. Obviously, a Federal prosecutor can no more proceed in the absence of positive identification than can a district attorney or a private citizen.

Mr. President, I express further concern in this matter as to what the real import of this amendment may be. I am concerned that there may be an intent or an effort to utilize such a law, if it were to be passed by Congress and signed by the President, to stifle or chill the expression of freedom of speech as it is embodied in peaceful picketing. The cases are legion in which the Supreme Court of the United States has upheld peaceful picketing as a right of freedom of speech—that is, an expression of freedom of speech.

If those who are expressing their right of freedom of speech are going to be concerned that there may be a Federal marshal present or there may be an assistant U.S. attorney present or an allusion that they will take the case to a Federal court, that can have a very chilling effect.

If there were an effort to amend the Hobbs Act to show that there is some element of conspiracy or some element of organized crime or some conspiratorial act of organized crime, this Senator's view would be quite different. In the opinion of this Senator, the amendment goes too far when it makes the simple assault and battery case a violation of the Federal law.

Mr. President, I further express a question—perhaps more strongly stated, some misgivings—about the procedure in this bill reaching the floor at this time, although the procedural meanderings of the Senate are complex and sometimes subject to some wonderment. This bill was defeated in the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee held extensive hearings on the bill in this, the 99th Congress, the 98th Congress, and also in the 97th Congress. We had a vote on it in the Judiciary Committee on September 12, 1985, and the Committee turned this bill down.

Now it is on the calendar, having been held at the desk and having moved to another legislative day. I think that procedure further warrants some special inquiry at this time.

Without foreclosing any further activity, Mr. President, let me say at this time it is not my intention to filibuster this matter. I do not intend to do so because I believe that the Senate ought to move ahead with the consideration of its regular business, and we have a great deal to take care of on our agenda, but I do not believe it is a difficult problem to have the motion to proceed considered by the Senate today.

We are not exactly overflowing with Senate business on the floor of the Senate today. Outside of a fair number of interested spectators in the galleries, a few members of the press, a few attentive pages, a few staff members, the floor of the Senate is populated today, and I trust I violate no rule of our august body by saying so, by the distinguished Presiding Officer, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, Senator COCHRAN, and by yours truly, the Senator from Pennsylvania, who is making this speech.

So in expressing myself on the motion to proceed, I am not putting aside any other more pressing business of the Senate at this moment.

But I know that our colleagues are all hard at work, many of them in their own States. I already thanked the majority leader for awaiting my arrival because I was in Pennsylvania, arrived in Washington within a half hour or just a few moments before coming here. Our colleagues are very busy in their own States attending to many matters around this country, and some are doubtless in their offices in the Capitol here in Washington, DC, today and perhaps some of those in their offices have their squawkboxes on and it may even be that some are listening. If that be so, then let the consideration proceed.

Mr. President, as you know, and our association has been extensive the past 5½ years, this Senator does not take the floor on too many occasions, and I have not participated in any filibusters, but some extended debate on some subjects like Conrail that are very important to Pennsylvania.

But I feel very strongly about this issue, having been in the trenches on it and having seen exactly what it means to handle assault and battery cases and serious assault and battery cases and knowing that they can adequately be handled by local prosecuting attorneys. I really believe in a sense that it is an affront to the local prosecutors of America to say you need to bring the Federal prosecutor into the picture in the Hobbs Act because the local district attorney cannot handle the assault and battery cases. The district attorneys across America handle more than assault and battery cases. They can handle complex cases involving murder. I think the record is plain that by and large district attorneys handle assault and battery cases even when they involve union violence.

There are adequate remedies through State attorneys general and private prosecutors to protect the rights of those injured and ample remedies in a civil context, so there is no need to make a Federal case out of a fist fight on a picket line.

That is especially true, at least in the opinion of this Senator, where there are first amendment issues involved; the right to freedom of speech is exemplified by the right to peaceful picketing.

Mr. President, as the debate moves forward on this matter, this Senator will have additional comments to make in amplification, but that, in the course of a few minutes this afternoon, expresses my sense of the issue and my reasons for registering the objection on the motion to proceed at this time.

I thank the Chair.

I yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCONNELL). Without objection, it is so ordered.

VICTORY OF THE HUMAN SPIRIT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, today is a magnificent spring day in the Nation's Capital. I think it reminds us all of how fortunate we are to be here to represent our home States and to enjoy the peace and freedom of this great country—indeed, to be alive.

That is why I would like to pay special recognition to a very bittersweet anniversary on this day. It was this day 41 years ago that forever changed the life of one our most distinguished Senate colleagues.

Back then, he was known simply as 2d Lt. Robert Dole, a brave, 21-year-old platoon leader, who left the University of Kansas in his premedical studies and varsity athletics for the Jayhawks in 1943 to take on the Nazi hordes.

His athletic prowess, intelligence and unusal leadership abilities made him a natural for one of the elite units of the U.S. Army—the 10th Mountain Division, a crack group of Olympic-class athletes and college students whose unenviable job it was to storm the rugged Italian mountains—often times on skis—to root out the deeply entrenched German forces. Soon after he arrived in Italy, the young man from Russell, KS, became known as the finest platoon leader his men had ever had. Believe me, I am not surprised; nor are those of us that serve with him on either side of the aisle. So he is now my platoon leader. It is a great honor to be his first sergeant in these ranks.

And so it came that on April 14, 1945, Second Lieutenant Dole found himself on hill 913, one of those nameless battlefields that can speak volumes about heroism but is somehow lost in the pages of history. But history does tell us that the 10th Mountain Division was indeed a legendary outfit. It had set high standards indeed, having never yielded one inch of ground it had ever taken back from the enemy. In fact, on that April day in 1945, the 10th Mountain Division took more casualties than all other allied forces in Italy combined. The resistance was fearsome: The Dole platoon was pinned down near a mine field, and raked by deadly accurate German snipers, mortar fire and well-fortified machine gun bunkers. It was on this day 41 years ago—near a tiny mountain village called Castel D'Aiano—that Senator BOB DOLE, our superb majority leader, was struck down by a torrent of enemy fire. He had moved into a foxhole to try to save a fallen friend. But in an instant an explosion—a machine gun shell, a mortar round, no one knows for sure—tore into his body. He was left for dead on the battlefield.

So today is an anniversary. The anniversary of an inspirational and almost unbelievable comeback. Because from the agony of that foxhole, BOB DOLE beat all the odds. In the face of catastrophe, he set out on a long and difficult journey back to the living. It started on a stretcher on an Italian hillside and took him all the way to a slot on the 1976 Presidential ticket and to the leadership of the U.S. Senate. His comeback included 39 months of hospitalization and years of rehabilitation; a roller coaster of hope and despair with several brushes with death along the way. First, he was told he would never walk again. From a robust 192 pounds he dropped to 120. He was to experience 108 degree body temperatures and severe kidney problems. Then there was a string of painful operations. And the knowledge that his medical career was over before it had ever started. But we all know how the story came out.

Mr. President, a few nights ago at the Kennedy Center, four disabled Americans were honored for their remarkable life achievements. Our Senate leader was one of them. The award he received is called "The Victory of the Human Spirit" and I can think of no one more deserving of this honor than BOB DOLE.

I am so very proud of my good friend from Kansas. Sometimes in the heat of the combat of everyday politics we forget that our Senate is an extraordinary collection of unique individuals, with fascinating backgrounds, and often very touching and moving experiences in those backgrounds that shaped them. We never take much time to share those things with each other in this Chamber as we go through the hurtling experiences of the day. But let me just say that today is a day to recall—BOB DOLE's day. We can all learn much from his "victory of the human spirit." He is a very special person to me, and to us all.

God bless him.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REFORM OF FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN STATE PROCEEDINGS ACT OF 1986

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I send a bill to the desk, on behalf of myself and others, and ask that it be read for the first time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2301) to reform procedures for collateral review of criminal judgments and for other purposes.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask that it be read a second time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The bill will be held at the desk.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am introducing two bills, habeas corpus legislation and exclusionary rule legislation, and asking that they be placed directly on the calendar. I am pleased to be joined in offering this legislation by several of my distinguished colleagues on the Judiciary Committee, Senators DECONCINI, LAXALT, HATCH, and DENTON.

The bills I am introducing today cover the same issues that were placed before, and fully considered by, the Judiciary Committee in two previous Congresses. In fact, these bills are identical to S. 237, Exclusionary Rule Reform, and S. 238, Habeas Corpus Reform, that I introduced during the first session of this Congress on January 22, 1985, and which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Over the last several Congresses the Judiciary Committee has devoted a great deal of time to these issues. During the 97th Congress, the committee held three hearings on exclusionary rule legislation and two hearings on habeas corpus legislation.

In the 98th Congress, the committee considered these issues in a series of hearings held on the comprehensive crime control bill and reported out S. 1763, Habeas Corpus Reform, and S. 1764, Exclusionary Rule Reform. The Senate overwhelmingly approved both of these bills. S. 1763, Habeas Corpus Reform, passed by a vote of 67-9 on February 6, 1984, and S. 1764, Exclusionary Rule Reform, passed by a vote of 63-24 on February 7, 1984.

At the time I introduced S. 237 and S. 238 last year, I did not ask that they be placed directly on the calendar even though they are identical to the legislation that passed last Congress, because I wanted to give the committee one more opportunity to consider these issues. The committee has had that opportunity for the last 13 months. These bills have been on the agenda on the committee since September 12, 1985. The committee held hearings on S. 237 on October 2, 1985, and on S. 238 on October 8, 1985. Even though the committee has fully considered these issues in previous Congresses and there is tremendous support for these bills as demonstrated last Congress, the committee still has not been able to proceed to a final vote on these bills this Congress.

By having these bills placed on the calendar, the full Senate will be given the opportunity to address these important issues, without forcing any committee member to forfeit his right to be involved in debate on the floor. Further, the committee will now move on to consideration of other legislation that is pending before us.

I will be working with the majority leader in an effort to have these bills scheduled for floor action, in order for the Senate to once again strongly endorse these needed reforms. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 2301

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act of 1986".

Sec. 2. Section 2244 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(d) When a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court fails to raise a claim in State proceedings at the time or in the manner required by State rules of procedure, the claim shall not be entertained in an application for a writ of habeas corpus unless actual prejudice resulted to the applicant from the alleged denial of the Federal right asserted and—

"(1) the failure to raise the claim properly or to have it heard in State proceedings was the result of State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States;

"(2) the Federal right asserted was newly recognized by the Supreme Court subsequent to the procedural default and is retroactively applicable; or

"(3) the factual predicate of the claim could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence prior to the procedural default.

"(e) A one-year period of limitation shall apply to an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court. The limitation period shall run from the latest of the following times:

"(1) the time at which State remedies are exhausted;

"(2) the time at which the impediment to filing an application created by State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States is removed, where the applicant was prevented from filing by such State action;

"(3) the time at which the Federal right asserted was initially recognized by the Surpreme Court, where the right has been newly recognized by the Court and is retroactively applicable; or

"(4) the time at which the factual predicate of the claim or claims presented could have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence.".

SEC. 3. Section 2253 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§2253. Appeal

"In a habeas corpus proceeding or a proceeding under section 2255 of this title before a circuit or district judge, the final order shall be subject to review, on appeal, by the court of appeals for the circuit where the proceeding is had.

"There shall be no right of appeal from such an order in a proceeding to test the validity of a warrant to remove, to another district or place for commitment or trail, a person charged with a criminal offense against the United States, or to test the validity of his detention pending removal proceedings.

"An appeal may not be taken to the court of appeals from the final order in a habeas corpus proceeding where the detention complained of arises out of process issued by a State court, or from the final order in a proceeding under section 2255 of this title, unless a circuit justice or judge issues a certificate of probable cause.".

SEC. 4. Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 22 is amended to read as follows:

"RULE 22.

"HABEAS CORPUS AND § 2255 PROCEEDINGS

"(a) Application for an Original Writ of Habeas Corpus. An application for a writ of habeas corpus shall be made to the appropriate district court. If application is made to a circuit judge, the application will ordinarily be transferred to the appropriate district court. If an application is made to or transferred to the district court and denied, renewal of the application before a circuit judge is not favored; the proper remedy is by appeal to the court of appeals from the order of the district court denying the writ.

"(b) Necessity of Certificate of Probable Cause for Appeal. In a habeas corpus proceeding in which the detention complained of arises out of process issued by a State court, and in a motion proceeding pursuant to section 2255 of title 28, United States Code, an appeal by the applicant or movant may not proceed unless a circuit judge issues a certificate of probable cause. If a request for a certificate of probable cause is addressed to the court of appeals, it shall be deemed addressed to the judges thereof and shall be considered by a circuit judge or judges as the court deems appropriate. If no express request for a certificate is filed, the notice of appeal shall be deemed to constitute a request addressed to the judges of the court of appeals. If an appeal is taken by a State or the government or its representative, a certificate of probable cause is not required.".

SEC. 5. Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by redesignating subsections "(e)" and "(f)" as subsections "(f)" and "(g)", respectively, and is further amended—

(a) by amending subsection (b) to read as follows:

"(b) An application for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted unless it appears that the applicant has exhausted the remedies available in the courts of the State, or that there is either an absence of available State corrective process or the existence of circumstances rendering such process ineffective to protect the rights of the applicant. An application may be denied on the merits notwithstanding the failure of the applicant to exhaust the remedies available in the courts of the States.";

(b) by redesignating subsection "(d)" as subsection "(e)", and amending it to read as follows:

"(e) In a proceeding instituted by an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court, a full and fair determination of a factual issue made in the case by a State court shall be presumed to be correct. The applicant shall have the burden of rebutting this presumption by clear, and convincing evidence."; and

(c) by adding a new subsection (d) reading as follows:

"(d) An application for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted with respect to any claim that has been fully and fairly adjudicated in State proceedings.".

SEC. 6. Section 2255 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by deleting the second paragraph and the penultimate paragraph thereof, and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"When a person fails to raise a claim at the time or in the manner required by Federal rules of procedure, the claim shall not be entertained in a motion under this section unless actual prejudice resulted to the movant from the alleged denial of the right asserted and—

"(1) the failure to raise the claim properly, or to have it heard, was the result of governmental action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States;

"(2) the right asserted was newly recognized by the Supreme Court subsequent to the procedural default and is retroactively applicable; or

"(3) the factual predicate of the claim could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence prior to the procedural default.

"A two-year period of limitation shall apply to a motion under this section. The limitation period shall run from the latest of the following times:

"(1) the time at which the judgement of conviction becomes final;

"(2) the time at which the impediment to making a motion created by governmental action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States is removed, where the movant was prevented from making a motion by such governmental action;

"(3) the time at which the right asserted was initially recognized by the Supreme Court, where the right has been newly recognized by the Court and is retroactively applicable; or

"(4) the time at which the factual predicate of the claim or claims presented could have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence.".

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, for most of this decade, we have been trying to relieve the crushing burden on the Federal courts with respect to habeas corpus applications. In 1981 Senator THURMOND introduced S. 653 which sought to modify existing habeas corpus procedures and to reduce the enormous proliferation of applications of writs of habeas corpus by incarcerated defendants. This unfortunately unsuccessful attempt was followed in 1983 by the introduction of S. 1763, an amended version of S. 829, which had full administration support, including not only the Attorney General of the United States, but also the endorsement of the National Association of Attorneys General and the Conference of Chief Justices. S. 1763 was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by a vote of 12-5 with 1 abstention. S. 1763 passed the Senate on February 6, 1984, by a vote of 67-9. The House, however, did not act on S. 1763 before the close of the 98th Congress. Now, Mr. President, S. 238, a bill designed to reform the areas open to abuse in the criminal justice system, with respect to habeas corpus procedures, is once again being delayed, by its critics, beyond the point of reason in the Senate Judiciary Committee. This bill has been on the agenda and the subject of extended discussion in the committee for 9 months. Any amendments have so far been defeated.

I commend Chairman THURMOND for bringing this to the floor. The abuse of the habeas process is making a mockery of the principles of finality and certainty in the American judicial system. During the past quarter century, habeas corpus filings have increased by 800 percent. The recent numbers involved are almost dumbfounding. In 1983, 10,392 habeas corpus petitions were filed. In 1984, 10,169 habeas corpus petitions were filed. And last year, in 1985, 11,992 habeas corpus petitions were filed, an increase of 823 over the previous year and an alltime high in filings. A Department of Justice study has revealed that 98.6 percent of habeas corpus cases which were appealed at the Federal level had previously undergone State appellate review. Over 30 percent of the Federal habeas corpus petitioners had filed one or more State habeas corpus petitions or Federal habeas corpus petitions. Over 44 percent of the State petitioners to Federal court had previously filed a habeas corpus petition in State court. Over 20 percent of Federal habeas corpus petitioners had filed more than 2—and up to 13—previous State petitions. Clearly, Mr. President, the use of the criminal justice system by these petitioners had turned into an abuse of the criminal justice system by these petitioners.

As of June 30, 1985, more than 7,500 habeas corpus petitions were still pending, according to the administrative office of the U.S. courts. And it should be carefully noted that the previous year, out of the nearly 2,000 habeas corpus petitions filed in just 6 Federal district courts, only 1.8 percent resulted in the prisoner's release. I believe it is also important to note that it is the continued stream of habeas corpus petitions which draw out capital punishment from the time of sentence to the time of punishment for a general period of 5 to 7 years.

The right to habeas corpus is far from clearly defined in the U.S. Constitution. It is mentioned only in article 1, section 9, clause 2, which merely states that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless rebellion or invasion requires such suspension.

Chief Justice John Marshall in Ex Parte Bollman, 8 U.S. 75 (1807), determined that a statute was necessary before the Federal courts could issue writs of habeas corpus. In John Marshall's view, it was section 14 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 which provided the necessary authority for the granting of such writs. Thus, this is a question of statutory, not constitutional, rights. The essential point to be made is that Congress can—and should—limit the application of habeas corpus under the provisions found in S. 238.

With respect to statute, in 1867 the Congress provided that persons who were incarcerated in violation of the Constitution and its guarantees could obtain a writ of habeas corpus from the Federal courts. Then in 1914, the majority of the Supreme Court held in the case of Frank v. Magnum, 237 U.S. 309 (1914), that a full and adequate hearing in State courts on a criminal conviction precluded collateral relief in Federal court. Full and adequate was defined in terms of due process—notice, opportunity to be heard, and an established procedure not repugnant to the Constitution. The late and great judge, Henry J. Friendly, writing in the University of Chicago Law Review (1970), pointedly observed that:

> Nothing in the Constitution requires a State to allow collateral attack simply because Congress has authorized Federal habeas corpus to challenge the State conviction.

In that context, it is valuable to hear what some of the Nation's chief jurists think of the current statutory habeas corpus policies:

Chief Justice Burger:

> The administration of justice in this country is bogged down with lack of reasonable finality of judgments in criminal cases.

Judge Henry Friendly:

> A matter that has rankled relations between State and Federal courts for some years now is the collateral attack on final State criminal convictions * * * since the same claim of Federal law can be and often is made in the trial and appellate courts of the State, with certoriari review available in the Supreme Court, the State judges understandably have some difficulty in seeing why their work should be reexamined.

Justice Stevens:

> In recent years Federal judges at times have lost sight of the true office of the great writ of habeas corpus.

Justice Powell:

> The present scope of habeas corpus tends to undermine the values inherent in our Federal system of government * * * we render the actions of State courts a serious disrepect in derogation of the constitutional balance between the two systems.

Justice O'Connor:

> State judges take an oath to support the Federal as well as the State constitution * * * it is a step in the right direction to defer to the State courts and give finality to their judgments on Federal constitutional questions where a full and fair adjudication has been given in State court.

Mr. President, S. 238 is not only reasonable, it is also necessary, if we are not to drown the Federal judiciary in a sea of habeas corpus writs. S. 238 denies habeas corpus relief to a convicted defendant who fails to raise a claim properly or to have it heard in State court proceedings. It allows only a 1-year period for such claim to be filed, and it runs only from the time that State remedies are exhausted, the time constitutional impediments are removed, the time at which a Federal right was initially recognized by the Supreme Court or newly recognized by it, and from the time when the factual predicate of the claim could have been discovered by due diligence. It also requires a claim of habeas corpus to be made to the appropriate district court, requires a circuit judge to issue a certificate of probable cause, requires the prior exhaustion of State remedies, and requires a timely petition to be made under the rules of Federal criminal procedure.

It is clear, Mr. President, that something has to be done and done soon if we are to have a manageable and meaningful criminal justice system. This bill does not violate the Constitution. It follows the Constitution. It also balances the interests of society and the general community with the interests of the individual in securing his constitutional rights and protections. This is a bill that will do justice. It should be passed in order to prevent our system from continual abuse of process. I urge its passage.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, in support of the Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act of 1986. It is designed to reform certain habeas corpus procedures that are currently in effect.

The writ of habeas corpus originated in the common law. Its importance was recognized by our Founding Fathers when they included in our Constitution a provision that "The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it." We know from history and the common law, however, that the habeas corpus proceedings to which the Founding Fathers referred in the Constitution were proceedings that sought an initial judicial determination of the legality of a detention imposed by an executive authority. The Founding Fathers did not have in mind proceedings that sought additional judicial reviews of the legality of a judicially imposed detention.

After the Constitution was ratified, the availability of habeas corpus in the Federal courts was restricted to Federal prisoners, and the common law restrictions on the scope of the writ were generally observed. Unfortunately, however, the common law origins of the writ were generally observed. Unfortunately, however, the common law origins of the writ were gradually eroded during the last 100 years or so through statutory and case law development. During the last 30 years, the writ of habeas corpus has routinely served as a means for the lower Federal courts to review State criminal judgments on the grounds of alleged deprivation of Federal rights. In fact, the number of prisoners challenging the validity of their State Federal habeas corpus petitions rose nearly 700 percent from 1961 through 1982, according to a report prepared by the Bureau of Justice statistics. It is that appalling situation that this bill is designed to redress.

According to our country's leading legal scholars on Federal procedure, the single most controversial and friction-producing issue in the relationship between the Federal courts and the States is Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners. State courts resent having their decisions reviewed by Federal judges, who in turn are unhappy about the burden of reviewing thousands of mostly frivolous petitions.

Several Supreme Court Justices have strongly criticized the current system of Federal habeas corpus, and have called for basic limitations on its scope and availability. Chief Justice Burger has urged Congress to consider restricting the availability of Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners because, in his view, "the administration of justice in this country is bogged down with lack of finality of judgments in criminal cases." As Justice Powell observed over 10 years ago in his opinion in Schneckloth against Bustamonte:

> The present scope of habeas corpus tends to undermine the values inherent in our Federal system of government. To the extent that every State crominal judgment is to be subject indefinitely to broad and repetitious Federal oversight, we render the actions of State courts a serious Disrespect in derogation of the constitutional balance between the two systems.

It is to that very problem, so eloquently expressed by distinguished Supreme Court jurists, that this bill is addressed.

The bill establishes a standard for reviewing habeas corpus proceedings by according deference to State adjudications that are "full and fair." That would be a vast improvement over the current rules, which provide, through habeas corpus proceedings, for mandatory readjudication, and that frequently result in duplicative relitigation of claims that have already been fairly considered by State trial and appellate courts.

The bill also would resolve the major uncertainties about access to Federal collateral remedies after a failure to raise a claim properly in normal criminal proceedings. It does that by establishing "cause and prejudice" as the exclusive governing standard.

In addition, the bill would establish a 1-year time limit on excess to Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners, normally running from the time State remedies are exhausted. For similar purposes, it would prescribe a 2-year time limit on applications for collateral relief by Federal prisoners, normally running from finality of judgment.

The bill also addresses two technical issues that need to be remedied. First, it would make it clear that habeas corpus petition can be denied on the merits, notwithstanding the petitioner's failure to exhaust available State remedies. That change would eliminate the waste of time and effort that currently occurs when a frivolous petition is dismissed by a Federal court on grounds of nonexhaustion of State remedies but is later brought back to Federal court following its unsuccessful presentation.

Second, the bill would change the current rule that gives a State prisoner in a habeas corpus proceeding repeated opportunities to persuade a Federal district judge and then a circuit judge that an appeal is warranted. Similarly, it would bring the procedure governing access to appeal in collateral proceedings involving Federal prisoners into line with the procedure employed for habeas corpus proceedings for State prisoners.

I believe that the Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act of 1986 represents a rational, reasoned approach to a problem that has been developing for more than a century, a problem so great that it has led our country's leading jurists to ask us for specific legislative relief. I commend Senator THURMOND for his leadership role in introducing this necessary piece of legislation and I urge my colleagues to support the bill in order to facilitate the ability of our judicial system to dispense justice to all our citizens instead of unnecessarily wasting time and effort on a few people who exploit procedural loopholes in the law.

EXCLUSIONARY RULE LIMITATION ACT OF 1986

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I send a bill to the desk, on behalf of myself and others, and ask that it be read for the first time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill S. 2302) to amend Title 18 to limit the application of the exclusionary rule.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be read a second time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The bill will be held at the desk.

S. 2302

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Exclusionary Rule Limitation Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. (a) Chapter 223 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3505. Limitation of the fourth amendment exclusionary rule

"Except as specifically provided by statute, evidence which is obtained as a result of a search or seizure and which is otherwise admissible shall not be excluded in a proceeding in a court of the United States if the search or seizure was undertaken in a reasonable, good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. A showing that evidence was obtained pursuant to and within the scope of a warrant constitutes prima facie evidence of such a reasonable good faith belief, unless the warrant was obtained through intentional and material misrepresentation.".

(b) The table of sections of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following item:

"3505. Limitation of the fourth amendment exclusionary rule.".

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] in strong support of a bill to modify the application of the exclusionary rule in Federal courts.

The bill would amend title 18 of the United States Code to allow otherwise admissible evidence to be used in Federal court proceedings, even if it was obtained through a violation of the fourth amendment to the Constitution, as long as the search or seizure which produced the evidence was "undertaken in a reasonable, good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment. * * *"

The Supreme Court first held in the case of Weeks versus United States (1914) that evidence obtained in violation of the fourth amendment was inadmissible in a Federal criminal trial. Since its limited application in Weeks to exclude simple evidence of a crime, the exclusionary rule has been expanded to exclude contraband and the actual tools and instrumentalities of a crime. It has been further expanded to exclude evidence that was derived from other illegally seized evidence. Since the exclusionary rule is a judicially mandated rather than a constitutionally required response to fourth amendment violations, its reform through the legislative process is appropriate.

The primary, if not the sole, rationale for the application of the exclusionary rule is to deter fourth amendment violations by law enforcement personnel. The theory is that the exclusion of illegally seized evidence will deter law enforcement personnel from engaging in negligent or intentional practices that result in fourth amendment violations.

The problem arises when the rule is applied to exclude evidence seized in situations that a reasonably well-trained officer would not or could not have recognized as being in violation of the fourth amendment. The rule therefore loses any deterrent value it may have for more egregious violations of the fourth amendment. It simply results in a windfall for the criminal, who walks away unscathed despite the existence of reliable evidence of guilt.

If one considers the exclusion of evidence a "remedy" for one whose fourth amendment rights have been violated, then the problem is that it only rewards those who are actually guilty of a crime. It provides no recourse for innocent victims of police overaggressiveness, negligence, or intentional misconduct.

Mr. President, in deciding when the exclusionary rule should be applied, the Supreme Court has balanced the deterrent effect of the rule against the cost to society that would result from the distortion of the judicial process caused by depriving the prosecution of reliable, probative evidence of guilt. The bill would make clear the congressional determination that whatever minimal deterrent effect the exclusionary rule may have is outweighed by its cost to society in cases where the evidence to be excluded is the product of a search or seizure undertaken in a reasonable and good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment.

In the 1984 case of United States versus Leon, The Supreme Court upheld the use of evidence seized by offices acting in reasonable reliance on a search warrant, issued by a detached and neutral magistrate, that was later found to be invalid. The Supreme Court recognized in Leon the "indiscriminate application of the exclusionary rule—impeding the criminal justice system's truth finding function and allowing some guilty defendants to go free—may well generate disrespect for the law and the administration of justice." The bill introduced today incorporates the ruling of the Supreme Court that the exclusionary rule should be modified to permit the introduction of evidence obtained by officers reasonably relying on a warrant issued by a detached and neutral magistrate. It also permits the use of evidence seized in warrantless searches where the seizing officer was acting in a reasonable and good faith belief that his conduct conformed with the fourth amendment.

The exclusionary rule will still be applied in cases where police conduct is objectively and patently unreasonable or where it is based on a warrant which was acquired through intentional and material misrepresentation. Thus, the effect of the bill is simply to limit the use of the exclusionary rule in those cases in which its cost to society is grossly disproportionate to the minimal deterrent effect it may have on law enforcement officers.

Mr. President, legislation in this area is long overdue. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this effort so that the 99th Congress will effect a needed modification of the exclusionary rule.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE JOSEPH P. ADDABBO OF NEW YORK

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration. It is relative to the death of Representative ADDABBO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 382) relative to the death of Representative Joseph P. Addabbo.

S. RES. 382

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Joseph P. Addabbo, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit an enrolled copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That when the Senate recesses today, it recess as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative.

Without objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, for the second time in a month flags fly at half-mast over the Capitol in honor of an esteemed public servant from the State of New York. In early March, New York and the Nation mourned the loss of Jake Javits, and now we pay tribute to another colleague, JOE ADDABBO.

During his quarter-century in the Congress, JOE ADDABBO never forgot that he had two constituencies—Queens and the Nation. He served both with the greatest distinction. The Sixth District and our Armed Forces are much the better for his presence.

On March 19, the Senate passed H.R. 4399, a bill to designate the Federal Office Building in Jamaica, Queens, as the Joseph P. Addabbo Building. The bill was signed into law by the President on March 27, 1986. It was a simple tribute; a small gesture for so respected a legislator.

His colleagues mourn the loss of a great friend. New York has lost a tireless champion. JOE will be hugely missed.

I ask unanimous consent that his obituary from the April 12, 1986, Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the obituary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK REPRESENTATIVE JOSEPH P. ADDABBO DIES

(By Bart Barnes)

Rep. Joseph P. Addabbo, 61, a New York Democrat who as chairman of the defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee built a reputation as an articulate and forceful opponent of what he considered excessive military spending, died late Thursday night at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. He had cancer and recently had suffered a heart attack.

Mr. Addabbo, who had been in a coma since collapsing March 6, represented a district in Queens. He served for 25 years in the House of Representatives and since 1979 had been chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee, the panel that acts on requests for all military spending. In that role he was often critical of high military officers who, he said, frequently shared with civilian bureaucrats a penchant for empire building and a narrowness of vision.

Despite his reputation as a critic of military spending, Mr. Addabbo always insisted he supported a strong defense policy. "But I don't take the Pentagon at their word," he once said. "I don't like the attitude of some members, 'Well, let's give them $20 million to play around with this year. Let's give them $40 million next year.' Three years later, the weapon doesn't work, and there's $100 million down the drain."

But Mr. Addabbo often found himself in a minority position on his own committee, most of whose members tended to have more hawkish views than he. More often than not he was on the losing side of defense-spending controversies.

He tried in 1982 to block funding for the MX missile but lost, both in his own subcommittee and in the full Appropriations Committee. He prevailed when he took his case to the floor of the House, although the House later reversed its position and work began on the missile.

In 1973 Mr. Addabbo sponsored the first antiwar resolution ever to pass the House of Representatives—the cutting off of funds for the bombing of Cambodia. He had supported the war in Southeast Asia during the Johnson administration and in the early years of the Nixon presidency but he subsequently changed his mind. He also opposed the B1 bomber and other * * *.

In 1984 he castigated the Defense Department for what he called "a complete breakdown of control over millions of dollars." This followed a report that accused the military of scrapping valuable equipment, then turning around and paying higher prices to buy identical items.

President Reagan called Mr. Addabbo "one of the lending players in the development of American military policy." He said the congressman was "widely respected for his knowledge of defense issues even by those who disagreed with him. His genial style was in keeping with the best traditions of American politics."

House Speaker Thomas O'Neill said Mr. Addabbo "worked diligently to ensure that America's defense was strong, efficient and effective. He demanded quality for each defense dollar."

New York Gov. Mario Cuomo called him a "great man whose commitment to integrity and excellence has improved the quality of life for all New Yorkers."

Mayor Edward Koch of New York ordered flags on city buildings to be flown at half staff until after Mr. Addabbo's funeral. The congressman, Koch said, "always strove to ensure that people of every race, religion and ethnic origin had a fair hearing and full representation in the halls of the Capitol."

A native of New York City, Mr. Addabbo graduated from the City College of New York and St. John's University Law School. He practiced law in Queens, participated in civic and community organizations, and headed Italian-American committees for various candidates.

But he never ran for public office until 1960, when the incumbent Republican representative from his district retired. With the help of John F. Kennedy's drawing power among Catholic voters, Mr. Addabbo won with 53.5 percent of the vote.

In the ensuing years the district changed from a predominantly middle class Catholic suburb to an area more closely resembling the inner city, with a population that was 65 percent black and Hispanic by the 1984 election.

During that time Mr. Addabbo established a record of steering defense contracts to Long Island-based industries and listening to * * *. He voted in favor of federal aid to education and the elderly, in favor of civil rights, and against measures to limit rights to abortion or allow prayer in public schools.

He won most bids for reelection handily, and in the campaigns of 1974 to 1982 had the Republican as well as the Democratic nomination. In 1984 he was challenged in the Democratic primary by Simeon Golar, a black real estate developer, who asked the voters to oust Mr. Addabbo on the argument that since the district had a black majority it should have a black representative. Mr. Addabbo won with 68 percent of the vote.

He is survived by his wife, Grace, and three children, Dominic, Dina and Joseph.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 382) was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 132

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities Act of 1965, as amended, I am pleased to transmit herewith the 20th Annual Report of the National Endowment for the Humanities covering the year 1985.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 14, 1986.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 2:45 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following joint resolutions, without amendment:

S.J. Res. 136. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating the calendar week beginning with Sunday, April 13, 1986, as "National Garden Week"; and

S.J. Res. 315. Joint resolution designating May 1986 as "Older Americans Month."

The message also announced that the House has agreed to the following concurrent resolution, without amendment:

S. Con. Res. 127. Concurrent resolution relating to predatory tied aid credits.

The message further announced that the House has agreed to the following resolution:

H. Res. 416. Resolution to the death of the Honorable Joseph P. Addabbo, a representative from the State of New York.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND) announced that on today, April 14, 1986, he signed the following enrolled joint resolution, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

S.J. Res. 261. Joint resolution to designate the week of April 14, 1986 through April 20, 1986, as "National Mathematics Awareness Week."

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, April 14, 1986, she had presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled joint resolution:

S.J. Res. 261. Joint resolution to designate the week of April 14, 1986 through April 20, 1986, as "National Mathematics Awareness Week."

MEASURES RE-REFERRED

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of April 11, 1986, the following bills were re-referred jointly to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the Budget:

S. 2067. A bill to overturn the deferral of the fiscal year 1986 Urban Development Action Grant and Community Development Block Grant Program;

S. 2074. A bill disapproving the proposed deferral of budget authority for community development block grants; and

S. 2075. A bill to overturn the deferral of Urban Development Action Grants funds.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

EC-2950. A communication from the Secretary of Education, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to make certain amendments to the act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, 81st Congress), and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EC-2951. A communication from the Secretary of Education, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "The Condition of Bilingual Education in the Nation, 1986"; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

CENTERS OF EXCELLENCE IN CIVIC EDUCATION ACT

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, when the word "bicentennial" is mentioned, most Americans conjure up very fond memories of tall ships, fireworks, celebrations, and festivities. In 1976, we held such a celebration of national scale on the 200th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, and Americans showed their pride in our 200 years of freedom.

Why do we as a people like to celebrate the signing of the Declaration of Independence? One hundred and twenty seven years ago, Abraham Lincoln said, ". . . we hold this annual celebration to remind ourselves of all the good done in this process of time, of how it was done and who did it, and how we are historically connected with it; and we go from these meetings in better humor with ourselves—we feel more attached the one to the other, and more firmly bound to the country we inhabit . . ."

The bicentennial of the Declaration of Independence gave Americans a chance to pause for a moment and reflect on the importance of the actions in 1776 and the shared values on which this Nation is based.

Mr. President, a new bicentennial will soon be upon us—the 200th anniversary of our Constitution and Bill of Rights. The bicentennial of the Constitution will give Americans another opportunity to celebrate that which binds us together as a people.

The deepest origins of our Constitution date back to the traditions of Greece and Rome. But our particular constitutional concerns for individual liberty, for the rule of law, for equal justice and for the limits to the use of government power through our system of federalism and checks and balances are, in many respects, uniquely American. Our Constitution reflects the values on which our American system of governance was based. It is my hope that this bicentennial will give all Americans an opportunity to do more than celebrate. I hope we can reflect on the values that serve to bind us together as a people.

Mr. President, I strongly believe that the forum for much of this discussion should be in our Nation's schools.

Both Washington and Jefferson argued that one of the most important roles of the schools, given our pluralistic society, was to educate youth on the values that bind us together as a people. Thomas Jefferson said that ". . . if you expect a nation to be ignorant and free, you expect what never was and never will be . . ." He argued that a knowledgeable citizenry that accepts its civic responsibilities—responsibilities such as participation in our domocratic institutions and an acceptance of the policies which promote the common good—is central to the preservation of our Nation.

One way to help achieve these lofty goals is by promoting civic education. When I use the term civic—or citizenship—education, I am referring to a number of activities that are aimed at educating students about what it means to be an American, what the rights and responsibilities of citizenship are, and how students can take greater responsibility in the actual activities of government. Civic education tries to answer the following questions: What are the legitimate forms of authority? How, in a pluralistic society, can we establish fair and uniform laws? How can we ensure due process? How can we ensure that citizens play their parts as informed and responsible members of our democratic system?

There are many other democracies in the world, but Americans believe that we are unique in our special freedoms. But as D.H. Lawrence once noted, ". . . it is never really freedom until you positively decide what you want to be." Citizenship education programs in our schools should help students decide positively what they want to be—as individual citizens and collectively as a people.

Mr. President, there are a number of schools across the country that have established programs to try to meet this end. For example, in my home State of New Jersey, the Parsippany school district has established a program to help second and third graders examine the importance of the rule of law. Students discuss why laws are needed, how they are changed, and why laws must be fair. The students learn, not only by discussion, but by participating in the rulemaking of the school itself. These very young students are learning about the responsibilities of being a citizen who must live by the law with some very positive results. Parsippany has witnessed a significant decline in discipline problems since the program was instituted. Why? Because students have developed a commitment to responsible behavior. They have learned to understand the importance of the rule of law—for themselves and for their community. Who benefits? Both the individual and the community at large.

Another exemplary program is going on the the Sacramento school district in California. Over 200 local attorneys and judges have volunteered for various activities, such as holding mock trials and moot courts in the schools, to show students how our judicial system tries to arrive at justice. In addition, over 1,000 high school students are working as tutors to elementary school students on citizenship education projects. The elementary school students are not the only people benefiting from these activities; the high school students, in providing this service, are helping to discharge their responsibilities to the community at large.

A third example is Long Beach, where, with the help of the Center for Civil Education, the schools are helping their young people explore the values established in our Constitution by reenacting the debates of 200 years ago between the Federalists and Anti-Federalists. In addition, the Long Beach Lawyers Auxiliary is working with classes to act out real Supreme Court cases to show how conflicts are resolved at the Federal level.

Sadly, Mr. President, these exceptional programs are just that—more the exception than the rule. In some respects, I think many of our schools have lost some of their sense of mission to instill their students with a sense of values and mutual purpose that Jefferson spoke so eloquently about 200 years ago. But I believe that the bicentennial of the Constitution offers us the opportunity to remind young Americans about the rights as well as the responsibilities of citizenship. And what better vehicle for sending this message than our school system—the institution charged by Jefferson with part of the responsibility for instilling youth with this sense of mutual purpose?

And that is why today I am introducing in the Senate legislation to establish Centers of Excellence in Civic Education throughout the United States.

Mr. President, we know that many schools are already deeply involved in a variety of activities to promote the civic competence and civic responsibilities of their students. But it is important to publicize these local efforts so that other schools can learn from them. One way to accomplish that is to search out these outstanding schools and showcase them to the rest of the Nation.

The bill requires the Secretary of Education, in consultation with the Director of your Commission, to identify 10 to 20 schools that have exemplary programs and establish them as "Centers of Excellence" in Civic Education. These centers would be individual schools or school districts in the United States that have developed outstanding programs designed to develop both civic competence and civic responsibilities among their students. The Secretary shall be empowered to award the selected schools with grants of $25,000 to $75,000 a year to enable them to showcase their programs to other schools in their geographic area.

To receive funding, the selected schools must agree to form a steering commission of representatives from the public and private sectors to assist in the civic education activities of the school and to provide assistance to other school systems in their geographic area that are interested in improving their own civic education programs.

Finally, the bill envisions that an annual conference be held for the selected schools to exchange ideas and experiences of the various projects commemorating the bicentennial of the Constitution and other civic education projects that are currently being conducted throughout the United States.

What will this accomplish? A relatively small commitment of Federal funds—roughly $1 million a year—will help disseminate information about the very best programs that our schools have developed. And the success of this entire effort can, I believe reinforce the values that have made our particular form of democracy so vibrant and resilient.

Am I talking about forcing massive changes in the way that schools are doing their jobs? Of course not. We at the national level can't—and shouldn't—dictate policy to local schools. But when we have the opportunity, we can and should press schools to better meet the needs of their students and the Nation as a whole. I think this proposal is one very modest step in that direction.

I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the bill as well as the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the close of my statement.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2296

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Centers of Excellence in Civic Education Act".

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to provide financial assistance to local educational agencies or individual schools of such agencies having centers of excellence in civic education.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purpose of this Act—

(1) The term "elementary school" has the same meaning given that term under section 198(a)(7) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(2) The term "local educational agency" has the same meanging given that term under section 198(a)(10) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(3) The term "secondary school" has the same meaning given that term under section 198(a)(7) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(4) The term "school" means an elementary or secondary school.

(5) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

(6) The term "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(7) The term "State educational agency" has the same meaning given that term under section 198(a)(17) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

EXCELLENCE IN CIVIC EDUCATION GRANTS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary is authorized, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, to make grants to local educational agencies and to individual schools of such agencies for centers of excellence in civic education.

(b) There is authorized to be appropriated $1,000,000 for the fiscal year 1987 and for each fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1991.

IDENTIFICATION AND SELECTION OF RECIPIENTS

SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary, in consultation with the Director of the Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution, shall establish procedures to identify in each fiscal year not less than 10 nor more than 20 centers of excellence in civic education administered by local educational agencies or individual schools of such agencies.

(b)(1) In establishing procedures under this section, the Secretary shall select such agencies or schools with centers which have developed exemplary programs designed to develop both civic competence and civic responsibilities among their students.

(2) In establishing such procedures, the Secretary shall make every effort to ensure that the selected schools are geographically balanced and that at least one-third of the local educational agencies or the schools of such agencies selected are agencies or schools which serve high concentrations of low-income students, minority students, or students with limited English language proficiency.

(3) The Secretary shall make grants to the local education agencies or the schools of such agencies that are selected of not less than $25,000 or more than $75,000 for each year that sufficient appropriations are available.

ASSURANCES

SEC. 6. (a) Each local education agency and each school of such agency selected for assistance under this Act shall provide assurances that it will—

(1) appoint a director who will work on civic education activities of the center at least half time; and

(2) be advised by a steering committee of representatives of the public and private sector of the community served by the agency nor school; and

(3) furnish assistance to other local educational educational agencies within the area served by the agency or school; and

(4) furnish other assurances as the Secretary deems appropriate.

DISSEMINATION AND EXCHANGE OF CIVIC EDUCATION IMPROVEMENTS

SEC. 7. The Secretary, in consultation with the Director of the Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution, shall convene a conference in each fiscal year including representatives of the agencies and schools selected in each fiscal year pursuant to section 5, together with other experts in civic education to exchange ideas with respect to improvements in civic education programs. The Secretary shall provide for the dissemination of such information as the conference deems appropriate.

CENTERS OF EXCELLENCE IN CIVIC EDUCATION ACT

Funding through the Department of Education in coordination with the Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution. $1 million a year authorized for fiscal years 1987–1991.

The Secretary, in consultation with the Director of the Commission, is directed to identify 10 to 20 schools that have exemplary civic education programs and establish them as Centers of Excellence in Civic Education. These Centers must be either individual schools or local education agencies (LEA's) in the United States that have developed exemplary programs designed to develop both civic competence and civic responsibilities among their students.

The Secretary shall award these schools with grants of $25,000 to $75,000 a year to enable the institution to showcase its activities to other schools in the geographic area in order to help them develop programs to meet the needs of their students.

The Secretary shall make every effort to ensure that the selected schools are geographically balanced and that at least one third of the selected schools or LEA's serve high concentrations of low income or minority students or students with limited English language proficiency.

To receive funding, the selected schools or LEA's must agree to the following activities: appoint a director who will work at least half time on civic education activities; form a steering committee of representatives from the public and private sectors to assist in the civic education activities of the school; provide assistance to other school systems in the geographic area interested in improving their civic education programs.

The Secretary, in consultation with the Director of the Commission, shall also hold an annual conference for the selected schools and other experts to exchange ideas and experiences of various civic education projects currently being conducted throughout the United States.

S. 2297. A bill to amend the Atlantic Tunas Convention Act of 1975 to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1987 and 1988; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

ATLANTIC TUNAS CONVENTION ACT AUTHORIZATION

● Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation proposed by the administration to reauthorize the Atlantic Tunas Convention Act. This act implements the International Convention for the Conservation of Atlantic Tunas [ICCAT], a multinational treaty for the conservation of tuna in the Atlantic Ocean.

Both the ICCAT and the Atlantic Tunas Act are directed toward maintaining the population of Atlantic tuna at levels which will permit maximum sustainable catches. Under the ICCAT, a Commission comprised of representatives from member nations convenes biannually. The Commission collects and analyzes statistical information relating to the current conditions of the tuna fishery, recommends further studies, and coordinates the investigation programs of the member nations, and recommends harvesting levels for the tuna resource.

Reauthorization of the Atlantic Tunas Convention Act would assure that the United States effectively implements the ICCAT agreement and continues to strive for effective conservation and management of the tuna resource in the Atlantic Ocean. Authorization for appropriations under the Atlantic Tunas Conservation Act expires after fiscal year 1986. The administration's bill proposes to extend authorization of the act through fiscal year 1988.●

S. 2298. A bill to make a technical correction to the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1986, relating to the extension of an enlistment bonus program; to the Committee on Armed Services.

CORRECTION TO RESERVE ENLISTMENT LAW

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, sometimes the calendar moves faster than the Congress. Last year, when we finally approved the massive defense authorization bill on November 8, we extended the authority to provide enlistment bonuses for people entering the National Guard and Reserve in critical skill areas.

Unfortunately, the law which originally set up that important bonus technically, expired on September 30. There was thus a gap of nearly 6 weeks during which enlistees were not allowed to be paid the bonus for which they were otherwise eligible.

I learned about this lapse in the law from a Texan whose son joined the National Guard last October and expected to receive the bonus, but then was denied it on this technicality. I considered this an unfortunate oversight and sought to determine just how many people might have been affected by this legal gap.

Recently the Defense Department advised me that more than 4,300 National Guard and Reserve personnel were denied the bonuses for which they were otherwise eligible. Moreover, the $5.4 million which should have been paid had already been budgeted for, so corrective legislation will not require any additional funding.

Today I am introducing legislation along with the distinguished Senators from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] and Michigan [Mr. LEVIN] to make the necessary technical correction in the law so that these bonuses can be paid.

This bill is needed not only to correct an inequity but also to avoid harming Guard and Reserve recruiting efforts, particularly in critical skill areas.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague, Senator BENTSEN, in introducing legislation to correct an inequity which came about due to the delay in enactment of the fiscal year 1986 Defense Authorization Act.

The previous legislative authority which permitted the Reserve components to offer enlistment bonuses to individuals who enlist in critical skills in National Guard and Reserve personnel expired on September 30, 1985.

Section 642 of the fiscal year 1986 Defense Authorization Act extended the Defense Department's authority to pay this bonus for an additional 3 years. The House-Senate conference on this bill concluded in July of 1985, and the conference report on this bill passed the Senate on July 30, 1985, well before the expiration date of the current bonus authority. It was obviously the intention of the Congress that there be no lapse in this bonus authority.

Unfortunately, due to the delay in adopting the conference report on the fiscal year 1986 Defense authorization bill in the House, the fiscal year 1986 Defense authorization bill was not signed into law by the President until November 8, 1985. Since the legislative authority for this enlistment bonus technically expired on September 30, anyone who enlisted in the National Guard or Reserve in a critical skill between September 30 and November 8, 1985, and who otherwise would have been eligible for this bonus, cannot receive the bonus because of this lapse in authority.

The military services had already budgeted, and the Congress has already appropriated, the necessary funds to pay this bonus for the full 12-month year, so no additional funding will be required to correct this problem.

The bill that Senator BENTSEN and I are introducing today simply corrects this inequity and permits the Department of Defense to pay these bonuses to those who enlisted during the period September 30 through November 8, 1985, and who otherwise would have been eligible to receive an enlistment bonus.

I commend Senator BENTSEN for bringing this matter before the Senate.

By Mr. STAFFORD (for himself, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S. 2300. A bill to amend the Toxic Substances Control Act so as to require the Environmental Protection Agency to set standards for identification and abatement of hazardous asbestos in Federal and other buildings, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

FEDERAL BUILDING ASBESTOS HAZARD ABATEMENT ACT

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill entitled the "Federal Building Asbestos Hazard Abatement Act of 1986." The purpose of the bill is to protect the public from an unseen but deadly health hazard—airborne asbestos fibers in Federal and other buildings.

Asbestos is a proven human carcinogen. Its deadly fibers can penetrate deep into the lungs, leading to lung cancer, mesothelioma, and other serious diseases 20 to 40 years after exposure. According to the National Academy of Sciences, "much of the more than 30 million metric tons of asbestos used in the United States since 1900 is still present in its original application and provides a potential for exposure." Asbestos-containing building products include sprayed or troweled insulation and fireproofing, boiler and pipe insulation, fireproof plaster and wallboard, and acoustical ceiling. When these materials are damaged or disturbed, they may release asbestos fibers into the air.

It was established at hearings on this subject before the Committee on Environment and Public Works that asbestos in buildings often does not present an immediate threat to health because it is intact. In these cases, an appropriate response often is an operation and maintenance plan designed to assure that it will not be damaged and to assure that any repairs or renovations will be properly conducted. Attempts to remove the asbestos, especially if the attempts are improperly done, actually can increase the level of risk. In other cases, the asbestos already is damaged and hazardous, in which case abatement is called for. Abatement may be accomplished in some cases by enclosure or encapsulation, but in other cases removal is necessary.

Mr. President, the Environmental Protection Agency has known for years about the serious health hazards caused by asbestos in building materials. In 1979, the Agency began trying to get hazardous asbestos out of schools. At the present time, schools are required to inspect for hazardous asbestos and notify parents and employees if it is found. But not even this small step has been taken with regard to other types of buildings. A 1984 EPA survey of public and commercial buildings estimated that 20 percent of all such buildings, about 733,000 buildings, contain friable, easily crumbled, asbestos. About one-quarter of these, or 192,000 buildings, had sprayed/troweled asbestos, which usually is the most dangerous situation.

Despite the obvious dangers presented by asbestos in buildings, EPA has not set any requirements for inspection or for management or abatement of asbestos hazards.

The lack of standards and requirements has allowed a dangerous situation to develop. Fly-by-night contractors have taken advantage of legitimate public health concerns by persuading building owners to undertake unnecessary and expensive asbestos removal projects. Often the poor quality of their work has made the situation worse.

The bill would attack this important public health problem by:

Requiring EPA to set standards for asbestos detection, management, abatement, and disposal;

Establishing contractor accreditation programs to assure the availability of competent contractors;

Requiring that Federal buildings be inspected and appropriate action taken; and Requiring EPA to identify classes and categories of non-Federal buildings to be subject to these requirements, based on various factors that relate to the likely degree of health hazard.

Mr. President, the kinds of problems that have developed due to a lack of standards and requirements governing asbestos projects were brought out very clearly in an article in the Wall Street Journal of March 5, 1986. I ask unanimous consent that this article be reprinted in the RECORD at this point, followed by the bill and a description of its provisions.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BAD RIDDANCE: RIPPING OUT ASBESTOS ENDANGERS MORE LIVES AS LAWS ARE IGNORED

(By Jonathan Dahl)

The Environmental Protection Agency doesn't have to look far to find people getting exposed to cancer-causing asbestos. Right across the street from its Philadelphia office, the agency caught construction workers ripping out asbestos insulation and heaving it into outdoor dumpsters.

"We could see all this asbestos dust blow by us," says an EPA spokesman. "It made us wonder how the stuff was being removed elsewhere."

The EPA isn't wondering anymore. Since that incident in 1984, shoddy asbestos removals have been alarmingly common in buildings across the country. As a result, one of the nation's greatest occupational tragedies is being repeated. More than 100,000 workers have died because they inhaled asbestos particles while installing insulation years ago. Now, desite publicity about those deaths, the deadly cycle is starting over again. This time, the eventual victims are the workers ripping out asbestos.

"It was bad enough when this happened and we didn't know the risks," says Dr. Irving Selikoff, an occupational-health expert at the Mount Sinai Medical Center in New York. "But now that we know, my God, we shouldn't let this be happening again."

A NATIONAL PROBLEM

Federal and state agencies cited more than 1,300 asbestos violations last year, and a government survey shows that at least 25% of removals are fouled up. Violations have occurred in schools, in apartments and even on Ellis Island in New York and on the grounds of the vice president's residence in Washington. They happen when asbestos cleanup is the main job and when it isn't. Most buildings constructed before 1970 have asbestos, and a health threat exists—even to passers-by—every time one is renovated or demolished. "It is a national problem," says Terrell Hunt, the EPA's highest-ranking criminal lawyer.

Some contractors don't know that they are tearing out asbestos. Others intentionally skip precautions or use slipshod methods. One contractor was sued for hiring dozens of homeless people off the street to remove asbestos from a San Antonio, Texas, hotel. And while the EPA recently beefed up its efforts to deter hazardous removals, experts say the laws pertaining to asbestos still are weak and poorly enforced. Because of the laws' inadequacies, even workers who follow guidelines might still die from asbestos poisoning.

"There are just no standards in the business. Some people do it right, but I've seen some abuses that would make your hair stand on end," says David Kimbrell, a former president of the National Association of Asbestos Abatement Contractors, a trade group based in Washington.

Ironically, some of the removal jobs aren't even necessary. Asbestos is lethal: it ranks only behind cigarettes as the leading cause of cancer. And while most of its uses are banned today, it is everywhere. Some 30 million tons of the fibrous mineral was mixed into plaster to insulate walls, pipes and ceilings during the past hundred years. But asbestos needs to come out only when it is old and crumbling. That is when the mineral's tiny particles, which cause lung cancer and other respiratory diseases, are released into the air.

Removing insulation without disturbing particles is tricky. The federal government doesn't require that asbestos come out, but it has issued reams of complicated cleanup rules. Insulation is supposed to be sprayed with water and stashed in airtight containers. Special air-circulating machines are recommended. And workers must don face masks and gear that looks like space suits. "There's almost a science to doing it correctly," says Edward Swoszowski, an indoor-air-quality consultant in Norwalk, Conn.

But many removals have been less than scientific. In the building across from the EPA's Philadelphia office, workers were gathering up asbestos debris with brooms and doing the job "the way you'd clean up your garage," says Ben Mykijewycz, an agency inspector. Eventually, the Justice Department sued the building's owner, Liberty Square Associates Ltd., for allegedly violating air-pollution laws. The owner paid a $50,000 fine last March to settle the suit, but made no admission of wrongdoing. A Justice Department suit is pending against the contractor.

COVERED WITH DUST

In another case, the EPA says it found eight teen-agers early last year yanking out asbestos with their bare hands in an abandoned school that was being converted into a condominium in Salem, Mass. The Justice Department has filed a suit against the developer, Granite Development Co. Company officials say they didn't realize that asbestos was in the school. Neither did the youths employed to remove it. "They were covered with white dust," recalls EPA inspector Bridget McGuiness. "They started asking me, 'Is this bad?' "

Nobody knows how many bad jobs are occurring, but the Occupational Safety and Health Administration found violations in * * * of 806 removal jobs that it inspected last year. The EPA estimates that it learns of only half of the asbestos removals; the agency is supposed to be notified of every instance. "If they're not notifying the EPA, they're probably not doing" the job right, says Patrick R. Tyson, the acting assistant secretary of OSHA. "I'm afraid a lot of people aren't handling it properly."

Most of those people won't feel any ill effects from asbestos exposure for a long time. As deadly as they are, asbestos diseases take five to 40 years to develop. And it isn't known how much exposure is harmful. OSHA estimates that 1.4 million construction workers risk becoming asbestos victims of the future, as do thousands of carpenters, electricians and others who work with insulation. Even passers-by may face a health threat. "Try to walk by [a construction site] without breathing the dust," says Charles Elkins, an acting assistant administrator of the EPA. "If it's asbestos, you're in trouble."

Some victims of asbestos removals are already getting sick. For 15 years, Dennis Burke wondered whether the insulation he was ripping out at construction jobs contained asbestos. "but if you complained, you'd get fired," he says. Now, Mr. Burke, 38 years old, has asbestosis, an incurable lung disease that causes shortness of breath. And he is still a construction worker; he can't find any other job.

Other victims could well be members of families already stricken by asbestos disease. Daniel O'Toole thought it was bad enough to have asbestosis; the 63-year-old former iron worker from Fort Howard, Md., was forced to retire early, and he can't take long walks. But last April, his son Patrick discovered he had swept up asbestos at a steel mill-the same mill in which Daniel O'Toole worked 18 years ago. "It's incredible, but my son was probably exposed to the same pipes I put in," Mr. O'Toole says.

Contractors complain that unless a building's owner hires them specifically to remove asbestos, they often don't realize that they are working with it. Asbestos in sulation, which sometimes looks like plaster of Paris, isn't always recognizable.

But some people have a hard time claiming ignorance. In late 1984, the EPA says, inspectors went out three times to warn Maurice Fabiani, a developer, about shoddy asbestos removals at a powerhouse in Oakville, Conn. All they got was a lecture: "He told us we were being nitpicky," says Andrew Lauterback, a special assistant U.S. attorney. Mr. Fabiani, for his part, apparently wasn't too picky about where he left his asbestos. The EPA says it found a pile of it in an open dump behind some houses. Inspectors had to shoo away children playing in it.

The matter was serious enough to draw the first prison sentence ever in an asbestos case. Through his attorney, Mr. Fabiani contends he shouldn't be blamed for a contractor's work. But he nevertheless pleaded guilty to violating air-pollution laws, paid a $25,000 fine and, in January, served 30 days in prison. The contractor, Peter J. Vileisis, pleaded guilty, was fined $25,000 and received a one-year suspended sentence.

Some contractors ignore precautions because they don't think asbestos is harmful, particularly since inhaling the fibers doesn't cause immediate injury. Other contractors cut corners to increase profits. Certainly, the work is lucrative: Three contractors may get more than $1 million to take out asbestos from a three-story school building in Atlanta. "There's a whole bunch of hustlers out there trying to make a quick buck who will end up killing themselves and others," says U.S. Rep. James Florio, a New Jersey Democrat interested in the safe handling of asbestos.

A fast buck is what 166 workers allege motivated the contractor that renovated the St. Anthony Hotel in San Antonio in 1983. In a lawsuit, the workers assert that the contractor hired them off the street without telling them that asbestos was being removed. Most say they wore bandannas over their mouths, or nothing at all, to protect themselves from the dust. "Now, every time I get a cold in my chest, I think uh-oh, this is it," says Daniel Cady, 29, who was one of the workers. He had been recruited for the job while hitchhiking through Texas.

The contractor. Planned Management International Inc., denies exposing the workers to asbestos. But OSHA fined the company $1,500 for not posting warnings or giving workers respirators. And this month the company, the construction manager and the hotel's owner settled the lawsuit. They won't discuss the terms, but the workers' attorney says his clients are receiving a total of $1.66 million.

EPA officials say that bad practices persist because neither the federal government nor 39 states require asbestos removers to be trained or licensed. New York, one of the few states with training provisions, requires contractors only to watch a 40-minute filmstrip that regulators concede is inadequate. "A barber has to go to school, but someone can remove a hazardous substance and have no experience and no training," says Wolfgang Brandner, the EPA's regional asbestos coordinator in Kansas City, Kan.

What's more asbestos regulations are flawed. OSHA figures that even if its standards were followed to the letter, 64 of every 1,000 workers who remove asbestos would still eventually die from overexposure. That is because the current exposure standard is two asbestos fibers per cubic centimeter of air—about four times the exposure the agency currently thinks is safe. OSHA is trying to change the standard, but "people think they're protected by these laws when they're not," say James Fite, the president of the White Lung Association, a nonprofit group in Baltimore that represents asbestos victims.

But the most frequently cited problem with asbestos laws is the way they are enforced. The EPA and OSHA inspect just a fraction of asbestos-removal jobs; many contractors have never had a job inspected. And both federal agencies routinely let violators off with small fines or none at all. OSHA's Dallas-area office, for example, hasn't levied a fine in any of its 12 asbestos cases in the past three years.

But officials in Dallas office say they are shorthanded—the office doesn't have anyone assigned just to asbestos cases. They also say some contractors conceal violations by working at night or on weekends. But the result is that repeat violators are common. And legitimate contractors say unscrupulous competitors have a free rein. "It's basically a voluntary-compliance system," concludes Neil Wilson, the president of National Environmental Engineering Inc., an asbestos-removal company in Michigan City, Ind.

In response to such criticism, the EPA recently vowed to vigorously enforce asbestos laws. The Justice Department, as part of that effort, last month filed 11 publicized lawsuits alleging serious asbestos violations against the state of Florida, Conrail and the school system of Ankeny, Iowa, among others. And at least 10 states are considering bills that would regulate asbestos removers.

But such steps come far too late for thousands of workers who recently may have been exposed to asbestos—a known carcinogen for at least a decade. As Patrick O'Toole, the construction worker in Maryland, puts it, "My father was done wrong, and now I'm done wrong. When will it stop?"

S. 2300

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. AMENDMENT TO TOXIC SUBSTANCES CONTROL ACT.

The Toxic Substances Control Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"TITLE II—FEDERAL BUILDING ASBESTOS HAZARD ABATEMENT

"SEC. 201. SHORT TITLE.

"This title may be cited as the "Federal Building Asbestos Hazard Abatement Act of 1986".

"SEC. 202. CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

"(a) FINDINGS.—

"(1) The Congress finds that—

"(A) hazardous asbestos is present in many Federal buildings and other buildings that are accessible to the public;

"(B) asbestos, if unrecognized or poorly managed, can cause serious adverse health effects, including lung cancer and other deadly and debilitating diseases;

"(C) though the Federal Government requires that school buildings be inspected for hazardous asbestos, there is no such requirement affecting buildings that are owned or leased by the Federal Government, or other publicly accessible buildings, nor is there any requirement that hazardous asbestos be abated in a safe and complete manner once it is discovered;

"(D) many buildings have not been inspected for hazardous asbestos, while others have been subjected to expensive abatement projects with no regulatory guidance from the Environmental Protection Agency on whether the actions are necessary, adequate, or safe; and

"(E) serious asbestos hazards continue to exist in certain buildings and some hazards actually may have been made worse due to the lack of national standards for asbestos hazards and abatement.

"(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this title are to—

"(1) provide for the establishment of Federal standards for the identification and abatement of hazardous asbestos in Federal and other buildings; and

"(2) mandate safe and complete inspection and abatement in accordance with those standards.

"SEC. 203. DEFINITIONS.

"For purposes of this title, the term—

"(1) 'Administrator' means the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency;

"(2) 'Federal building' means any building which is owned by the Federal Government;

"(3) 'covered Federal building' means any Federal building included on the schedule established by the Administrator pursuant to section 206(b) of this title;

"(4) 'non-Federal building' means any building other than a Federal building, except that such term does not include any school building otherwise subject to an asbestos inspection and abatement program under Federal law, any private residential dwelling, or any commercial residential building having fewer than 10 residential units;

"(5) 'covered non-Federal building' means any non-Federal building which is included on the schedule established by the Administrator pursuant to section 206(b) of this title;

"(6) 'accredited asbestos contractor' means an individual who has successfully completed an Environmental Protection Agency approved training program, or a training program relating to asbestos inspections and abatement adopted pursuant to subsection (b) of section 205 of this title;

"(7) 'owner', when used in connection with a covered Federal building under this title, means the head of the department, agency, office, or other instrumentality of the United States having jurisdiction or control over such building;

"(8) 'asbestos' means friable asbestos, material which contains friable asbestos, and any covering of friable asbestos or material which contains friable asbestos;

"(9) 'friable asbestos' means chrysotile, amosite, or crocidolite, or, in fibrous form, tremolite, anthophyllite, or actinolite, which can be crumbled, pulverized, or reduced to powder by hand pressure;

"(10) 'abatement' means action taken to eliminate the hazards posed by asbestos, including enclosure, encapsulation, repair, or removal; and

"(11) 'State' means a State, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Virgin Islands.

"SEC. 204. ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY REGULATIONS ON IDENTIFICATION AND ABATEMENT OF ASBESTOS.

"(a) STANDARDS.—Within 180 days after the date of the enactment of this title, the Administrator shall promulgate the following:

"(1) Regulations which prescribe standards and procedures, including the use of trained personnel, for determining whether asbestos is present in buildings.

"(2) Regulations which prescribe standards for the circumstances in which the presence of asbestos in a building shall be considered hazardous. In any standard prescribed under this paragraph, asbestos shall be considered hazardous if the asbestos or its covering is—

"(A) visibly damaged, or

"(B) readily accessible in a manner which presents a reasonable likelihood of human exposure to airborne asbestos fibers.

"(3) Regulations which mandate abatement, in accordance with standards prescribed under paragraph (4) of this subsection, of hazardous asbestos found in any building included on the schedule established pursuant to section 206 of this title, as determined in accordance with standards prescribed under paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection.

"(4) Regulations which prescribe standards for performance of asbestos abatement activities in buildings and for determination of when the hazard has been abated. Such regulations shall include standards for protection for both workers and building occupants for the following phases of abatement activity:

"(A) Inspection.

"(B) Abatement.

"(C) Post-abatement, including any long-term operation and maintenance activity.

"(5) Regulations which prescribe standards for operation and maintenance plans for—

"(A) hazardous asbestos which is abated by a means other than removal, and

"(B) asbestos which is found not to be hazardous.

The regulations shall include provisions for the education and protection of workers and other persons who may come in contact with the asbestos, for periodic reinspection of the asbestos, and for procedures to be used for custodial activities, building management, repairs, and renovations.

"(6) Regulations which prescribe such standards for transportation and disposal of asbestos as may be necessary to protect human health and the environment.

"(b) HAZARDOUS ASBESTOS STANDARD IF ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY FAILS TO PROMULGATE REGULATIONS.—If the Administrator fails to promulgate regulations under paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (a) of this section within the prescribed period, any asbestos or its covering which exists in a building included on the schedule established pursuant to section 206 of this title shall be considered hazardous if the asbestos is visibly damaged, with portions of the material dislodged, missing, cracked, deteriorated, showing evidence of water damage, or flaking, in any area in the building where there is a potential for human exposure, including an air plenum. Such standards shall be effective until such time as the Administrator promulgates different standards under regulations under paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (a) of this section.

"(c) ABATEMENT IF ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY FAILS TO PROMULGATE REGULATIONS.—If the Administrator fails to promulgate regulations under paragraphs (3) and (4) of subsection (a) of this section within the prescribed period, and if any asbestos which is hazardous under the standard described in subsection (b) of this section exists in a building included on the schedule established pursuant to section 206 of the title, the owner of such building shall abate such asbestos in accordance with the most recent version of the Environmental Protection Agency's 'Guidance for Controlling Asbestos-Containing Materials in Buildings' (or any successor to such document). The ambient interior concentration of asbestos after the completion of abatement shall not exceed the ambient exterior concentration, discounting any contribution from any local stationary source. In the absence of reliable measurements, the exterior ambient concentration shall be deemed to be less than 0.003 fibers per cubic centimeter. A scanning election microscope shall be used to determine whether the standard has been met.

"(d) TRANSPORTATION AND DISPOSAL STANDARDS IF ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY FAILS TO PROMULGATE REGULATIONS.—If the Administrator fails to promulgate regulations under subsection (a)(6) of this section within the prescribed period, any asbestos which is abated within a building included on the scheduled established pursuant to section 206 of this title shall be transported and disposed of in accordance with the most recent version of the Environmental Protection Agency's "Asbestos Waste Management Guidance" (or any successor to such document).

"SEC. 205. MODEL CONTRACTOR ACCREDITATION PLAN.

"(a) MODEL PLAN.—

"(1) PERSONS TO BE ACCREDITED.—Within 180 days after the date of the enactment of this title, the Administrator shall develop a model accreditation plan for States to give accreditation to persons for performance of the following functions:

"(A) inspection for asbestos in buildings;

"(B) preparation of asbestos management plans for such buildings;

"(C) abatement of asbestos in such buildings; and

"(D) laboratory analysis of bulk samples and air samples of asbestos from such buildings in laboratories.

"(2) PLAN REQUIREMENTS.—The plan shall include a requirement that any person performing a function listed in the preceding sentence achieve a passing grade on an examination pertaining to that function and participate in continuing education on current asbestos abatement technology. The examination shall assess the knowledge of the person in areas that the Administrator prescribes in regulations as necessary and appropriate for the performance of the functions listed in paragraph (1). Such regulations may include requirements for knowledge in the following areas:

"(A) recognition of asbestos and its physical characteristics;

"(B) health hazards of asbestos and the relationship between asbestos exposure and disease;

"(C) assessing the risk of asbestos exposure through a knowledge of percentage weight of asbestos, friability, age, deterioration, location and accessibility of materials, and advantages and disadvantages of dry and wet methods of abatement;

"(D) respirators and their use, care, selection, degree of protection afforded, fitting, testing, and maintenance and cleaning procedures;

"(E) approrpiate work practices and control methods including the use of high efficiency particle absolute vacuums, use of amended water, and principles of negative air pressure equipment use and procedures;

"(F) work area preparation for asbestos abatement, including isolation procedures to prevent bystander or public exposure, decontamination procedures, procedures for post-abatement dismantling of work areas, and waste disposal procedures;

"(G) establishing emergency procedures to respond to sudden releases;

"(H) air monitoring requirements and procedures;

"(I) medical surveillance program requirements; and

"(J) housekeeping and personal hygiene practices and procedures to prevent asbestos exposure to an employee's family.

"(b) STATE ADOPTION OF PLAN.—Within 180 days after the Administrator has developed a model contractor accreditation plan under subsection (a) of this section, each State shall—

"(1) adopt a contractor accreditation plan at least as stringent as that model, or

"(2) require that anyone practicing as a contractor in the State be accredited by another State which has adopted a contractor accreditation plan at least as stringent as the model plan.

"SEC. 206. CERTAIN BUILDINGS SUBJECT TO TITLE.

"(a) COVERED BUILDINGS.—After the date of the enactment of this title, all covered Federal Buildings and covered non-Federal buildings shall be required to be inspected for the purpose of determining the presence of asbestos material. Such inspection, together with action necessary to abate any hazardous asbestos found as a result of such inspection, shall be carried out in accordance with the provisions of this title.

"(b) SCHEDULE FOR ASBESTOS INSPECTION AND MANAGEMENT.—

"(1) PUBLICATION OF SCHEDULE.—Within the 12-month period following the date of the enactment of this title, the Administrator shall develop and publish in the Federal Register a schedule identifying and designating, by category, type, or class, the order in which Federal buildings shall be inspected for the presence of asbestos material and, if such material is found, a management plan developed and implemented in accordance with section 208 of this title. Except to the extent otherwise specifically provided herein, the development and publication of such schedule, including revisions and additions under paragraph (2) of this subsection, shall be within the discretion of the Administrator.

"(2) REVISIONS; ADDITIONS.—The Administrator shall, from time to time (but not less than biannually), review the schedule established pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection with a view to expediting, to the extent consistent with the availability of technical experts and personnel, and analytical resources, the inclusion on such schedule of additional categories, types, or classes of Federal buildings and non-Federal building. Any such additions shall be published in the Federal Register.

"(3) MATTERS TO BE CONSIDERED IN DEVELOPING SCHEDULE.—In making the determination of any such category, type, or class of building for inclusion on such schedule, or revisions and additions thereto, the Administrator shall consider, among other items or matters—

"(A) the size of building;

"(B) date of construction or renovation;

"(C) likelihood that building contains asbestos material;

"(D) availability of technical experts and personnel and analytical resources;

"(E) whether the determination is likely to adversely affect or impede the inspection for, or abatement of, hazardous asbestos in school buildings;

"(F) number of occupants and visitors utilizing such building; and

"(G) likelihood of use by children.

"SEC. 207. INSPECTION OF COVERED BUILDING.

"(a) INSPECTION REQUIREMENT.—Within 180 days after the Administrator has published his initial schedule in the Federal Register pursuant to section 206 of this title, or a revision or addition thereto, designating a particular category, type, or class of building as a part of such schedule, the owner of any such building shall conduct an inspection thereof to determine the presence or absence of asbestos materials in such building. Each owner, following such inspection, shall prepare a statement containing the following information for each such building so owned;

"(1) the dates of inspection;

"(2) the name, address, and qualifications of each inspector;

"(3) a description of the specific areas inspected, including an indication of whether the boiler room was inspected;

"(4) the results of such inspection; and

"(5) a description of any abatement action previously taken.

"(b) PUBLIC AVAILABILITY OF INSPECTION STATEMENT.—A notice of the availability of the inspection statement required under subsection (a) of this section shall be posted and shall remain posted in a conspicuous place on or within the building covered by such statement. A copy of such inspection statement shall be made available, upon request by any person, by the owner of the building covered by such plan.

"(c) AVAILABILITY OF INSPECTION STATEMENT.—A copy of each inspection statement made pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall, within sixty days following its preparation, be submitted to the Administrator. Upon request of any Governor of a State to the Administrator for copies of such inspection statements, the Administrator shall make copies available pursuant to such request.

"SEC. 208. ASBESTOS MANAGEMENT PLANS.

"(a) MANAGEMENT PLAN.—Each owner of a building designated on the schedule established pursuant to section 206 of this title who, following an inspection pursuant to section 207 of this title, determines the presence of asbestos material or materials in such building, shall, not more than 60 days following such inspection, prepare a management plan for dealing with such asbestos. Each plan shall provide for compliance with the applicable regulations prescribed by the Administrator under section 204 of this title (or if there are no regulations, the applicable standards in subsections (a) and (b) of section 204 of this title) and shall include the following:

"(1) schedules for followup inspections for asbestos;

"(2) a detailed description of measures to be hazardous, including the location or locations at which an abatement action will be taken and the method or methods of abatement to be used;

"(3)(A) a detailed description of criteria and procedures which have been or which will be followed in selecting persons to abate the asbestos found to be hazardous; or

"(B) if the State has adopted a contractor accreditation plan similar to the model contractor accreditation plan developed under section 205 of this title, a statement that the owner of the building followed that plan in selecting such persons;

"(4) the names of the consultants, if any, who contributed to the plan, along with a description of their credentials;

"(5) a detailed description of any asbestos found in such building which was found not to be hazardous under the regulations prescribed under subsection (a) of section 204 of this title (or the standard in subsection (b) of section 204 of this title) and which is not visibly damaged or flaking; and

"(6) an operation and maintenance plan, with a provision requiring periodic reinspection, for—

"(A) asbestos which was abated by encapsulation rather than by removal, and

"(B) asbestos which was not abated because it was found not to be hazardous.

"(b) MANAGEMENT PLAN ACCREDITATION.—Each such management plan shall contain a statement by an accredited asbestos contractor that such contractor has prepared or assisted in the preparation of such plan, or has reviewed such plan, and that such plan is in compliance with the applicable regulations and standards promulgated or adopted pursuant to section 204 of this title, and other applicable provisions of law.

"(c) IMPLEMENTATION OF ASBESTOS ABATEMENT MANAGEMENT PLANS.—After an asbestos management plan has been developed in accordance with this section, the owner of the building covered by such plan shall implement the plan within 12 months.

"(d) PUBLIC AVAILABILITY OF ASBESTOS MANAGEMENT PLAN.—Notice of the availability of the asbestos management plan required under subsection (a) of this section shall be posted and shall remain posted in a conspicuous place on or within the building covered by such plan. A copy of such plan shall be made available, upon request by any person, by the owner of the building covered by such plan.

"(e) WARNING LABELS.—Any owner of a building who has carried out his or her management plan activities with respect to such building shall display warning labels at appropriate locations in such building, to notify building users of—

"(1) asbestos which was abated by encapsulation rather than removal and is subject to operation and maintenance activities, and

"(2) asbestos which was not abated because it was not found to be hazardous.

The warning label shall read, in print which is readily visible because of large size or bright color, as follows:

'CAUTION: ASBESTOS PRESENT. ASBESTOS CAUSES CANCER. DO NOT DISTURB WITHOUT PROPER TRAINING AND EQUIPMENT'.

"SEC. 209. FEDERAL LEASING POLICIES.

"On and after the expiration of the thirty-six-month period following the date of the enactment of this title, no department, agency, or other entity or instrumentality of the United States shall enter into any purchase agreement or lease for the acquisition of real property for use by any department, agency, or other entity or instrumentality of the United States, unless such property has been inspected in accordance with the provisions of this title and found to be free of any asbestos material, or such property has been inspected and is, at the time of any such purchase or lease, subject to a valid and current asbestos abatement management plan that is in compliance with the provisions of this title and regulations and standards promulgated pursuant thereto.

"SEC. 210. ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY RESPONSE AUTHORITY.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Whenever—

"(1) the presence of asbestos in a building designated on the schedule, or revision thereof, of the Administrator pursuant to section 206 of this title may present an imminent and substantial endangerment to human health, and

"(2) the owner of such building is not taking sufficient action (as determined, in the case of a covered Federal building, by the Administrator or, in the case of a covered non-Federal building, by the Governor or the Administrator) to abate or arrange for the abatement of the asbestos, the Administrator, in the case of a covered Federal building, or the Governor or the Administrator, in the case of a covered non-Federal building, is authorized to act, consistent with standards prescribed under this title, to abate or arrange for the abatement of the hazard, or to take any other response measure which the Administrator or the Governor deems necessary to protect human health.

"(b) COST RECOVERY.—The Administrator may seek reimbursement from any potentially responsible party in a court of the United States for all costs of abatement action under this section incurred by the United States Government.

"SEC. 211. ABATEMENT ACTION.

"When the Administrator, in the case of a covered Federal building, or the Governor of a State, in the case of a covered non-Federal building, determines that there may be an imminent and substantial endangerment to the public health or welfare or the environment because of the presence of asbestos in any such building, the Administrator may request the Attorney General of the United States, or the Governor may act, to secure such relief as may be necessary to abate such danger, including closure of the buildings. The district court of the United States in the district in which the threat occurs shall have jurisdiction to grant such relief, including injunctive relief, as the public interest and the equities of the case may require.

"SEC. 212. PREEMPTION.

"Nothing in this title shall be construed as preempting a State from establishing any additional liability or requirements with respect to asbestos in non-Federal buildings within such State.

"SEC. 213. REPORT.

"The Administrator shall include, as a part of the annual report required by section 30 of the Toxic Substances Control Act, a report containing the following:

"(1) a summary of the information and other data (including inspection statements) available to the Administrator showing the extent to which asbestos was found in buildings covered by this title during the period covered by such annual report required by the Toxic Substances Control Act;

"(2) a summary of the abatement actions taken by owners of buildings covered by this title during the period covered by such annual report; and

"(3) a description of actions taken by the Administrator in the administration of this title during the period covered by such annual report, including information actions".".

SEC. 2. CONFORMING AMENDMENT TO TOXIC SUBSTANCES CONTROL ACT.

(a) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 15 of the Toxic Substances Control Act is amended in paragraph (1)—

(1) by striking out "or" before "(C)";

(2) by striking out the semicolon and inserting in lieu thereof a comma; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following: "or (D) any rule promulgated or order issued under title II;".

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.—The Toxic Substances Control Act is amended—

(1) by inserting immediately before section 1 the following:

"TITLE I—CONTROL OF TOXIC SUBSTANCES";

(2) by inserting in the table of contents in section 1, immediately before the item relating to section 1, the following:

"TITLE I—CONTROL OF TOXIC SUBSTANCES"; and

(3) by adding at the end of the table of contents in section 1 the following:

"TITLE II—FEDERAL BUILDING ASBESTOS HAZARD ABATEMENT

"Sec. 201. Short title.
"Sec. 202. Congressional findings and purposes.
"Sec. 203. Definitions.
"Sec. 204. Environmental Protection Agency regulations on identification and abatement of asbestos.
"Sec. 205. Model contractor accreditation plan.
"Sec. 206. Certain buildings subject to title.
"Sec. 207. Inspection of covered buildings.
"Sec. 208. Asbestos management plans.
"Sec. 209. Federal leasing policies.
"Sec. 210. Environmental Protection Agency response authority.
"Sec. 211. Abatement action.
"Sec. 212. Report.".

DESCRIPTION OF BILL

The bill would amend the Toxic Substances Control Act by adding to it a new Title II entitled the "Federal Building Asbestos Hazard Abatement Act of 1986."

Section 202 contains the Congressional findings and purpose of the bill.

Section 203 contains definitions.

Section 204 requires the Environmental Protection Agency to promulgate a series of regulations related to asbestos identification, hazard assessment, abatement, operation and maintenance procedures, transportation and disposal. Fall back standards in the bill would apply should EPA fail to promulgate the required standards.

Section 205 defines the components of a model contractor accreditation program that EPA is required to publish. It requires States to adopt accreditation programs based on the model.

Section 206 requires the Administrator to establish a schedule by which classes and categories of Federal buildings are to be inspected for asbestos. The schedule is to be reviewed and revised periodically in order to add additional classes and categories of Federal and non-Federal buildings to the schedule. In determining the schedule, the Administrator is required to consider a number of factors related to the likelihood of asbestos exposure, size and characteristics of the exposed populations, and availability of technical resources.

Section 207 requires that buildings be inspected within 6 months after being scheduled, and that inspection statements describing the results of the inspection be made available to any person. Copies of this statement also are to be sent to the Administrator.

Section 208 requires that asbestos management plans be developed for buildings in which asbestos is found, consistent with the EPA regulations and standards. The plan must describe the asbestos found in the building and the steps that will be taken to prevent or abate asbestos hazards. The plan must be implemented within a year and must be made available to the public. Asbestos remaining in a building must be labeled.

Section 209 prohibits purchase or lease of an asbestos-containing building by the Federal government after three years from enactment.

Section 210 authorizes the Administrator or the Governor of a State (in the case of non-Federal buildings) or the Administrator (in the case of Federal buildings), to act to abate asbestos that presents an imminent and substantial endangerment to human health. The Administrator is authorized to seek reimbursement from any potentially responsible party in a federal court.

Section 211 authorizes United States district courts to grant appropriate relief from asbestos that presents an imminent and substantial endangerment to public health.

Section 212 states that these requirements do not preempt states from establishing any additional liability or requirements with respect to asbestos in non-Federal buildings.

Section 213 requires an annual report to Congress summarizing actions taken in response to these requirements.

Section 214 contains conforming amendments to the Toxic Substances Control Act.

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Chairman STAFFORD and others in sponsoring legislation that addresses the critical issue of asbestos.

On February 20, 1986, I, along with Senator STAFFORD and others, introduced S. 2083, the Asbestos Hazard Emergency Response Act. This bill focused on the problem of asbestos in our Nations' schools.

The bill we are introducing today was designed to accompany S. 2083. It is the logical next step in addressing the overall problem of asbestos in buildings in the United States. This bill focuses on asbestos in Federal buildings.

It is well documented that when released into the air, asbestos fibers can cause lung cancer, asbestosis, pleural mesothelioma, and other debilitating lung diseases.

Unfortunately, Federal agencies are not doing an adequate job of detecting hazardous asbestos in federally owned buildings.

In some buildings, the asbestos is posing a serious threat and immediate removal is necessary. In other buildings, the asbestos is still intact and does not need to be removed. Federal agencies, like schools, need the proper guidance to make the correct decisions to protect building occupants and the general public.

While this bill focuses on asbestos in Federal buildings, it would later address the problem in non-Federal buildings. In effect, this bill would require the Government to clean up its act first before regulating non-Government properties.

Specifically, this bill would:

Require EPA to set standards for asbestos detection, management, removal, and disposal;

Establish certification programs for asbestos abatement contractors. This would ensure that States have a sufficient number of qualified contractors to safely remove and dispose of asbestos;

Require that all Federal buildings be inspected and appropriate action taken; and Require EPA to identify classes and categories of non-Federal buildings to be added to the list of buildings to be subject to these requirements.

The U.S. Government must address the problem of asbestos in federally owned buildings. The lack of an organized, interagency effort to control the release of asbestos fibers has threatened the health of Federal employees and the general public for too long.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.●

By Mr. CHILES:

S.J. Res. 319. Joint resolution commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion to liberate Cuba from Communist tyranny; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMMEMORATION OF 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BAY OF PIGS INVASION

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, April 17 marks the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs attempted liberation of Cuba. I introduce this joint resolution in commemoration of this important date. I intend my resolution to be a special and appropriate acknowledgement in honor of the men of the 2506 Brigade. Their bravery and unhesitating response to the call of duty is to be admired by all.

We must not allow time to dim our memory of the heroes of the 2506 Brigade. They stand as shining examples of the Cuban people's love for freedom, their willingness to fight for democratic principles, and their vow to restore liberty to their enslaved homeland. Twenty-five years after the Bay of Pigs attempted liberation, the desire is just as strong, the resolve as profound, the yearning as sincere that Cuba should be free.

It began on a Monday morning in April; the year was 1961; 1,400 men participated in an invasion that was to result in the liberation of Cuba. It was not to be. Three days later it ended with 114 dead, 1,189 men taken prisoners, a newly elected President embarrassed and a Cuban dictator still in power.

Historians have well documented what occurred on that day in Playa Giron. Political scientists have analyzed the decisionmaking process and the flaws which marked this effort. Pundits have volunteered their interpretation of the events which followed and the events which never unfolded as a result of the Bay of Pigs.

What I wish to make perfectly clear is that the men of the 2506 Brigade did not die in vain. The liberation of Cuba was not attained, but the battle which began on that day 25 years ago continues today. The desire for a free Cuba lives on.

Jose Marti wrote:

> Every man of justice and honor fights for liberty whenever he may see it offended, because that is to fight for his integrity as a man: and the one who sees liberty offended and does not fight for it, or helps those who offend—is not a whole man.

These words are certainly applicable to the men of the 2506 Brigade. Twenty-five years ago they proved themselves to be, in Jose Marti's words, whole men.

This resolution I introduce today is in commemoration of the brave men who fought and gave their lives so that their brothers in Cuba could breathe free. Their struggle for a free Cuba was a just one and it continues to be to this day. All of us know that the battle at the Playa Giron was not victorious, but it was a battle worth fighting.

As lovers of freedom, as defendors of liberty, we do not rest while liberty is denied in Cuba, in Nicaragua, in Afghanistan, and Angola. Freedom is only secure when it is defended.

As members of the Cuban-American community remember the men who fought on Playa Giron, I cannot even begin to share in their very personal pain over the loss of loved ones and the loss of a nation. I do share, however, the pride in the heroes of Playa Giron. In memory of their deeds and in memory of the lives which were lost the battle for a free Cuba will continue. Again, borrowing Jose Marti's words, as whole men we will fight where we see liberty offended. We will fight against injustice, against oppression and tyranny so long as the Cuban nation remains in chains.●

By Mr. MITCHELL:

S.J. Res. 320. Joint resolution to designate April 17, 1987, as "National Pension Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL PENSION DAY

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am introducing a joint resolution today which would mark April 17 as National Pension Day.

Few factors have given our American working men and women more long-term protection than the development and strengthening of the private pension system which provides for workers when their working days are over.

Nobody discounts the vital role played by the tax-financed income security programs, especially Social Security.

But private pensions are the essential element of financial security in retirement that supplement Government-financed programs. Without the pension protection that workers earn by their years of labor, the retirement plans of millions of Americans would be very different, the living conditions of millions of retired people would be much more straightened.

Pension protection should continue to be expanded and offered to American workers across the board. With the appropriate safeguards as to portability and vesting, each worker should be able to feel secure in the fact that decades of honest labor will ultimately mean retirement years of fair compensation in return.

The dedication of the Sheetmetal Workers Pension Building on April 17 is an appropriate recognition of the pivotal importance of pension programs to workers today.

And the recognition of April 17 as National Pension Day would mark an entirely appropriate national recognition of that fact.●

S.J. Res. 321. Joint resolution to designate October 1986 as "National Down Syndrome Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DOWN SYNDROME MONTH

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to designate the month of October as "National Down syndrome Month." I introduced legislation proclaiming October as "National Down Syndrome Month" that was signed into law in 1984 and 1985, and I am convinced that such a law in 1986 will constitute another important step toward encouraging continued understanding and advancement in the medical and educational programs concerned with Down syndrome.

Down syndrome occurs once in every 1,000 births. It results from a genetic mishap in which an extra chromosome, No. 21—which affects physical and mental development—is found within the individual's genetic material. For years, Down syndrome carried the stigma of being a hopeless impediment to a meaningful and productive life.

Happily, the past 15 years have brought a revolution in terms of discovering the potential for individuals with Down syndrome. Significant medical advances have enabled correction of a number of the congenital disorders associated with Down syndrome, which have impeded normal functioning in society. Moreover, infant stimulation programs taught to parents of babies with Down syndrome, have increased intellectual development far beyond previous expectations.

Since the enactment of Public Law 94-142, we see the rewards of educating the developmentally disabled in our public schools, both in terms of their increased achievements, and, consequently, the contributions that these children will make to society in the future as productive citizens.

At one time, the birth of a child with a mental handicap was tantamount to a life of anguish, despair and certain institutionalization. Today, however, we know differently. Today we dream dreams for our children with handicaps. Today we make them a part of all that we do; we integrate them into the community and educate them through appropriate programs.

An integral part of this process has been the fostering of public awareness, the dissolution of old stereotypes and stigmas about Down syndrome, and an acceptance of these individuals into the mainstream of our society. Given the tremendous success of October 1984 and October 1985 as "National down syndrome Month," I am confident that this resolution will again contribute to that education and acceptance.

Mr. President, I would like to thank and commend my distinguished colleagues who have joined me in cosponsoring this resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 321

Whereas the past decade has brought a greater and more enlightened attitude in the care and training of the developmentally disabled;

Whereas one such condition which has undergone considerable reevaluation is that of Down syndrome—a problem which, just a short time ago, was often stigmatized as a mentally retarded condition which relegated its victims to lives of passivity in institutions and back rooms;

Whereas, through the efforts of concerned physicians, teachers and parent groups such as the National Down Syndrome Congress, programs are being put in place to educate new parents of babies with Down syndrome; to develop special education classes within maintreamed programs in schools; the provisions for vocational training in preparation for competitive employment in the work force and to prepare young adults with Down syndrome for independent living in the community;

Whereas the cost of such services designed to help individuals with Down syndrome move into their rightful place in our society is but a tiny fraction of the cost of institutionalization;

Whereas along with this improvement in educational opportunities for those with Down syndrome is the advancement in medical science which is adding to a more brightened outlook for individuals born with this chromosomal configuration; and

Whereas public awareness and acceptance of the capabilities of children with Down syndrome can greatly facilitate their being mainstreamed in our society: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 1986 is designated as "National Down Syndrome Month" and that the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the designated month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENTS

CRANSTON AMENDMENT NO. 1782

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. CRANSTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2231) to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act; as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following:

TITLE II—DEFERRALS

SEC. 201. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the "Agricultural Credit Act of 1986".

SEC. 202. IN GENERAL.

(a) REQUIREMENTS FOR RECEIVING PAYMENTS.—If a qualified lender agrees to defer principal or interest payments under this title with respect to an agricultural loan to a qualified borrower, the Secretary, and appropriate State authorities (if so authorized under State law), shall make payments to that lender as described in section 203.

(b) LIMITATION ON LOAN AMOUNTS.—A deferral of principal and interest payments under this title may be made only with respect to loan amounts of a borrower totaling, in the aggregate, not more than—

(1) $500,000 in the case of a qualified borrower who is an individual; and

(2) $700,000 in the case of a qualified borrower who is a person other than an individual.

(c) PERIOD FOR INITIATING REFERRALS OF PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST.—

(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), a deferral of principal and interest payments under this title may be made only within 90 days after the lender has received an application for such deferral submitted by the borrower within one year after the date of enactment of this Act.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply to a deferral of principal and interest payments made during the period beginning six months before the date of enactment of this Act and ending on the date of enactment.

SEC. 203. STATE AND FEDERAL INTEREST RATE PAYMENTS.

(a) PAYMENTS BY THE SECRETARY.—If the lender defers the principal or interest accruing on a loan throughout the period that an interest deferral remains in effect under section 205(a) by (1) 2 percent of the interest and 10 percent of the principal; (2) 1 percent of the interest and 15 percent of the principal; or (3) 20 percent or more of the principal, the Secretary, through the Farmers Home Administration, shall pay to the qualified lender making a deferral of principal and interest under section 204—

(1) an amount equal to the amount of the deferral by the lender but not to exceed 2 percentage points of the interest accruing on such loan throughout the period that an interest deferral remains in effect under section 205(a): and

(2) any amount received by the Secretary under subsection (b).

Any payment under this subsection shall be passed on to the borrower.

(b) PAYMENTS BY APPROPRIATE STATE AUTHORITIES.—With respect to a loan for which a deferral of principal or interest is made under section 205, the appropriate State authorities (if so authorized under State law), shall pay to the Secretary an amount equal to 2 percentage points of the interest accruing on such loan throughout the period that such deferral remains in effect under section 205(a).

SEC. 204. AMOUNTS OF PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST RATE DEFERRAL.

(a) TABLE.—Except as provided in subsection (b), the deferrals referred to in section 203 are as follows:

Bank Interest Deferral		Bank Principal Deferral	Federal Contribution	State Contribution	Total Deferral in States Authorizing Payments	Total Deferral in States not Authorizing Payments
2%	and	10%	2%	2%	6% interest 10% principal	4% interest 10% principal
1%	and	15%	2%	2%	5% interest 15% principal	3% interest 15% principal
0%	and	20%	2%	2%	4% interest 20% principal	2% interest 20% principal

(b) EXCEPTION IN THE CASE OF FIXED RATE LOANS.—In lieu of a principal deferral described under the second column of the table in subsection (a), a lender may defer the interest on a loan by an amount which will yield loan payments by the borrower comparable to loan payments which would be due under such principal deferral. An interest rate deferral under this subsection shall be in addition to any interest rate deferral described in the table in subsection (a).

SEC. 205. DEFERRAL PERIOD.

(a) DURATION OF INTEREST RATE DEFERRALS.—Except as provided in subsection (c), interest rate deferrals made under section 204 shall be in effect for the duration of the loan or for a period of three years from the date of enactment of this Act, whichever is less.

(b) INTEREST RATES FOLLOWING DEFERRAL PERIOD.—At the end of the period described in subsection (a) any interest rate charged on the balance of principal outstanding on a loan cannot exceed the standard rate charged by the lender for a comparable loan.

(c) EXCEPTION IN THE CASE OF INTEREST RATE DEFERRALS MADE IN LIEU OF PRINCIPAL DEFERRALS.—Interest rate deferrals made under section 204 in lieu of principal deferrals shall remain in effect for the duration of the loan.

SEC. 206. RECAPTURE IN THE EVENT OF NON-MONETARY DEFAULT.

In the event of non-monetary default by a qualified borrower on the terms of a loan whose terms are modified under this title, without consent by the lender, a qualified lender may enforce the terms of such loan as they existed before such modification.

SEC. 207. GUIDELINES.

(a) DEVELOPMENT OF GUIDELINES.—Each lender receiving a payment under section 203 shall develop guidelines for determining which borrowers shall receive interest or principal deferrals under this title.

(b) TERMINATION OF STATE AND FEDERAL PAYMENTS UPON FORECLOSURE.—No payment under section 203 shall be made with respect to a loan after a lender compels the forfeiture by a borrower of any security for such loan.

SEC. 208. USE OF CERTAIN FUNDS.

(a) USE OF AGRICULTURAL CREDIT INSURANCE FUND TO MAKE PAYMENTS.—The Secretary shall use the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund established under section 309 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act to make payments under section 203(a)(1).

(b) DISCRETIONARY USE OF CERTAIN FUNDS.—The Secretary, at the Secretary's discretion, may use, to make payments under section 203(a)(1) during fiscal years 1986, 1987, 1988, and 1989 funds which would otherwise be available to the Secretary during such years under section 351(e)(2) of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act.

SEC. 209. REGULATIONS.

The Secretary shall prescribe regulations to implement this title within 30 days after the date of enactment of this title.

SEC. 210. LIMITATIONS ON STATE LAWS RESPECTING FIXED RATE LOANS.

Any provision of the laws or constitution of any State which prohibits fixed rate loans shall not apply to extensions of credit made under this title or title IV.

SEC. 211. PENALTY FOR MISUSE OF FUNDS.

Whoever embezzles, misapplies, steals, or obtains by fraud, false statements, or forgery, any funds, assets, or property provided or financed under this title shall be fined under title 18, United States Code, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 212. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this title and title IV—

(1) the term "agricultural loan" means a loan made to finance the production of agricultural products or livestock in the United States or a loan secured by agricultural property;

(2) the term "agricultural property" means land in the United States that is in regular use for the production of agricultural commodities for sale and any personal property used on such land in the production of agricultural commodities;

(3) the term "qualified agricultural debt restructuring"—

(A) means any combination of—

(i) a deferral in the principal due on an agricultural loan to a qualified borrower for the duration of the loan;

(ii) a deferral in the interest due on such loan for the duration of the loan;

(iii) an extension of the term to maturity of such loan; or

(iv) an asset restructuring plan entered into between the borrower and lender, the terms of which shall, within ten years of the date on which such plan is made, accomplish the purposes of the Agricultural Credit Act of 1986 and the amendments made by such Act; but

(B) does not include any such combination which—

(i) reduces the term to maturity of a loan; or

(ii) is made with respect to loan amounts of a qualified borrower totaling, in the aggregate, more than—

(I) $500,000 in the case of a qualified borrower who is an individual; and

(II) $700,000 in the case of a qualified borrower who is a person other than an individual;

(4) the term "qualified borrower" means, with respect to an agricultural loan, a person who—

(A) has derived at least 50 percent of the person's gross income during at least four of the previous five years from the production of agricultural commodities, including livestock, poultry, and the products of aquaculture;

(B) has gross annual sales of agricultural commodities of at least $30,000 during three of the last five taxable years ending before the date of enactment of this Act;

(C) has an average net income of less than $100,000 during the last 3 taxable years before the date of enactment of this Act;

(D) is delinquent in the payment of principal or interest on such loan; and

(E) enters into a restructuring and asset liquidation plan acceptable to the lender which—

(i) demonstrates a reasonable likelihood that the borrower will be able to repay the amount of the loan if debt restructuring is made;

(ii) contains a schedule for the liquidation by the borrower of such assets as the lender may require as a condition for such restructuring; and

(iii) provides for annual review by the lender to ensure that the borrower is making a good faith effort to carry out the plan;

(5) the term "qualified lender" means a—

(A) commercial bank;

(B) savings and loan association;

(C) credit union;

(D) insurance company; or

(E) institution of the Farm Credit System;

(6) the term "qualified State institution" means a State chartered depository institution, the deposits of which are insured or guaranteed under the laws of a State;

(7) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Agriculture;

(8) the term "State" means each of the several States, the Distirct of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Mariana Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and any other territory or possession of the United States; and

(9) the term "deferral" means a postponement of payment until the borrower can demonstrate an ability to repay. The Secretary shall determine the rate of repayment and shall apportion repayments among the lender, the State, and the Secretary.

TITLE III—CONSERVATION PROVISIONS

SEC. 301. PROHIBITING ASSISTANCE TO BORROWERS WHO PRODUCE COMMODITIES ON ERODIBLE LAND.

Section 1211 of the Food Security Act of 1985 is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" where it appears after the semicolon in paragraph (1)(E);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(3) treatment as a qualified borrower for purposes of title I of the Agricultural Credit Act of 1986.".

SEC. 302. PROHIBITING ASSISTANCE TO BORROWERS WHO PRODUCE COMMODITIES ON CONVERTED WETLANDS.

Section 1221 of the Food Security Act of 1985 is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" where it appears after the semicolon in paragraph (1)(E);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or" and

(3) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(3) treatment as a qualified borrower for purposes of title II of the Agricultural Credit Act of 1986.".

TITLE IV—ACCOUNTING PROVISIONS

SEC. 401. FEDERAL REGULATION OF THE ACCOUNTING FOR RESTRUCTURED AGRICULTURAL LOANS.

Section 13 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act (12 U.S.C. 1823) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(k)(1) IN GENERAL.—The appropriate Federal banking agency shall—

"(A) permit an insured bank to account for qualified agricultural debt restructuring under paragraph (2);

"(B) establish a program of capital forbearance under paragraph (3) for an insured bank engaging in qualified agricultural debt restructuring; and

"(C) implement call report requirements under paragraph (4) with respect to qualified agricultural debt restructuring.

"(2) ACCOUNTING OF RESTRUCTURED LOANS.—Consistent with generally accepted accounting principles, an insured bank engaging in qualified agricultural debt restructuring involving only modification of terms may account for the effects of the restructuring prospectively and will not be required to change the recorded investment at the time of the restructuring unless the recorded investment exceeds the total future cash receipts that can be reasonably anticipated given the new terms of the loan.

"(3) CAPITAL FORBEARANCE PROGRAM.—

"(A) Under a capital forbearance program under this paragraph the appropriate Federal banking agency shall permit the capital of an insured bank qualifying under this paragraph to fall below any applicable minimum capital requirement established by such agency to the extent that the reduction in such capital is attributable to qualified agricultural debt restructuring.

"(B) In order for an insured bank to qualify under subparagraph (A) such bank shall, before December 31, 1987, submit to the appropriate Federal banking agency an application containing a plan acceptable to such agency which details the insured bank's program to restore primary capital to levels at or above the regulatory minimum not later than January 1, 1993.

"(C) The appropriate Federal banking agency may establish additional specific requirements consistent with the requirements of this Act which any insured bank must meet in order to qualify under subparagraph (A), including requirements that such an insured bank—

"(i) demonstrate that its weakened capital position is not due to mismanagement, excessive operating expenses, excessive dividends, or action taken solely for the purpose of qualifying for capital forbearance;

"(ii) adopt and adhere to its plan for restoring capital to the required minimums; and

"(iii) report periodically to the appropriate Federal banking agency on its progress in complying with the plan submitted under clause (ii).

"(4) CALL REPORTS.—Each Federal banking agency shall implement call report requirements for loans restructured under qualified agricultural debt restructuring, providing an accurate description of their status. Such loans may be disclosed as 'Restructured and in Compliance With Modified Terms' or similar description.

"(5) IMPLEMENTATION DEADLINE.—Each Federal banking agency shall issue its program on capital forbearance and call report requirements for renegotiated loans not later than three days after the date of enactment of this subsection.

"(6) GUIDELINES.—Each insured bank shall develop guidelines for determining which borrowers shall receive qualified agricultural debt restructuring.

"(7) RECAPTURE IN THE EVENT OF NON-MONETARY DEFAULT.—In the event of non-monetary default by a qualified borrower on the terms of a loan modified by qualified agricultural debt restructuring without, consent by the lender, an insured bank may enforce the terms of such loan as they existed before such restructuring occurred.

"(8) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) terms defined for purposes of the Agricultural Credit Act of 1986 shall apply to this subsection;

"(B) the term 'insured bank' means an insured bank which is not an agricultural bank or energy bank as defined in subsection (j)(6); and

"(C) the term 'capital forbearance' means refraining from taking administrative actions to enforce capital standards.".

SEC. 402. MODIFICATION OF LENDING LIMITATIONS FOR LENDERS THAT RESTRUCTURE AGRICULTURAL LOANS.

Section 5200(a) of the Revised Statutes (12 U.S.C. 84(a) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraph (3) as paragraph (4);

(2) by inserting after paragraph (2) the following:

"(3) If the Comptroller of the Currency establishes a capital forbearance program pursuant to section 13(k) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, the Comptroller of the Currency shall, without public notice and comment, amend the regulations under this section to establish new lending limits for insured banks covered by the forbearance program, individually or as a class, to compensate for the effects on such insured banks for losses attributable to qualified agricultural debt restructuring. A lending limitation established pursuant to this paragraph in lieu of the limitation established in paragraph (1) shall not exceed 20 percent of the unimpaired capital and unimpaired surplus of an association."; and

(3) by striking out, in the paragraph redesignated as paragraph (4) by this section "paragraphs (1) and (2)", and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraphs (1), (2), and (3)".

SEC. 403. REGULATION OF THE ACCOUNTING FOR RESTRUCTURED AGRICULTURAL LOANS BY STATE INSURED DEPOSITORY INSTITUTIONS.

Notwithstanding any provision of the laws or constitution of any State, each appropriate State banking agency shall—

(1) permit qualified State institutions to account for qualified agricultural debt restructuring in the manner described in section 13(k) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act;

(2) establish a program of capital forbearance in the manner described in section 13(k) of such Act for qualified State institutions engaging in qualified agricultural debt restructuring; and

(3) implement call report requirements of the kind described in section 13(k) of such Act with respect to qualified agricultural debt restructuring by qualified State institutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

DEFENSE REORGANIZATION

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, because of circumstances over which I have no control, it was not possible for me to be present today when S. 2295, the bill on defense reorganization reported by the Armed Services Committee, and its accompanying report were filed. I merely want to say that this legislation is the result of a study initiated over 3 years ago by former Senators John Tower and Scoop Jackson.

A study has been made by a highly competent staff who questioned a great number of individuals and who studied many treaties on the subject of defense reorganization. This, again, was not something that either Senator NUNN or I instigated or asked for.

If each of you will recall, the Constitution charges us "To raise and support armies" and "To provide and maintain a Navy." The Constitution also empowers the Congress "To make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Since the writing of the Constitution, the Congress has often neglected this second responsibility. We did create the Secretary of Defense, the Air Force, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff in 1947, and we made certain improvements in these areas between 1947 and 1958. But since 1958, the Congress has not given enough attention to the important area of defense organization and procedures.

It is our responsibility to the Constitution that motivates me. I hope that my colleagues will understand this, and I hope that my friends in uniform will understand it. I have never pretended to be an expert on the military whose expertise has been gained by combat. The truth of the matter is, no one ever shot at me during World War II. I can say that mainly because I was never hit, nor did I ever fire a shot at anyone else. My decorations include one, the Air Medal, for having flown a single-engine P-47 aircraft across the North Atlantic Ocean during the war. The rest of my time was spent with the Air Transport Command supervising two transport runs from the United States to India, Burma, and China. There were a few runs across the so-called Hump.

I explain this because I do not want anyone thinking that I am attempting to back up the legislation and report that have been submitted by any claim of expertise in the subject on my part. As I have explained before, my actions have been prompted and motivated entirely by the Constitution and my responsibility as a Member of the Congress to it.

I have the utmost respect for the man in uniform and for his commanders. I have seen some of the things they have to go through. I have witnessed from the Congress the impositions that have been placed upon the military by Congressional micromanagement. I say to my friends in uniform and to my fellow Members of the Congress, all I want to see come out of this is a better military, better able to conduct itself in battle, better able to defend the United States in this new era where force is of such importance.

There will, naturally, be many efforts to amend this legislation. We have already had more than 80 attempts to amend it in the committee, and there will, undoubtedly, be many other areas where my colleagues will feel an amendment will improve them. But I beg of my colleagues not to clutter this bill up with extraneous material. The thorough study it has received can guarantee that, if properly passed by both Houses, signed by the President, and accompanied by the recommendations of the Packard Commission, the military will take a giant step forward. Going into battle will no longer raise a lot of the problems that have been raised in the past.●

AIDS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the Center for Disease Control recently reported that the AIDS virus quite possibly can be infecting more than 1,000 people each day. Of these 1,000 infected, between 10 to 20 percent will develop AIDS within 5 years. More than 18,800 cases of AIDS to date have been reported to the Center for Disease Control. This number is expected to double within 13 to 15 months.

The average lifespan of a person once diagnosed with AIDS is a year and a half. Very few diagnosed as having AIDS have lived longer than 5 years.

The cost to American taxpayers of caring for future AIDS patients may be overwhelming. In one of the first studies to assess the economic impact of the first 10,000 cases of AIDS, JAMA, on January 10, 1986, reported that approximately $147,000 is being spent on hospital care for each AIDS patient. The first 10,000 AIDS victims will require 1.6 million days in the hospital at a cost of $1.4 billion. Treatment for the next 200,000 AIDS patients in the United States could total $28 billion by 1990.

The disability rate for all patients with AIDS for the period from diagnosis until death is 86 percent. Because over 90 percent of the victims are between the ages of 20 and 49, it has been estimated that the lost future earnings because of premature death for just the first 10,000 AIDS victims is $4.6 billion. The expenditures for hospitalization, income lost due to disability, and lost future earnings total $6.3 billion for the first 10,000 AIDS cases in the United States.

Those cost figures may differ somewhat depending upon the geographic location of the patients, the availability of non-hospital-based health care and patient management. But despite some regional differences, I find these cost figures staggering. These figures can only be reduced through more rapid diagnosis of the disease, development of treatment strategies based on sound research protocols, and increased availability of appropriate patient care settings.

President Reagan, in his budget message to Congress, included AIDS research among the "high priority programs in crucial areas of national interest." Yet under the President's budget for 1986, there is a reduction in funding for AIDS research and control of $15 million. Cumulatively between 1987 and 1991, the President's proposed budgets, as compared with funds already authorized by Congress, would further reduce funding for AIDS research by almost $75 million.

AIDS is a fatal disease. The loss of productivity due to the disease is tremendous. The intangible costs related to AIDS, such as pain and suffering and adverse effects on personal relationships, are also great. Resources used and lost as a result of AIDS will continue to increase unless continued efforts are directed toward prevention strategies. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting increased funding for AIDS research and control.

BUDGET SCOREKEEPING REPORT

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I submit to the Senate the budget scorekeeping report for this week, prepared by the Congressional Budget Office in response to section 5 of the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1986. This report also serves as the scorekeeping report for the purposes of section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act," as amended.

The report follows:

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
U.S. CONGRESS,
Washington, DC, April 14, 1986.

Hon. PETE V. DOMENICI,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The attached report shows the effects of Congressional action on the budget for fiscal year 1986. The estimated totals of budget authority, outlays, and revenues are compared to the appropriate or recommended levels contained in the most recent budget resolution, S. Con. Res. 32. This report meets the requirements for Senate scorekeeping of Section 5 of S. Con. Res. 32 and is current through April 11, 1986. The report is submitted under Section 308(b) and in aid of Section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended.

No changes have occurred since my last report.

With best wishes,
Sincerely,

RUDOLPH G. PENNER,
Director.

CBO WEEKLY SCOREKEEPING REPORT FOR THE U.S SENATE, 99TH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION, AS OF APRIL 11, 1986

[Fiscal Year 1986—in billions of dollars]

	Budget authority	Outlays	Revenues	Debt subject to limit
Current level [1]	1,057.1	980.7	778.6	2,001.3
Budget Resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 32	1,069.7	967.6	795.7	[2] 2,078.7
Current level is:
Over resolution by		13.1
Under resolution by	12.6		17.1	77.4

[1] The current level represents the estimated revenue and direct spending effects (budget authority and outlays) of all legislation that Congress has enacted in this or previous sessions or sent to the President for his approval. In addition, estimates are included of the direct spending effects for all entitlement or other programs requiring annual appropriations under current law even though the appropriations have not been made. The current level excludes the revenue and direct spending effects of legislation that is in earlier stages of completion, such as reported from a Senate committee or passed by the Senate. The current level of debt subject to limit reflects the latest U.S. Treasury information on public debt transactions.

[2] The current statutory debt limit is $2,078.7 billion.

S. 2220, THE MUTUAL NUCLEAR WARHEAD TESTING MORATORIUM ACT

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I was pleased to join with my distinguished colleagues Senators CRANSTON, HATFIELD, KERRY, and HARKIN in introducing S. 2220 on March 21, 1986. The bill calls for a mutual, verifiable moratorium on nuclear testing, a step long overdue and in our national security interest.

What does the bill call for? It asks that the President resume negotiations with the Soviet Union on a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and that we cease further testing if the Soviets do the same. If President Reagan will not cease further testing, then, beginning 30 days after enactment of our bill, no funds can be spent on the testing of nuclear warheads for a period of 6 months. As a precaution, funds may be expended to prepare test sites to respond to a Soviet breakout from the moratorium. The President can test again only if he certifies that the U.S.S.R. has resumed testing. Finally, the President must submit in the 3 months' time and annually thereafter a report to Congress outlining the status of nuclear arms control negotiations and whether he believes the test ban is in our national security interest.

Sadly, the day after we introduced our bill the Department of Energy conducted its first nuclear test of 1986. The Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, had offered to extend the moratorium beyond the end of March if we would join them. The Reagan administration maintains that a nuclear test ban is not verifiable and, even if it were, would not in any event be in our best interest. Defense and Energy Department officials repeat the myth over and over again that as long as nuclear deterrence is the basis of our security, we will need to make periodic tests to check on our stockpile's reliability.

But seven of the Nation's top nuclear scientists—Hans Bethe, Norris Bradbury, Richard Garwin, Spurgeon Keeney, Wolfgang Panofsky, George Rathjens, and Herbert Scoville—disagree. Their letter to Chairman DANTE FASCELL of May 14, 1985, says very clearly that "nuclear testing is not necessary in order to insure the reliability" of our nuclear weapons. The best way, they say, to check reliability is to "disassemble sample weapons" and subject their components to nonnuclear testing.

At this point I would like to ask that their letter be printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. President, according to the Natural Resources Defense Council's recent study on nuclear testing, the United States has conducted 799 tests from 1945 through 1985. Last week's test was the 800th. The Soviets have tested 604 times, the French 141, the British 39, the Chinese 30, and the Indians 1. The total is an unbelievable 1,615 nuclear tests, almost half of them by the United States.

What have we gained from all this testing? Do any of us feel more secure because of our testing program? Isn't it time to reverse the direction of the arms race, to stop new destabilizing warhead designs that both sides will inevitably manufacture and deploy?

When President Reagan refused to go along with the Soviet moratorium last summer, he said we had to catch up. But we have had 200 more tests than the Soviets. In what way do we need to catch up? Is our nuclear arsenal qualitatively inferior? No lab director that I am aware of has ever made this kind of assertion, nor will they because it simply isn't true.

Could it be that we need to test nuclear explosives to investigate the SDI's x-ray Laser, which is powered by a nuclear explosion? Could it be that the nonnuclear defense proclaimed again and again by President Reagan cannot survive without nuclear weapons? If this is the case, then how will nuclear weapons be rendered "impotent and obsolete," the whole point of the star wars program? We need to decide whether the $600 million requested by the Department of Energy in fiscal year 1987 for SDI's "nuclear-driven concepts" is consistent with the objectives of the SDI program, and more importantly whether we should let SDI get in the way of a comprehensive test ban.

Finally, on the subject of verification, virtually all of our leading seismologists have testified that we can verify with high confidence a test moratorium. Seismic technology is so good that we can detect explosions in hard rock down to a level below 1 kiloton with our international network of monitoring stations. Our Norwegian station picked up just such a subkiloton blast from the main Soviet test site at Semipalatinsk last July 11. And with a network of tamper-proof seismic sensors located at one another's test sites, supplemented by periodic onsite inspections, a comprehensive ban can be verified with high confidence. The U.S.S.R. has agreed to both in-country sensors and onsite inspections; only the details need to be worked out. That is why it is so important to resume negotiations on a test ban, and to ratify the already signed Threshold Test Ban and Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaties.

We need to turn the arms race around. This bill will help move us in this direction. We can verify a comprehensive test ban. It's in our interest. And it is time to act responsibly on behalf of ourselves and future generations.

I submit for the RECORD a letter sent to Representative DANTE FASCELL by a number of distinguished Americans relating to this matter.

MAY 14, 1985.

Hon. DANTE FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Continued nuclear testing is not necessary in order to insure the reliability of the nuclear weapons in our stockpile. The best way to confirm reliability is to disassemble sample weapons and to subject the components to non-nuclear tests. Weapons can also be detonated without their nuclear components in order to insure that the complete assembly operates correctly. Nonexplosive tests are also available for determining whether the nuclear components have deteriorated during storage. If aging problems are found in some components, these components can be replaced with newly fabricated ones, using the orginal design specifications.

In the past these techniques have identified a number of reliability problems. In no case, however, was the discovery of a reliability problem dependent on a nuclear test and in no case would it have been necessary to conduct a nuclear test to remedy the problem.

In any event, it would be completely impractical to conduct the large number of nuclear tests that would be required to establish by this method a statistically meaningful measure of the reliability of stockpiled weapons.

We hope these observations will be useful to you in considering the Comprehensive Test Ban.

Sincerely,

Hans Bethe, Nobel Laureate in Physics, former Director, Theoretical Division, Los Alamos National Laboratories; Norris Bradbury, former Director, Los Alamos National Laboratories; Richard Garwin, IBM Fellow, Thomas J. Watson Research Center, Consultant, Department of Defense, Department of Energy; Spurgeon M. Keeny, Jr., former Deputy Director, ACDA; Wolfgang Panofsky, former Director, Stanford Linear Accelerator; George Rathjens, former Deputy Director, Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA); Herbert Scoville, Jr., former Deputy Director, CIA, former Technical Director, Defense Department Armed Forces Special Weapons Project; Paul Warnke, former Director, ACDA.

SALE OF U.S. CONSULATE BUILDING IN VENICE, ITALY

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, earlier this month, I became aware of certain information pertaining to the sale of the former U.S. consulate building in Venice, Italy. This building is one of the premier architectural prizes located on the Grand Canal in Venice.

In an effort to determine the veracity of the information I have received, I have written to Secretary of State George Shultz requesting a State Department reaction to this information. Many of our distinguished colleagues share our concern over appropriate ways to reduce unnecessary Government spending and to obtain full value for the American taxpayer when Federal properties are disposed of. They may be interested in this information. Therefore, I ask that my letter to Secretary Shultz be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, April 9, 1986.

Hon. GEORGE SHULTZ,
Secretary, Department of State, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Information I have received suggests that the United States government soon may sell a valuable building in Venice, Italy at a small fraction of its actual value. Thus, I would appreciate your comments and reactions on the following information. I make no claim that this information is true—therefore your response will help to clarify this matter.

The property is the former U.S. Consulate, located on the Grand Canal next to the Guggenheim Museum.

Under the leadership of a former American ambassador, it was arranged for the building to be sold to his alma mater, Wake Forest University, for $250,000. The sale was mandated by Public Law 93-264 of April 12, 1974, and the State Department entered into a sales contract with the university on November 6, 1974.

Various transactions slowed Italian approval of this transaction for several years, but on June 29, 1983, a deed of sale was approved, contingent on the clearances of national government authorities in Italy. Except for the Italian Foreign Ministry, all the necessary clearances have been approved.

Current valuation estimates by Italian realtors indicate that this irreplaceable artistic building is worth as much as $40 million, or as much as 160 times the actual sales price.

There are indications of deep resentment on the part of Italians who regard the sale of this building as improper and as demonstrating a lack of American understanding about the importance attached by Italians to the disposition of this property of particular public and artistic interest.

Mr. Secretary, I bring this to your attention for two reasons. First, I would like to have your assessment of the accuracy of the above points and some evaluation of whether the sale of this historic building was handled properly. It would be my intention to share your response to me with my colleagues through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Second, in view of the urgent deficit reduction efforts—including proposed consular closings—being undertaken throughout the government, I would appreciate receiving an analysis of whether we are receiving fair value for this property. Would it be possible to retain ownership of the building and arrange leases with responsible parties at annual lease rates equivalent to the entire $250,000 sales price? If such is the case, would it not be a rational choice for the U.S. government to retain ownership, particularly in view of the prohibitive cost of purchasing another suitable building should we decide later to establish a consulate in Venice?

As indicated above, the Italian Foreign Ministry has not yet rendered a final judgment on this matter. If it is true that we could save millions of dollars for the U.S. government and American taxpayers and at the same time avoid offending the citizens of an important ally, then it is important for the appropriate signals to be sent as soon as possible. Thus, I would be most grateful for your prompt response to this inquiry.

Sincerely,

LARRY PRESSLER, Chairman, Subcommittee on European Affairs.

NAUM AND INNA MEIMAN: THE BERN CONFERENCE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, tomorrow marks the first day of the Conference on Human Contacts in Bern, Switzerland. The Conference will last approximately 6 weeks and includes all of the signatories to the Helsinki accords. The Soviet Union and the United States will have a unique opportunity to discuss ways to resolve pressing human rights cases.

One of the most poignant cases is that of Naum and Inna Meiman. Naum was a renowned scientist until he began his activism in the Helsinki Monitoring Group, a watchdog organization in the Soviet Union that documents human rights violations there. Naum applied to emigrate to Israel over 10 years ago and was joined by Inna in that application when the two were married 5 years ago.

Since that time, the Meimans have suffered many hardships, including the involuntary retirement which the Soviets forced upon Naum. Inna is now critically ill with cancer. She has had four operations for tumors at the top of her spine. Although a fifth tumor is growing, Inna has been told that there is nothing more that the Soviet doctors will do for her. Even with Inna's illness, the harassment continues. The Meimans' telephone was recently disconnected.

To highlight the critical nature of the Meimans' plight, I want to inform my colleagues of a news event to coincide with the opening of the Bern Conference tomorrow with Senator HART, Senator BOSCHWITZ, Congressman WIRTH, Congressman SIKORSKI, myself and Olga Plam, Inna's daughter. Also in attendance will be a cancer specialist from Indiana who has seen Inna and has determined that she can be treated in the West. Only by raising our voices in protest will the Meimans' case be resolved.

I urge the Soviets to allow the Meimans to emigrate to Israel.●

ORDERS FOR TUESDAY

RECESS UNTIL 9:15 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 9:15 a.m. on Tuesday, April 15, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. Following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, I ask unanimous consent that there be special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes each: Senators HAWKINS, CRANSTON, HATFIELD, PROXMIRE, DOMENICI, and CHILES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent there is a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 426—HYDRORELICENSING BILL

Mr. DOLE. At the conclusion of routine morning business, by a previous unanimous consent, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 426, the hydrorelicensing bill.

MID-DAY RECESS

I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess between the hours of 12 noon, and 2 p.m., in order for the weekly party caucuses to meet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. At 2 p.m. the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] will be recognized to offer a substitute amendment to S. 426, and it may be that between 10 and noon, the distinguished Senator from Montana, Senator MELCHER, will be in a position either to offer an amendment or indicate that he will not offer one or more amendments to the hydrorelicensing bill.

Votes can be expected throughout the day, and it is the intention of the majority leader to complete acton on S. 426 tomorrow and the Senate could possibly vote cloture on the motion to proceed to the Hobbs Act. It may be that we will by agreement go to the Hobbs Act and then file a cloture motion on the bill itself and have that cloture vote on Thursday.

RECESS UNTIL 9:15 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, and pursuant to Senate Resolution 382, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Honorable Joseph P. Addabbo, late a Representative from the State of New York, that the Senate stand in recess until 9:15 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to, and at 6:31 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, April 15, 1986, at 9:15 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 14, 1986:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

J. Edward Fox, of the District of Columbia, to be an Assistant Secretary of State, vice William Lockhart Ball III.

INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Robert Brendon Keating, of the District of Columbia, to be U.S. Executive Director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for a term of 2 years, vice James B. Burnham, resigned.

BOARD FOR INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTING

Lilla Burt Cummings Tower, of Texas, to be a member of the Board for International Broadcasting for the remainder of the term expiring May 20, 1986, vice Frank Shakespeare.

Lilla Burt Cummings Tower, of Texas, to be a member of the Board for International Broadcasting for a term expiring May 20, 1989, (reappointment).

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

J. Michael Hudson, of Texas, to be a Deputy Under Secretary of the Treasury, vice Bruce E. Thompson, Jr., resigned.

IN THE ARMY

The following-named officer under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be lieutenant general

Maj. Gen. Gerald T. Bartlett, [redacted], U.S. Army.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The following-named colonels of the Marine Corps for promotion to the permanent grade of brigadier general, under title 10, United States Code, section 624:

James E. Sniffen	Jeremiah W. Pearson III
John S. Grinalds	Walter E. Boomer
David V. Shuter	Frank A. Huey
Bobby G. Butcher	John A. Studds
George L. Cates	William M. Keys
Richard H. Huckaby

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

RECONSIDERING AID TO THE CONTRAS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will once again consider whether or not to fund the Contras. I realize that most of us have read a great deal about the pros and cons surrounding this debate. I, nonetheless, felt that two articles from yesterday's Washington Post "Outlook" section are worth taking a look at before Members make up their minds on the upcoming vote.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 13 1986]

GENERALS WHO CONTRADICT THE CONTRAS

(By George C. Wilson)

United States policy for Central America reaches what President Reagan says is a crucial crossroads this Tuesday. That's when the House is scheduled to vote on whether to send $100 million to the contras who are challenging the Sandinista government of Nicaragua.

But one group of retired U.S. military leaders who have actually fought wars do not see this crossroads as leading anywhere at all, militarily, whether the contras get the money or not.

After having spent years digesting the lessons of the Vietnam War, these professionals look at Central America and despair. Just as in Indochina, they see no clear military or political objective; no long-range policy, just tactical moves day by day. They feel sure, from their battlefield experience, that 15,000 to 25,000 contras cannot unseat the Managua government whether they get the $100 million or not. So the $100 million looks to them like conscience money—an alternative to bugging out on the contras right now; a something-is-better-than-nothing reaction.

Some U.S. military leaders do indeed consider another $100 million for the contras an investment in the future of the region. But even Gen. Paul F. Gorman, former commander of the U.S. Southern Command, found himself on the defensive when asking for contra money last year: "Is there any reasonable likelihood that this military force can defeat the military force in Nicaragua?" Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) asked Gorman in his farewell appearance before the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Not in the foreseeable future," Gorman replied. He portrayed them as irritants, not victors, declaring: "My Salvadoran colleagues are entirely convinced that if it were not for the Sandinista opposition—the freedom fighters—the Salvadorans would have significantly increased military problems."

To respected soldier-statesmen like Gen. Bruce Palmer Jr., such a rationalization is not a policy. Palmer, in an interview representative of several others conducted with military professionals, shared his concerns about Central America. He spoke from the perspective of a general who, before retiring in 1974, commanded the troops former President Lyndon Johnson sent to the Dominican Republic, fought in Vietnam, ran the Army as vice chief of staff, advised presidents, and wrote a book entitled "The 25-Year War: America's Military Role in Vietnam."

"I think Nicaragua is probably gone," Palmer says. "Once dictators get in government, they dig in to control everything. Nothing short of a big effort can get them out. The time to intervene has passed. It's too late without starting a war, and we're not ready for that." Of the idea of using the contras, to overthrow the Sadinista government in Managua, he says, "It's ridiculous. It's sending a boy to do a man's job."

The fundamental weakness in the administration's position on Central America is lack of objectives, says retired Col. Harry G. Summers Jr., a soldier in and historian of the Vietnam War, now an analyst at U.S. News and World Report. "The objective is not only the first principle of war, it is also the most important, for all else flows from it. It asks the basic question, 'What are we trying to accomplish?' "

Despite these problems, says Palmer, if he were in the House of Representatives, he probably would vote for the $100 million as a symbol and then "look for better people to support. The contras already are discredited. We certainly don't want to get mixed up with Samoza guards. There is no such thing as covert action anymore." National leaders must go public with their concerns in Central America and "publicly warn" what they will not tolerate, he argues.

Retired general E. C. Meyer, former Army chief of staff, says he agrees with Palmer right down the line, adding he can't tell what the Reagan administration's objectives are in Central America but "if the objective is to try to cause an internal overthrow" of the Sandinista government, "it's not something that can be done through military means. You do it through people power, as was the case in the Philippines."

Retired lieutenant general Roy Thurman, former deputy director of the Army's training and doctrine command, says he, too has been unable to figure out the military and political objectives in Central America. He joined other military professionals in calling for less guns and more butter for the region. Rather than split the $100 million for the contras 70-30 in favor of military aid, Thurman recommends a reversal of those priorities.

Historian Summers also points out the weakness of the United States getting involved in another "coalition" war—one like Vietnam where a super-power is trying to work in concert with an underdeveloped nation." In order to gain public and congressional support for U.S. involvement, the American political leadership has a tendency to inflate the value of the coalition partner and to publicly announce that insurgent threats to the survival of the coalition partner also threaten the survival of the United States. The ally thus gains an erroneous perception of its own importance and may come to believe that the United States is permanently and irretrievably committed to its support."

Both active and retired military leaders have told me that they believe it is just a matter of time before the United States stops aiding the contras, no matter what Congress does in the coming week. One four-star general, in confiding those fears, said he would vote for the $100 million as a matter of conscience and then look for a way to pension the contras off while setting down clear national objectives in Central America.

In light of their battlefield and political experiences, a cross-section of professionals said it was time to take the following steps to give U.S. efforts in Central America a direction:

Draw a clear line outside of Nicaragua itself, that the Sandinistas can't cross. The United States would serve notice that it would oppose any effort by Nicaragua to overrun its neighboring countries. "We should draw a line and say this is it," Palmer said. "We have to keep hammering on the fact that this is close to home; that the Western Hemisphere is our base."

Declare that any new offensive weapons introduced into Nicaragua will be destroyed by the United States. Several generals noted that the Reagan administration's warnings to Managua against introducing MiG fighter planes into Nicaragua have proved effective. Military officials would like to see this doctrine applied to other sophisticated weapons as well. Instead, current thinking is that if something like an advanced Soviet helicopter is introduced, we should escalate by giving the contras advanced, "smart" antiaircraft missiles.

Increase financial assistance to friendly Central American countries and stress economic over military aid. Gorman's master plan called for creating jobs in building defense plants in the region. "I am convinced that in countries like Panama, Costa Rica and Salvador, even in Honduras, it would be possible to undertake, for example, a great deal more of defense-related electronics subcomponent assembly, the preparation of industrial fasteners and other modest tasks for defense prime contractors that are now being performed elsewhere overseas," Gorman told Congress. He noted in that context that 5 percent of the administration's security-assistance budget for fiscal 1986 was earmarked for all the friendly Latin American nations, compared to 27 percent for Israel.

If President Reagan or his successor should decide to go to war to remove the Sandinista government, this could not be done by subcontracting out the job to rebels, as was the case in the disastrous Bay of Pigs invasion, stresses Palmer. He recalled that after that invasion by CIA-sponsored forces, U.S. military planners focused on how much force it would take to topple Fidel Castro. It appeared to be a modest task at first. Palmer notes, but ended up with a plan calling for five U.S. divisions, or almost 100,000 men.

He estimates it would take "a couple of divisions" to take over Nicaragua but warns against expecting the native population to rally and help the invaders, as was assumed before the Bay of Pigs invasion. "You've got to do it yourself rather than depending on people rallying. Once they see who's going to win, then they rally," the old soldier says.

DEMOCRATS' FEAR OF VOTING

(By Mary McCrory)

To the Progressives in the House, David McCurdy (D-Okla.) is a suspect figure. Last year, he helped President Reagan get $27 million for the contras and assured his colleagues he had the president's promise that he would negotiate with the Sandinista government.

Now, however, the liberals are glumly lining up behind his alternative to the presidential proposal for $100 million in military aid to our mercenaries.

"It's not easy selling McCurdy," says Rep. David Bonior (D-Mich.), who is trying to persuade his liberal brethren that the ambitious Oklahoma Democrat is not in this instance a collaborator.

The realities of the contra vote, which is expected on Tuesday, is that while 200 Democrats stand firm against any aid at all, the magic number of 218 cannot be achieved. In the middle, controlling the outcome, are 25 or 30 Democrats who blanch at the thought of voting for nothing.

They feel so strongly about it that they would, if faced with the choice, vote for $100 million in military aid rather than for nothing, as proposed by Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.) With the Republicans solidly backing military aid, the president would win a total victory.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. is backing Hamilton, but when push comes to shove, he will have to join McCurdy. He is "not twisting arms " in McCurdy's behalf.

Bonior is urging liberal colleagues who wish to vote nothing to reconsider. "Look at the bill, not the personality," he says.

The alternative proposed by McCurdy, who has been cured of his delusion that the president would ever willingly negotiate with his counterpart Daniel Ortega, specifically requires direct talks between the U.S. and Nicaragua. It also provides $75 million in "logistical aid," bans the "lethal" variety and requires the president, after 90 days in which peace, presumably, is given a chance, to come back for release of the money.

Bonior tells the unhappy Democrats that it's about the best they can expect, since they are in the hands of the brokers.

Nobody hopes for anything constructive from Ortega, the president of Nicaragua. The day before the Senate vote, in one of his recurrent fits of bad timing, his troops crossed the Honduran border, as they often have before, in pursuit or contras. Reagan pounced on the crossing and inflated it to an "invasion". Honduran authorities were all off at the beach, but were persuaded, on receipt of $20 million in U.S. emergency aid, that their territorial sovereignty had been violated and that they were in trouble.

The press made much sport of the affair, but not until after Speaker O'Neill had lost his temper with Ortega and called him names, Ortega had seriously aggravated him a year ago by going to Moscow after the speaker had broken a pick to keep the House from voting contra aid. The speaker is in a little trip flap of his own right now, having been attacked by the U.S. ambassador to Argentina for his conduct as leader of a recess excursion to Latin America to find out if leaders in the area were saying the same thing publicly and privately about contra aid.

All this is of passionate concern to Washington, but not to the country, which is standing firm in the face of presidential alarms, 2 to 1, against any meddling in Nicaragua. They don't seem to care where Ortega goes or what he does. They pay no attention when the President and his men cry that the Sandinistas are coming to Harlingen, Tex., or San Diego, Calif. They tune out on lurid tales of drug trade and human rights atrocities. They think the money that is being talked about should be used to bail out farmers. Where Reagan sees another Cuba, they see another Vietnam. They want no part of it.

Members who tremblingly voted against aid on March 20 went home on the Easter recess to thanks and praise from their constitutents.

Since they returned, they have received another jolt. The Contradora talks have collapsed—"torpedoed" by the Sandinistas, says the president.

Bonior says the failure was "foreordained." The latest Contradora proposal asks the Sandinistas to reduce their armed forces before the U.S. withdraws support for the contras. "They regard that as suicidal," says Bonior. "But the Contradoras wanted the Sandinistas to make the first move, as a gesture of good will."

Good will is in short supply in any corner of the contra aid picture. What is written all over it is the iron will of a president who never says uncle and who has forced Democrats to the point where they don't dare do nothing for the contras.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE CLEARFIELD HIGH SCHOOL WRESTLING TEAM

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, congratulations to the Clearfield Area High School wrestling team which was the No. 1 dual meet team in Pennsylvania with a 15–0 record and which won the recent 1986 State championship in Hershey, PA.

Special congratulations are in order for Bison Coach Garry Barton who was named class AAA coach of the year; Todd Williams, Scott Collins, and Mike Owens, who were all first-place winners; Marty Novery who placed fourth; and Mike Triponey who was a qualifier.

Their performances in the 49th annual Pennsylvania Interscholastic Athletic Association wrestling championships have become a source of community pride in Clearfield and an inspiration to all their schoolmates as well.

I know all of my colleagues join me in wishing the Bison wrestling coaching staff and team members the very best in all their future endeavors.

HELSINKI REVIEW CONFERENCES IN BERNE

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, as the official review conference on the Helsinki accords of 1975 gets underway in Berne, Switzerland, a parallel conference called by the Andrei Sakharov Institute and Resistance International will be assembling there as well. Both conventions have the endorsement of Anatoly Shcharansky, the emigre hero who now lives in Israel.

There will be much to discuss. As Mr. Shcharansky notes in the article which follows, imprisoned members of Helsinki monitoring groups in the Soviet Union are finding that the authorities can prolong their internment indefinitely under a new article, 188–1, of the Penal Code. In Czechoslovakia, meanwhile, the watch group Charter 77 has been suppressed. The Polish Helsinki Committee has been forced underground.

As the suppression of known human rights activists continues, so too does the suppression of the human rights of the captive populations of the Communist countries. In a report issued last August, Jeri Labor, executive director of the U.S. Helsinki Watch Committee described each and every one of the Warsaw Pact members as: "egregious violators of human rights and the Helsinki accords." In the Soviet Union, Laber reported, "repression appears to be more effective than it has been since the death of Joseph Stalin." And the citizens who live under such conditions are permitted no escape. For example, exactly 53 Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate from the U.S.S.R. in the month of March, though hundreds of thousands have expressed the desire to do so. Only those with family members in the West have a serious prospect of being allowed that most fundamental right, the right to leave and seek a better life elsewhere.

I would like my colleagues to see the following article by Anatoly Shcharansky on the opening of the conferences in Berne. As always, his is eloquent testimony.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 13, 1986]

MOSCOW MUST START COMPLYING WITH THE 1975 HELSINKI AGREEMENT

(By Anatoly B. Shcharansky)

Anatoly B. Shcharansky, who left the Soviet Union in February, is living in Israel. This statement is to be delivered tomorrow in Berne, Switzerland, at the Paralle Helsinki Review Conference, a meeting of nongovernmental representatives designed to coincide with the official Helsinki review conference. The meeting was organized by the Andrei Sakharov Institute and by Resistance International, human rights organizations.)

I left the world of the gulag only a few weeks ago, and I am not yet ready to speak in public. Nevertheless, I could not refuse to greet you, if only in a recorded message, because the problems that brought you here today are extremely important to many people fighting for their rights in the Soviet Union and elsewhere in the world.

Ten years ago, several dissidents in the Soviet Union created a public group to monitor Moscow's compliance with the Helsinki agreements. Our idea was that many of the human rights issues that divide the governments of the Eastern and Western blocs could be agreed upon by independent representatives of public opinion—people in both East and West who have a vital interest in the implementation of the Helsinki agreements in their own countries. So we voluntarily took upon ourselves the task of examining how the Helsinki agreements were being implemented in the Soviet Union.

Ten years have passed, and what do we see? The Jewish emigration that began in the early 1970's has been brought to a stop by the Soviet authorities. Several hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews who want to leave the Soviet Union cannot do so for no other reason than that the Soviet Government has decided that they cannot.

I spent nine years in Soviet prisons and camps, and I can certify that the conditions in which political prisoners are detained have been getting steadily worse. I shall mention only two particular problems.

First, a new article of the Penal Code, article 188-1, introduced in late 1983, allows the Soviet authorities to extend almost at will the length of time that one remains in prison or in camp. This measure has already been applied to several members of Helsinki monitoring groups now in prison. It is used by the authorities both to prolong the detention of political prisoners who resist "re-education"—who refuse to comply with efforts to make them change their ideas and convictions—and to intimidate the others.

Second, according to a new official directive introduced barely a year ago in the Soviet Union, political prisoners who start a hunger strike can be immediately thrown into a dungeon—a measure that very much aggravates their sufferings.

These are only two examples of the many ways that the authorities are cracking down on political prisoners in camps. Why is this so important? Because, as a rule, the policy regarding the camps very much reflects the general situation in the country—the disregard for the rule of law and the harshness of the repression.

I would like to attract your special attention to the Sakharov case. I do not need to remind you that Andrei Dmitrivich Sakharov is a hero, a model of a honorable man who continues the very best traditions of the Russian intelligentsia, fighting for the trampled rights—be they national, religious or political—of all the people of the Soviet Union.

Needless to say, his present situation is extremely difficult. He is cruelly and unjustly isolated from his family and friends, barred from scientific work and normal social activities. His state of health inspires growing fears. I consider it vitally important at this moment to raise our voices and call for the Soviet Government to stop its persecution of Andrei Sakharov—to grant this remarkable man the possibility to continue his noble activities in dignity and normal conditions.

Looking back at the first documents issued by our Helsinki group 10 years ago, I must say that the longer I spent in prison, the more accurate they seemed and the more important. I also believe that it is more necessary than ever now for international public opinion to press the Soviet Union on these matters. It is high time for Moscow to begin complying with the Helsinki agreement signed in 1975.

I think that the Andrei Sakharov Institute and Resistance International have made a great contribution by organizing this meeting. I hope this work will be continued and will lead to further contacts, contributing to a real détente and to the establishment of genuine trust between the superpowers. In the long run, however, there will be no trust or détente until both sides show full respect for human rights in the keeping with the Helsinki agreement.

WEST POINT MODEL UNITED NATIONS TEAM

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute the 1986 U.S. Military Academy Model United Nations Team.

The U.S. Military Academy, located at West Point in the 21st District of New York, has a tradition of excellence, not only in its long and distinguished record of service to the Nation, but also in its reputation as one of the Nation's leading colleges. Its athletic teams are well-known for their prowess, but I would like to invite Members' attention to the extraordinary achievements of a group of cadets known as the West Point Model United Nations Team.

For some years, the Academy has encouraged cadets to participate in this highly specialized form of intercollegiate competition, in which member colleges develop the legislative and parliamentary skills of their students in diplomatic simulations which test their understanding of the international political, military, and economic environment. Under the sponsorship of the Academy's Department of Social Sciences, the West Point Model United Nations Team has established a reputation as one of the top teams in the country, winning a string of individual and team awards in regional collegiate model U.N. conventions.

The ultimate test of excellence in this arena, however, has always been the National Model United Nations Convention, held each year over 5 days in New York City, which brings together the Nation's best students in political science and international relations from more than 140 colleges and universities. This year, the West Point Model United Nations Team achieved an unprecedented honor when, for the third consecutive time, it was named outstanding delegation in the nationals competition. I should emphasize that this national intercollegiate title was won by cadets who voluntarily sacrifice their limited free time for this most demanding form of extracurricular activity, and who in no way are excused from the even more demanding requirements of the training regimen at the Academy.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it was Will Rogers who said that the United States never lost a war nor won a conference. This group of cadets has clearly shown that their skills as warriors will be complemented by their abilities as our future statesmen, and let me add, stateswomen. I know that Members will share my satisfaction that this latest cadet victory is but another example of West Point's record of excellence in developing our Nation's most outstanding young men and women into the "Long Gray Line" that has served this country for so long and so well. Before introducing the members of the championship team, let me pay particular tribute to their leaders—the team's captain, Cadet Jonathan Millen, and their coaches, Maj. Marvin S. Searle II, and Capt. Mike Simone. Well done, gentlemen.

CONSTITUTIONAL SPENDING LIMITATION

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation that would revise current House voting procedures. My bill would require a rollcall vote of two-thirds for passage on measures raising spending or taxes including resolutions making appropriations, joint resolutions making continuing appropriations, and conference reports.

Consider the following:

In February 1985, an emergency famine relief and recovery in Africa bill appropriating $1 billion was passed by voice vote. In other words, $1 billion of the taxpayer's money was spent without them knowing how their Representatives voted.

Last July, an energy and development bill appropriating $15 billion was passed by voice vote. Again, huge sums of money are being spent and constituents can only guess as to how they are being represented.

In December, passage of the Tax Reform Act of 1985 left constituents in the "dark" once again. The tax measure alone was estimated to affect over $141 billion in taxes from individuals and corporations over the next 5 years.

At midnight on October 3, 1984, just before Congress adjourned for the year, a massive $470 billion continuing appropriations resolution was passed by voice vote; an appropriation which is more than twice the size of our current deficit. This measure alone proved to be the largest single expenditure made in the history of civilization.

A quick look at the House voting procedures used to gain passage of these bills illustrates a failure on the part of Congress to account for its actions. It is a total perversion of the concept of representative government to permit voice-voting practices on tax and spending issues. Such practices can hardly be considered the basis for honest decisionmaking when Congress is not held accountable for such critical votes. Important issues demand the efforts of Members to take a stand. Anything less does violence to the system. We need to bring the actions of Congress into the "sunshine" for the public to see. If we have the courage to make and stand by decisions that affect the entire Nation at large, then we should have the courage the stand by them and not hide behind them. Such courageous measures would reflect the quality and not the quantity of the many votes we decide upon. By taking cover under voice-voting procedures, our constitutents will never be able to know how we vote on the various bills that control the use of their tax dollars.

James Madison said it best, arguing for the newly drafted Constitution in 1787 and 1788: "It will not be denied that power is of an encroaching nature and that it ought to be effectually restrained from passing the limits assigned to it." Later, in the same essay, he states that "the legislative department alone has access to the pockets of the people" and therefore, he explained, its authority should also be restrained. In conclusion, he emphasized:

> If angles were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: You must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place, oblige it to control itself.

We need only look at the pyramiding deficit of $208 billion to understand that the power of the "legislative department" to pick the pockets of Americans has not been "effectually restrained." The fact that we have such a horrendous deficit paints a bleak picture of Congress as a responsible decisionmaking body. Despite our efforts to put the blame on someone else, the fact remins that no President or executive agency votes to control the taxpayer's money. It cannot be denied that Congress is, in fact, the body imbued with the constitutional power to spend and tax. And Congress alone was there in the middle of the night when the $470 billion continuing appropriations resolution was passed. Over the past 4 years, we have had on the average, an annual increase in the inflation rate of 4.3 percent and an increase in spending of 7.9 percent. Some question whether taxes are high enough. Yet a quick look at the 6.5 percent annual increase in taxes over this period indicates that the pocketbooks of the American people are financing every spending decision made by Congress.

We must not forget the words of John Marshall who said: "The power to tax involves the power to destroy." And indeed, we are destroying the confidence of the people through the lack of responsibility that we are demonstrating in our decisions not to go on record. For this reason alone, we owe it to our constituents to give special consideration to all spending and revenue measures. Such decisions not only deserve total accountability, but a broader consensus than just a simple majority. We have no greater voting responsibility than on measures raising our constituents' taxes and spending their money. Such items demand the approval of a special majority. With billions of dollars being processed through our hands each day, we tend to lose sight of the value of each tax dollar. House voting procedures help facilitate this process through passage of bills by voice vote and simple majority approval. Undoubtedly, as legislators, we are a "little less than angels," and our authority in spending and taxing ought to be restrained. A rollcall vote of two-thirds for passage would ensure the confidence of the American people in our ability as Representatives to control the use of their money in a responsible manner.

Now is the time to stand up and represent the people in the way that our forefathers intended. Especially in times such as these, when our spending decisions should be under close scrutiny, it is essential that we stand behind our individual decisions to vote for or against each such item. The Constitution gives us the authority to spend the taxpayer's money. It is up to us to use that trust in a forthright manner.

Now is the time to own up to our responsibilities. For many years now, Members have proposed changes in House voting procedures. A need for change existed long ago. The moment for taking this courageous step is now—this session of the 99th U.S. Congress.

AID TO THE CONTRAS: WHAT IS BEHIND THE POLICY?

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, opposing aid to the Contras is not a question of siding with Daniel Ortega and the Sandinistas. It is a question of what is the best policy for the United States to pursue with regard to Nicaragua and the other nations of the region, and what precisely is behind the administration's request. What are its intentions toward Nicaragua?

In essence the argument over the Contras is really an argument over control. The White House wants to control the destiny of the region, insisting that events follow a preconceived notion of how they should proceed. It intends to use the Contras to undermine the Sandinistas, either by bringing them to the bargaining table or by causing them to crumble from within.

It is, at least at first glance, a logical plan. It permits the United States to move events along. It also fits in with the administration's notion that it is not possible for a totalitarian government—the Sandinistas—to fall without the use of outside pressure. This, in turn, coincides with the White House belief that the only thing the Sandinistas will respond to is force.

The White House has been successful in promoting a black/white, East versus West foreign policy, one not clouded by the nuances and subtlety of diplomacy that should characterize the foreign policy of a great power. Instead, administration rhetoricians reinforce the notions of a Latin American Armageddon if the freedom fighters are betrayed by Congress.

Yet why, despite these frightening warnings hasn't the administration been able to gain sufficient support for its policy? Certainly, $100 million is a significant sum of money when considering massive Gramm-Rudman inspired budget cuts. That money would go a long way toward helping to relieve urban blight or aiding distressed farmers.

But part of the problem is that throughout the Contra debate the White House has been largely unclear in its goals. This is where the logic of its plan breaks down. Not that it hasn't offered comprehensive briefing papers and policy statements calling for political solutions and reinforcing the idea that "power and diplomacy go hand in hand." In addition to this statement of tactic, the administration has said it wants "Nicaragua to be responsive to U.S. concerns about Soviet/Cuban ties, military buildup, support for subversion, internal repression, and refusal to negotiate."

While these goals sound reasonable enough, they become a bit hazy when one examines them more closely. What does the White House means by Soviet-Cuban ties? What is the bottom line? To what extent is the administration willing to pass resolutions in the United Nations about Nicaraguan repression as a means of protest against their abuses, to what extent is support for the Contras the only acceptable way to influence change? How far will the United States support Contadora? Does this include a willingness to "terminate external support to the irregular forces operating in the region," a position held by the Contadora and support groups, as well as by the five nations of Central America. Or, is the United States willing to support the Contras 10 to 20 years in the future? At some point are they expected to go it alone?

These questions may seem like details, obscuring the broader more important theme of the fight against the Sandinistas, but they should be clearly answered. The nations of Latin America, including Nicaragua, must understand what the United States wants and what it is willing to accept.

It would be naive to disregard legitimate U.S. strategic interests in Central America, and just as naive to down play Sandinista political repression and support for insurgencies throughout the hemisphere. Yet, it would be a mistake to ignore the importance of the role that Latin American nations can play in isolating the Sandinistas. President-elect Oscar Arias Sanchez of Costa Rica in a recent interview with conservative journalist, John McLaughlin, said that if the United States really wanted to help the nations of the region, then it should use the $100 million to help the ailing economies of Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica, and El Salvador. The prosperity of its neighbors, economically and politically, will help to undercut the Sandinistas.

A further question remains. Can the Contras provide the "power" that the administration needs to bring about a political settlement to its differences with the Sandinistas? Thus far, they have not shown themselves to be a force that can garner much popular support within Nicaragua. That does not mean they could not become such a force, neither does it mean that they need extensive U.S. aid for them to do so. Perhaps it would be better for the Contras if they were left to their own devices; if they were able to remove the taint of being U.S. proxies by going it on their own. Maybe that is the only way they can succeed.

Finally, there is not now and there never has been enough support in Congress or across the Nation for the Contras. Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Representative DANTE FASCELL of Florida, and committee member, DAN MICA of Florida, correctly pointed out at the committee's recent hearing on Contra aid that in order for foreign policy to be effective, it must enjoy a broad consensus of bipartisan support. There are still too many questions about the Contras—their human right record, their goals—and about the administration's policy toward Nicaragua before either will be able to muster that kind of support. High pitched rhetoric or emotional appeals cannot carry a controversial foreign policy.

R. EDWARD FERRARO

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, R. Edward Ferraro, a native and life-long resident of Brockway, PA, is the State deputy of the Pennsylvania State Council of the Knights of Columbus and he is being honored at a testimonial dinner on Saturday, April 19, 1986.

Mr. Ferraro is a past grand knight of Rev. Thomas E. Kennedy Council No. 3794, Brockway, and served in all chair offices in the council. He was elected State Advocate for the Pennsylvania State Council, Knights of Columbus, 1978–80. And as State deputy of the Pennsylvania State Council, Knights of Columbus, elected 1984–86, he leads 62,000 Knights in Pennsylvania and 9,000 fourth degree Sir Knights.

He is the first State deputy from the Erie Diocese in 32 years, and one of the youngest State deputies ever elected in Pennsylvania.

I know all of my colleagues join me in congratulating Mr. Ferraro on his many accomplishments and fine service in the Knights of Columbus and wish him well in all future endeavors.

TRIBUTE TO MICHAEL ARNOLD

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in tribute of Michael Arnold, Morris-Sussex Superior Court administrator. This past November Michael took over this position from his distinguished predecessor David Anderson, who was himself rewarded with promotion to the State's administrative office.

Michael has distinguished himself to the citizens of Morris and Sussex counties through 7 years of dedicated service in the court district. His record of excellence in previous position as a Morris County criminal justice planner, county probation officer, and State parole officer have earned him the respect and admiration of all who have come in contact with him in those positions.

For the 4½ years prior to his assuming the position of administrator he served as assistant trial court administrator. His record in that position furthered his reputation as a public servant of the highest integrity and abilities. It also provided him unique experience for his present duties as he has become intimately familiar with the workings and peoples of the Morris-Sussex district. The people of Morris-Sussex court district are indeed lucky to have such a capable and respected individual in this office. I take great pride in noting his accomplishments before my colleagues.

EARLINE PATRICE TO RECEIVE PAYNE HUMANITARIAN AWARD

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to the accomplishments of the winner of the 1986 Bessie H. Payne Humanitarian Award, Mrs. Earline Patrice. The award is given annually by the Dutchess County Chapter of the New York State Association for Retarded Children. On April 18, 1986, this great honor is to be bestowed upon a richly deserving woman.

Mrs. Patrice's affiliations with community organizations in the mid-Hudson Valley are too numerous to list completely. Her present affiliations include membership in the Smith Street Tenant Council, the Jamaican and Concerned Citizens Committee, and the German Civic Association of Lower Main Street. Mrs. Patrice is known for the Annual Childrens' Christmas Party as well as the Thanksgiving Day and Christmas Day Dinners which she and her volunteers hold for those who are needy and alone.

Because of her outstanding record of community service, Mrs. Patrice has been the recipient of numerous awards. She has received the Poughkeepsie Area Chamber of Commerce Merit Award in 1971, the American Legion Lafayette Post No. 37 Community Service Award in 1973, the Model Cities Faithful Service Award in 1975, the Bethel Church of Christ Community Service Award in 1976, the Martin Luther King Commemorative Committee of Dutchess County Outstanding Service Award in 1981, the Poughkeepsie Area Jaycees Outstanding Citizens of the Year Award in 1985. The Bessie H. Payne Humanitarian Award is yet another in a long list of well-earned awards and honors for Mrs. Patrice.

Mrs. Patrice's tireless efforts on behalf of the community she serves so well are known to practically all Dutchess County residents. I join them in thanking her for her dedication, service, and selflessness.

THE ENERGY INCENTIVES AND AGRICULTURAL FINANCIAL RESOURCES ACT OF 1986

HON. BEAU BOULTER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing "The Energy Incentives and Agricultural Financial Resources Act of 1986." This legislation addresses certain problems confronting the oil and gas industry, the agriculture industry, as well as the banking and financial industry which is involved in lending its financial resources to both energy and agricultural concerns.

As virtually all of us are aware, due to a number of factors, we are experiencing dramatic declines in both the agricultural and energy sectors of our economy, which has in turn caused widespread and far-reaching concern to many other sectors of the national economy. The effects of this development are becoming more serious and encompassing every day, and some of the factors contributing, I believe, have been: First, the message sent to energy developers and investors by the Housed-passed version of "tax reform"; second, inadequate authority on the part of Federal banking agencies to work with temporarily troubled banks, and third, the problems and restrictions brought on by the passage of both the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 and the Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation addresses these problems in the following ways:

First, the bill expresses, through a sense-of-the-Congress resolution, that any changes detrimentally affecting the oil and gas industry in H.R. 3838, or in any other tax reform bill, should not be included in final legislation passed by Congress.

Second, the bill provides enhanced flexibility to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reseve Board, to establish regulatory procedures that allow the restructuring of certain oil and gas or agriculture industry loans. It further provides for new acquisition provisions in the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, allowing for limited interstate purchases when an institution has been closed or is deemed to be in danger of failing, and when the appropriate regulatory authorities agree that action should be taken. Defining the specific terms and instances in which an institution is in fact failing, for instance, referring to capital-to-asset ratios or other industry recognized indicators which the appropriate regulators (the Federal Reserve Bank, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the respective State bank commissioner) would agree to and recognize jointly, have not been addressed in this piece of legislation. I would also mention that there may be additional clerical items which will also need to be addressed and further defined before specific sections in this bill would be complete, and I look forward to working with the distinguished chairman and members of the House Banking Committee in that regard. Other regulatory measures located in this section are intended to allow Federal banking agencies the regulatory abilities to work in cooperation with well-managed financial institutions whose capital may be temporarily impaired by adverse economic conditions beyond their control.

Further, this bill allows the natural gas industry the ability to make their product available to electric utility plants and major industrial users who choose natural gas as their energy source. Finally, this legislation provides for the transportation of natural gas without undue discrimination, and repeals the incremental pricing requirements of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to consider this issue, and hope they will join me in what I believe is an overdue effort to provide the mechanisms necessary to address the current situation.

THE ANTITERRORISM TAX ACT

HON. BILL LOWERY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, recent press reports have revealed that some American companies have been reluctant to quit operations in Libya after the President's order to do so. Many companies are still operating in North Korea, Cuba, Iran and Nicaragua, which, along with Libya, have been accused by the State Department of supporting terrorism as state policy.

Therefore, I have introduced legislation, H.R. 4278, which adds a financial incentive for U.S. companies to quit operations in terrorist countries and which prevents American taxpayers from indirectly subsidizing the economies of these nations.

Under current law, any corporation may receive a tax credit for any taxes paid to foreign countries on income earned in those foreign countries—called a foreign tax credit [FTC]. Although there are some statutes for denying credits and other tax provisions in response to foreign nations' dumping of goods, there are no provisions for denying these credits when those same nations commit acts of terrorism.

Briefly, H.R. 4278 requires the Secretary of State to list in the Federal Register nations which practice state-supported terrorism. The Secretary can add or delete countries from that list at his discretion. The bill then denies the use of the FTC for taxes paid to any country on the terrorist country list and has a part-year rule for cases when a country is listed or deleted during a tax year.

It is important to note, however, that H.R. 4278 only denies the FTC related to specific countries, it does not deny all FTC's to a company. For example, if a firm has an operation in a country such as Libya and one in a country which is not on the terrorist list, such as Saudi Arabia, the firm will no longer be able to use taxes paid to Libya as a way of reducing U.S. tax liability, but it will still be able to claim an FTC for taxes paid to Saudi Arabia.

In sum, Mr. Speaker, I would like to urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring H.R. 4278, providing a financial incentive for companies to leave terrorist nations. It is time we make the important political statement that the U.S. Government will not credit taxes paid to terrorists against taxes owed to the U.S. Treasury.

DR. PAUL F. KLENS

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Paul F. Klens, of Mill Hall, PA, who served as professor of biology and chairman of the department of biological sciences at Lock Haven University in Lock Haven, PA., is preparing to leave the university as an active faculty member in August 1986, and will be honored for his many years of service to the university at a special testimonial dinner Saturday, April 19, 1986.

A Lock Haven University scholarship fund will be established in his name to provide financial assistance to an undergraduate scholar majoring in the biological sciences.

Dr. Klens has been a member of many community and civic organizations in the 29 years he has lived in Clinton County and has over 15 years of administrative experience in business, education, and government.

I know all of my colleagues join me in congratulating Dr. Klens on his many accomplishments and fine service to Lock Haven University and to his State and country and wish him well in all future endeavors.

MSU TOPS IN HOCKEY

HON. BOB CARR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, the Michigan State University Spartan hockey team surprised a lot of people. This year was supposed to be a rebuilding one. Young players were going to get the needed experience. No one expected this to be a great season. Next year or even the year after that MSU fans were going to expect the title. But MSU went one better. They came from behind, just as they had all year, and scored the winning goal to go ahead of Harvard 6 to 5 in the closing minutes of the NCAA hockey tournamant. After a gallant last minute effort by the Crimson, the arena in Providence RI looked like a sea of green as the MSU spartans laid claim to the title.

Finishing the year with a 34 to 2 record, the Spartans relied on leading NCAA scorer Mile Donnelly, junior Mitch Messier, junior Jeff Parker, freshman Brad Hamilton and freshman Brian McReynolds. Donnelly was named MVP of the tournament.

Coach Ron Mason has a lot to be proud of. He has accoumulated nearly 500-collegiate hockey victories and now has his first NCAA championship.

The student body responsed as well, filling the streets of East Lansing at a celebration parade.

Today, I salute the MSU Spartan hockey team. They beat the odds and deserve to be the NCAA champs.

CHARITY AND SELFLESSNESS

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the people of the Sixth District of California. During the recent flooding of many areas of California, the people of the Sixth District exhibited a generous spirit of helping their neighbors that should be a model for all communities in times of trouble.

One example of this spirit is the people and parish of St. Anselms of Ross, CA. During the flooding the people of the parish opened their school as an evacuation center to provide aid to many of the residents forced from their homes by rising water or peril of mudslide.

There are many unnamed heroes in the flood areas and I would like to commend them for their charity and selflessness; they certainly will not ask it for themselves.

MS. JEANNE LOSEY'S POEM HONORING "CHALLENGER" ASTRONAUTS

HON. PHILIP R. SHARP

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the House of Representatives attention to a poem I received recently from Ms. Jeanne Losey of Shelbyville, IN. Ms. Losey's poem expresses so well the country's sadness over the tragic deaths of the Challenger astronauts, yet our determination to proceed with the NASA program so as to continue their vision of future space exploration.

"CHALLENGER," JANUARY 28, 1986

(By Jeanne Losey)

They set out bravely into space,
And took our hearts along.
There was no thought of tragedy,
Or something going wrong.
Then came that awful ball of fire,
And everybody knew
That God had made a special place
For Challenger's brave crew.
For 7 heroes died that day,
But even though they're gone,
Their dreams are ours to be fulfilled;
Their memory still lives on.

Our country grieves for Challenger
And its courageous crew,
But, as we weep, we carry on,
For there is work to do.
They blazed a trail across the sky
Right to the heavenly gate.
They all were space-edge pioneers
Who bravely met their fate.
We shall not let them die in vain;
We must be strong and brave.
Because of heroes just like them,
Old Glory still will wave.

TRIBUTE TO THE MOST REVEREND JOHN J. DOUGHERTY, AUXILIARY BISHOP OF NEWARK

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply saddened to note the passing last month of one of Newark's finest spiritual leaders, Bishop John J. Dougherty.

Bishop Dougherty's career spanned 52 years and his great achievements and kindness touched the lives of countless people within and outside of his archdiocese. After his ordination in 1933, Bishop Dougherty earned degrees in sacred scripture, including a doctorate from the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome. He served as professor of scripture at Immaculate Conception Seminary in Mahwah for 22 years, hosted "Catholic Hour," a radio and later television program in the 1940's, and served on the Pontifical Commission of the Vatican for Motion Pictures, Radio, and Television.

Bishop Dougherty rose through the ranks of the church, becoming monsignor and, in 1962, auxiliary bishop. Beginning in 1959 he served for 10 years as president of Seton Hall University. Bishop Dougherty was one of the first Catholic prelates to speak out against the Vietnam war.

Although Bishop Dougherty was partially paralyzed by a stroke in 1980 and confined to a wheelchair, he continued his activities as chairman of the New Jersey Catholic Historical Records Commission and as chaplain to the Knights of Columbus.

Mr. Speaker, at the funeral Mass on March 24, Newark Archbishop Peter L. Gerety eulogized Bishop Dougherty as a man with a "great priestly heart." Although I mourn the loss of this great and kind man, I take comfort in knowing that his good works will be remembered and honored for many years to come.

Mr. Speaker, I commend to you Archbishop Gerety's homily, delivered in eulogy at the funeral Mass of Bishop John J. Dougherty:

FUNERAL MASS FOR MOST REVEREND JOHN J. DOUGHERTY, AUXILIARY BISHOP OF NEWARK, BY MOST REVEREND PETER L. GERETY, ARCHBISHOP OF NEWARK

Bishop Dougherty went home to God last Thursday evening at seven o'clock. His death came after more than half a decade filled with suffering and a courageous battle against the sickness which finally snatched him away from us just a few days ago.

We all have fond memories of him as he was before his stroke felled him in 1980. He was small of stature but he was an attractively healthy and handsome man with an engaging easy smile, a tender gentleness in his relationships with others and a gift for forming endearing friendships.

If we loved him before his stroke, we learned after it to add to that love profound admiration for the manner in which he bore the cross of illness. How he fought to overcome the slur in his speech, how he struggled to walk straight and proud again!

And above all, how he showed to us who were close to him the depth of his faith as he bore his suffering in union with his Lord. On one occasion, during one of the several crises brought on by his illness, he had been confined to a hospital bed for a considerable number of days. A priest of the Archdiocese who was a close friend of his dropped in to see him. He was agreeably surprised to find him at last sitting up in a chair.

He expressed to the Bishop his delight to see that he had fought his way to recovery. He said, "Bishop, it shows what a good man can do." In reply the Bishop said, "It shows that suffering is a part of the apostolate."

That remark revealed what a great priestly heart lay behind that ever-present smile. It made clear how closely he lived with the great High Priest, his crucified and risen Lord Jesus.

It was as if he had constantly ringing in his ears the Savior's instruction to all those who wish to be His true disciples. "If any man would come after Me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow Me. For whoever would save his life will lose it; and whoever loses his life for My sake, he will save it." (Luke 9, 23-24)

And he knew and profoundly believed with all his being the truth of that other saying of the Lord which we have just heard proclaimed in the Gospel selection chosen for this Mass. "Come to Me, all you who are weary and find life burdensome, and I will refresh you. Take My yoke upon your shoulders and learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble of heart. Your souls will find rest, for My yoke is easy and My burden light." (Matthew 11, 28-30)

Today we are gathered here to commend Bishop Dougherty to that gentle and humble Lord Whom he followed all his life in joy and in sorrow and in pain. He hoped with all his strength for that promised rest as he bore his cross with the Lord. We pray with all our hearts that God's eternal rest may be his now that he has passed through death to the life that was always the goal of his pilgrimage on this earth.

Indeed it is our goal too. Today we suffer pain and sorrow. The separation brought by death is an inescapable fact of the human condition. We cannot brush aside the crushing nature of that reality, nor can we deliver our hearts from it. It is part of the love we bear for one another that we should feel profoundly and shed bitter tears at the passing of those who are close to our hearts.

And yet our holy faith teaches us that death itself has been conquered by the Risen Christ. Its icy grip has been broken. God in Christ has promised, as Saint Paul said to Timothy, "If we have died with Him, we shall also live with Him, if we endure with Him, we shall also reign with Him." (2 Tim. 2, 11-12)

And in his first letter to the Corinthians, the great apostle to the Gentiles cried out, "Death is swallowed up in victory. O death where is thy victory? O death where is thy sting? . . . Thanks be to God, who gives us the victory through Our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, my beloved brethren," he said, "be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that in the Lord your labor is not in vain." (1 Cor. 15, 55-58)

As men and women of faith we firmly believe that death is a new beginning, the entrance into that heavenly city with God, His angels, His saints and all those loved ones who have gone on before us. The pain of death is real, it breaks our hearts. But even in the midst of sorrow the believer is sustained by the firm hope of better things to come.

The night before He died, the Lord Jesus spoke to His apostles with great solemnity. Good Friday He would hang on the cross and the world of injustice and evil would seem to carry the day. But He said:

"Truly, truly, I say to you, you will weep and lament, but the world will rejoice; you will be sorrowful but your sorrow will be turned into joy. . . . You have sorrow now, but I will see you again and your hearts will rejoice, and no one will take your joy from you." (John 16, 20 ff)

Bishop Dougherty was pastor of Saint Rose of Lima Church in Short Hills from 1969 until 1977 when he resigned to become Scholar in Residence at Seton Hall University. At the farewell mass in Short Hills he bored out his heart in these words, "What is it we celebrate today? Surely not a going away. No, it is presence; Yours to me and mine to you. If you ask what this presence has meant to me, it is that I have seen God in people."

In those words there is a distinct echo of the words of Christ which I have just quoted. The Christ who died, rose and became present to His followers even more intimately than before, He in us and we in Him. John Dougherty, priest of Christ, Bishop of Christ's people believed profoundly in that presence of the Lord. He saw God in everyone and everywhere. He believed in presences, the Lord to us and we to Him.

Those of us who knew him well sensed in his ready smile, his constant good humor, his open-friendliness, the manifestation of a profound joy in God's presence, a wonder at the spirit-filled universe peopled with men and women and little children, all radiant with the God who had made them His temples of flesh and blood.

Joy in the Lord, even when he was in pain or in sickness, even in the last days of his struggle with his stroke, even on the bed of his last agony, joy in the Lord seemed to radiate from his every word, from his endearing smile. It was as if he had always ringing in his ears and echoing in his heart those words of Saint Paul to the Phillipians, "Rejoice in the Lord always! I say it again, Rejoice! . . . The Lord is near." (Phillipians 4, 4)

Shortly after Bishop Dougherty's death one of our young priests said to me, "Archbishop, we have lost a great man!" Who indeed can doubt it?

One has only to look at the record of the broad interests, of the multifaceted priestly service which characterized the Bishop's life to realize how true those simple words are.

As a young man he was chosen for studies in Rome and was ordained in the Eternal City on July 23, 1933. Then the list of accomplishments and service to the Church and all humankind on the national and international scene begins:

Licentiate and then Doctorate in Sacred Scripture from the Pontifical Biblican Institute in Rome, Professor of Scripture in our own Immaculate Conception Seminary for twenty-two years, author of many learned articles for professional and religious journals, regular speaker for long years on national radio and television for the Catholic Hour, member of the Pontifical Commission at the Vatican for Motion Pictures, Radio and Television, honored as Papal Chamberlain, as Domestic Prelate, named President of Seton Hall University in 1959 and then named Auxiliary Bishop to the Archbishop of Newark in 1962—the list goes on and on. To ecclesiastical service we must add his activities in international affairs and interreligious ecumenical organizations. The interests of this dear man of God would fill a book. Scholarship, religion, justice in the world, peace, the new liturgy for which he was a member of the International Commission on English in the Liturgy; it is simply breathtaking.

It is impossible here to go through the entire story. All we can do is sit back and applaud such a universal man in a time of enormous change.

And with that I return to the question of the well-spring from which flowed John Dougherty's breadth of interest and service. To describe it is one thing, to understand its motivation and its roots is another.

Nevertheless it is basically simple, it is the secret of the saints. John Dougherty was a man whose whole life reflected that saying of Saint Paul, "The love of Christ impels us." (2 Cor. 5, 14) To Jesus Christ he gave himself as a young man and from that sweet smelling sacrifice of praise he never waivered. His path, chosen out of love, was a life-long response to those words of the Lord, "Abide in Me. . . . He who abides in Me and I in him, he it is who bears much fruit." (John 15, 4-5) He loved Jesus, the Word of God in the Scriptures, and in that Word he found delight.

He loved Jesus in His body, the Church—and so he served that Church through all the enormous changes of our time with open-hearted generosity and joy.

He loved Jesus in the people he met and so our hearts were warmed and made happy by his unfailing gentleness and courtesy, by his obvious empathy for us in our joys and sorrows.

And now we come to say good-bye. To the Bishop's family we offer our sympathy in their loss. Indeed, we share that loss of the gentle priestly presence among us—the presence as he said, he to us and we to him. But we take heart for we know that the living words of Jesus are meant for us at such a moment if we abide in Him, "You will be sorrowful, but your sorrow will turn into joy. . . . I will see you again and your hearts will rejoice, and no one will take your joy from you." (John 16, 22 ff)

FRANK STANTON'S APPRECIATION OF EDWARD R. MURROW

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, in September of last year, CBS chairman and for the past 9 years, the Chairman of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Information, Frank Stanton, was the featured speaker at the USIA Alumni Association meeting.

In his remarks, Mr. Stanton noted, with understandable pride, that CBS has "given the (former) Office of War Information and the U.S. Information Agency three directors: Elmer Davis, Edward R. Murrow, and Frank Shakespeare." Each was very different, but all were equally dedicated to their profession.

Mr. Stanton took that opportunity to pay particular tribute to Ed Murrow—and in so doing, he provided a useful historical perspective of the World War II era. I believe his reminiscences are of value to this body and to the public at large, and for this reason, I would like to include the full text in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. Stanton also suggests that the current prohibition on making USIA products available to schools and colleges in this country is fast becoming outdated. While I am personally not convinced that this body is ready to embark on such a course, I believe Mr. Stanton's thoughts along this line were worthy of very serious considerations.

Finally, I would merely point out that Frank Stanton, like those he has eulogized, is also a very distinguished American and when he speaks to us on the subject of information policy, it behooves us to listen—and listen carefully.

The full text of Mr. Stanton's address follows:

REMARKS BY FRANK STANTON TO THE INFORMATION AGENCY ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

It's an unusual pleasure to be here today. After nine years as Chairman of the US Advisory Commission on Information, plus my stint on the Panel Report, I feel like something of a USIA alumnus myself.

I also feel exceptionally close to USIA for another reason.

CBS has given the Office of War Information and the US Information Agency three directors. Each very different, each very dedicated. Elmer Davis, Ed Murrow, Frank Shakespeare.

When Lou Olom invited me to come here today, he told me about the marker the Alumni Association had placed in that little park on Pennsylvania Avenue, dedicating the plot of land to Ed Murrow's memory. He suggested that in addition to whatever else I would like to say, I might talk a bit about Ed. He said it wouldn't be a dedication of the marker—that's been done—but a sort of a rededication.

That struck me as an excellent idea.

In fact, I can't think of any set of standards and ideals to which we in the world of information should more often rededicate ourselves than those of Ed Murrow.

I've long felt a special personal kinship with Ed. We were born in the same year. We came to CBS within a week of each other, almost 50 years ago. So we sort of grew up in broadcasting together. Actually, most of us here today are fortunate to have known and worked with Ed.

Ed was remarkable for what he was and also for what he represented. He was one of only a handful of journalists in all history whose stature as a man of his times—and for all times—overshadowed even his towering stature as a broadcaster.

Three great forces guided him. There was his strong faith in the power of education and enlightenment. There was his never-ending quest for perfection. And there was his passionate devotion to his duties as a journalist. His concept of those duties was to help the public—as he put it—"know the facts as far as they are ascertainable, and so to illuminate and explain facts and situations, as fairly as possible, as to enable the listener to judge and weigh them for himself."

Most Americans remember Ed Murrow as a creature of television: "See It Now," "Person to Person," "Small World." But it was on radio that he became an American institution.

Ed used to say that all he knew about radio was that the short waves were long and the long waves short. That, of course, was part of his gift for understatement and humor. But beyond that, he had a rare capacity for conveying the deeper meaning and the emotional quality of world events. They flowed through him like a stream. We saw it vividly on that historic day in March, 1938, when he went on the air from Vienna to report on the Anschluss of Austria and what we all recognized later as the beginning of the Second World War. That broadcast, the first CBS World News Roundup, was a milestone in journalism, tying the world together with live on-the-spot coverage of events as they were happening. In the decades since then, this format has become the hallmark of electronic journalism, bringing together correspondents from world capitals, battlefields, disaster areas, wherever the news is breaking.

During the Nazi blitz of London, it was the measured tones and perceptive reporting of Ed Murrow that awakened Americans to the ugly realities of the war then raging through Europe. With deep compassion and concern for the suffering he saw, he brought the burning city into our living rooms. He carried the dead to our doors, and we know they were more than the dead of London. They were the dead of mankind. He followed Londoners on their way to air-raid shelters and caught their measured footsteps on his microphone. He joined RAF bomber pilots on their raids over Germany and described the flak and fire.

This man destroyed the dangerous illusion of distance and time that insulated our nation from the grim events taking place in Europe. He destroyed the myth in many American minds that what is done 3,000 miles away is not really done at all. "There are no words to describe the thing that is happening here," he said of the inferno raging in London. But he somehow found the words. Simple ones. As the first American correspondent to enter Buchenwald, he expressed the same inability to describe the horrors found there. But somehow did.

It was from London that he stirred the soul of America. It was from London that he truly entered the heart of America.

When Ed broadcast from London, three things gave his reports the enormous impact they had.

One was that great resonant voice which conveyed such authority and immediacy and at the same time had a quality of human warmth that people responded to instinctively.

Another was his courage, and his passion to get the truth and convey the truth.

The third was the technology of radio itself.

For those who grew up in the television age, it may be hard to realize how exciting radio was in the 1930s and early 40s. When Ed brought the Battle of Britain home, live, to American living rooms, nothing like that had ever been done before. For the American people, it was a totally new experience. And it was gripping, chilling, heart-rending.

In that darkest hour of Britain's modern history, Ed Murrow, more than anyone, was the link that bound the United Kingdom and the United States together.

His success was a personal triumph. In a very personal way it also marked the coming of age of broadcasting as an information medium.

Thinking back on those broadcasts today is a vivid reminder. First, that some things don't change; and second, that some things do change.

The human qualities, the professional qualities, that Ed brought to his work—those things don't change. But technology—that does change.

In the 1940s radio was the most pervasive and powerful information medium we had. Only radio had that immediacy and intimacy. Only radio brought us the human voice.

Now we have television. Through the magic of radio, we could hear Ed Murrow live from London. Through television, we could hear and see him. but the world of communications has expanded dramatically during the two short decades since Ed walked the halls at 1776.

And now we have a proliferation of new ways to get a television signal from one place to another. Satellites dot the skies. Cable snakes its way across the land. VCR players are in every fouth home. And increasingly, direct broadcast receiving dishes are sprouting from the landscape like giant inverted mushrooms after a spring rain.

Satellites, cable, VCRs, PCs, digital recording—these are radically changing the way we process and transmit information. They're changing the tools of the game. They're stretching the reach of the possible. And they're making a lot of our traditional thinking about communications obsolete. Technology is indeed driving us to change our way at home and abroad.

Today, I'd like to focus on two things in particular that I think this means for USIA.

First, it means that in its overseas information programs, the US has to move broadly and boldly beyond radio—just as the American people in their own news and entertainment habits have moved beyond radio. The Agency has begun to do that with Worldnet.

And second, it means that here at home the old rules that have barred the American people from seeing the product of USIA are more anachronistic than ever.

Let's think for a moment about those new technologies.

Let's think about digital recording—the laser disc. We've probably all listened to that wonderful new sound of music on those shiny compact discs. But they can be used for more than music. Already Grolier has put its entire encyclopedia—21 volumes—on one little five-inch disc, with an index that allows you to go to any subject in 5 to 10 seconds. Entire libraries can be put on discs and distributed to remote areas by satellite.

Think of what that means for our capacity, not just to store and retrieve information, but to transmit and share information.

And think about satellites. As more go up, as they broaden their footprints so that signals bounced off of them can be picked up over a wider and wider area, think what that means about our ability to reach places that are now unreachable.

Today, shortwave radio remains an effective means for reaching the people of the Soviet Union. Technically, there is little reason to believe that will not be true tomorrow, when it comes to signal availability and receivers. Except for the fact that Soviet television is reported to be coming up fast, due in large measure to its domestic program distribution via a sophisticated system of satellites and land-based stations. Not unlike our own television networks, save for geographic scale. Our lower 48 states stretch across four time zones: the USSR spans eleven.

As television becomes available to more and more people in the USSR, it could do the same thing to radio listening there that television did to radio here. It could soak up the audience's available time and attention. If and when that day comes, consider what impact that will have on the audiences for the Voice and Radio Liberty, as well as other Western radio broadcast services. Consider, too, that the source of the television news and information will be Moscow.

Does that mean we give up? To the contrary. It means we must plan ahead to the time when satellite technology will permit us to cover selected parts of the world with adequate television signals. It means we think about the impact of television, and about how advancing technology makes it possible to use television in new places and in new ways.

Ed Murrow believed in truth. He also believed in openness. And it's in his spirit that I suggest the time has come to stop hiding the work of USIA from the American people.

For almost 40 years now USIA has been producing an outstanding array of materials that present America to the world. But these have been off limits to Americans. We can show them overseas, but we can't show them here. If Americans want to see what their tax dollars are paying for, if they want to see how their government is portraying this country abroad, they have to go abroad.

When Congress first established USIA, there was a perhaps understandable concern that once the government got into the public information business, an unscrupulous administration might abuse the process in order to propagandize the American people for its own political purposes. So Congress leaned over on the side of caution. What USIA produced would be for overseas distribution. Period. It would not be shown or heard in the US. And therefore it would not be subject to political abuse. Through a combination of the sense of Congress and the power of precedent, this caution has hardened into an inflexible and binding rule.

But two things have happened to make those worries obsolete. One is experience. The other is technology.

For almost four decades now, USIA has maintained high standards of professionalism and integrity. And at the same time the American press, both broadcast and print, have shown convincingly that they are watchdogs with teeth. Surely any administration so foolhardy as to attempt to subvert USIA for domestic political purposes would be exposed and condemned by those whose business it is to keep an eye on government, and would quickly and sorely regret it.

At the same time, cable, satellites and VCRs have transformed broadcast technology. Many television receivers on sale today are "cable-ready," with dozens of cable connections. The consumer is no longer operating in an environment of scarcity with regard to programming sources. Even today every other home in the US has cable. Deregulation of broadcasting is itself predicated on the increased availability of multiple sources, and on the notion that the consumer ought to be the ultimate authority when it comes to program choice. Some day at least one of those cable connections ought to be available, if some enterprising person chose to make it available, to those Americans who might want to see what their government is telling the rest of the world about us.

Mind you, I'm not talking about using government money to distribute USIA programs in the United States. What I am talking about is ending the prohibition on their being shown here, so that schools and colleges and others who might want to know what their government is distributing abroad can gain access to the product. I'm talking about letting Americans themselves see it and make use of it, just as they can see and make use of the materials put out by the Government Printing Office. If not over the air or by cable, then by VCR.

Also, now that home satellite-receiving dishes are increasingly blanketing the countryside, the government soon won't be able to black out the USIA's product even if it still tries to. Eventually it's going to be up there, waiting to be pulled from the sky. So what I'm suggesting is that Congress catch up with technology and change the rules so that what will otherwise be done surreptitiously can be done openly and legitimately.

Truth doesn't have an easy time in today's world. It never did. It's our job to make its way easier, not harder.

But truth does have a wonderful quality: it has the power to cross national boundaries and to penetrate prison walls.

I'm glad that you who gave your careers to USIA are proud of Ed Murrow. CBS is proud of Ed Murrow. I'm proud of Ed Murrow.

Ed represented something central to the role of American journalism which is also central to the mission of USIA. He was both a truth-seeker and a communicator. Unfortunately, some people are one but not the other. Yet it doesn't help much for a person to seek the truth if he can't communicate it. And it is down-right dangerous if a person communicates well, but what he communicates isn't true.

Ed believed what we all believe: that in the world of information, truth is the ultimate standard.

In his CBS office Ed hung a quotation from Thoreau: "It takes two to speak the truth—one to speak and another to hear." And speaking of television, he used to say that without a message "all you have is a lot of wires and lights in a box."

That's at the heart of the challenge facing USIA: getting the message clear, getting it right, and getting it heard. Getting it across national boundaries, through Iron Curtains, into homes and villages and factories and schools around the world.

By taking advantage of the new technologies, we can help to make it available. And by letting the American people know what the message is, we can increase the public's confidence that we're getting it right.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO COMBAT NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing two pieces of legislation to help combat one of the most fearsome problems facing this country and the entire world today—poorly controlled proliferation of nuclear technology.

It is not an issue that has received the attention it deserves; in fact, it is not really even on the agenda of general public discussion. Because we tend not to address a problem until it is generally perceived to have reached crisis proportions, there has been little attempt to determine the status of nuclear proliferation and to propose ways to curb its expansion. With this subject, though, we cannot afford to delay action, for the costs of a crisis, in human and economic and environmental terms, are just too great. By the time a nuclear weapon is exploded by a non-superpower country or a terrorist organization, the realities of proliferation will be too intractable, and the time to solve them too short, for us to prevent a disaster of unthinkable horror.

The bills I am proposing cannot, by themselves, solve the problem, but they are useful and necessary steps—blocks in the foundation of a lasting structure to prevent uncontrolled proliferation. My legislation would simply deny all trade preferences—Most-Favored Nation, Generalized System of Preferences, Caribbean Basin Initiative, and Free Trade Agreements—to countries that have not signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) or the Limited Test Ban Treaty, the basic documents in force designed to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. These bills could help move us toward a more stable nuclear world.

Current U.S. nuclear policy is based upon the so-called "strategic triad," comprised of land-based ICBM's, submarine-launched ballistic missiles, and strategic bomber forces. It is a policy of death and destruction based upon a balance of terror, and it confronts us with the fearsome prospect of an endless nuclear winter, more terrible than any Ice Age. It is inhuman and it must not continue. My legislation would establish one leg of a new strategic triad: a triad to support peace. The three legs would be a comprehensive test ban, reduction of existing nuclear stockpiles and nonproliferation of nuclear technology. Unlike the current triad, it would be stable and survivable in the long run. Resumption of negotiations for a comprehensive test ban, which has received overwhelming congressional support, would provide the first leg. The Geneva arms talks would provide the second leg. My bills would set the framework for the third leg.

I believe the two areas, trade preferences and treaty adherence, can and should be linked. We grant such preferences to responsible members of the world community, and there is a conscious policy of tying those benefits to economic and diplomatic behavior. Agreement to limit nuclear weapons should be the most basic requirement for any country seeking standing in the community. If a country refuses to make the basic sacrifices necessary to preserve the community, it should not be eligible for the benefits accruing from membership in that community. My bills would change current policy only by extending the criteria for membership to include a willingness to participate in an attempt to protect the world from nuclear terror.

The problem of proliferation is present in three arenas, each presenting unique dangers and requiring unique measures to dismantle those threats. The first arena, and the one which has captured the world's attention, is the arms race between the superpowers. This is understandable. With about 50,000 nuclear weapons between them, these countries have the power to destroy the entire planet with just a small fraction of their arsenals. Article VI of the NPT calls on all signatories to "pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament. . . ." Without question, the United States and the U.S.S.R. have, especially in the past few years, failed miserably at this. Until the members of the nuclear club abide by the sections of the treaty that apply to them, they will have little leverage in persuading nonnuclear nations not to seek nuclear weapons. I suggest that speedy negotiations on a comprehensive test ban, as called for in House Joint Resolution 3, which the House passed on February 26, would be a good first step in this area.

The second arena, and the one which has received the least public attention, covers the drive by other nations to acquire nuclear weapons. In the past decade, India, Pakistan, Israel, and South Africa have become "associate members," capable of producing nuclear weapons, if they have not done so already. Frighteningly, none of those countries is signatory to the NPT, which means that there can be no safeguards or restrictions under the treaty on the types of nuclear material they acquire. Other countries which have nuclear aspirations and will soon have nuclear capabilities include Brazil and Argentina, which have not signed the NPT, and Iran, Iraq, and Libya, which have signed but whose recent behavior casts real doubt on the depth of their commitment to peace and the quality of any promises they may make. Many of these countries already have well developed conventional arms industries. At present, Israel, India, Brazil, Argentina, and South Africa are among the top six weapons producers in the third world.

Consider the situation for a moment. We have here nine countries, each frantically trying to build nuclear weapons. Several of them have a history of unstable government. All are in a currently or potentially volatile situation militarily. How safe can we feel knowing that these countries can acquire nuclear weapons, free from oversight by the International Atomic Energy Agency or any other body?

Think for a minute. Pakistan and India are traditional enemies and have fought several wars over the past 40 years. Pakistan is ruled by an autocratic military dictator who dreams of enlarging his country's (and thus his own) power and prestige. India's Prime Minister was assassinated last year and the country is torn by domestic religious and economic turmoil. Israel has been in a state of war since 1948 and is surrounded by hostile countries. South Africa is also confronted by enemies, both from within and without, and has shown little restraint in committing brutal atrocities as they attempt to preserve their racist, indefensible regime. Brazil and Argentina are long-standing competitors for supremacy in South America. Both have recently shed military rulers and replaced them with democracies. Both countries, however, still have in their cultures the tradition of autocratic rule and both will be facing very trying economic times in the next few years which could trigger serious social unrest. Iran and Iraq have been at war with each other for 6 years now. Both countries have leaders who can, at best, be considered fanatics. Both have shown blatant disregard for international agreements and basic human civility through their use of poison gas in that war. Both have committed themselves to fight to the death. Finally, there is Libya. Colonel Qadhafi can most kindly be classified as a lunatic. In his disregard for international law, human life and the very basics of civilized behavior, the colonel has acted like a renegade terrorist. The acquisition by Libya of a nuclear weapon would be a catastrophe of the highest degree.

The fact that some of those countries are currently our allies does not make the situation less disturbing. In the first place, the nature of a government's leadership may change (witness Iran, Pakistan, Brazil, and Argentina), but nuclear capabilities do not. In the second place, are nuclear weapons less destructive when fired by a government of which we approve? Are the costs any less? Would fewer innocent people die if India dropped a bomb on Pakistan than the other way around?

The third and perhaps most terrifying arena, which has received some public attention lately, is the race by various terrorist groups to acquire a nuclear weapons capability. These weapons would not be of the type that initially come to mind; they would probably be small, crude devices that could perhaps fit into a suitcase or an oil drum. This does not make their destructive capability any less terrible. The weapons would not have to use the latest technology or be highly accurate because they would not have to elude missile defenses or penetrate hardened silos.

Consider the traumas that governments have faced when dealing with a hostage situation with dozens or even hundreds of hostages and identifiable terrorists armed with conventional weapons. Consider then the magnitude of difficulty in dealing with a terrorist's nuclear weapon planted in a locker in Grand Central Station or hidden in the coat check room at the Smithsonian.

Perhaps equally as frightening, imagine the abrogations of international law and individual rights that terrified governments could commit to guard against such an occurrence. The recent hijacking of a small plane in international airspace by Israel indicates the measures that governments are currently willing to take to protect their citizens. With the threat magnified exponentially by a nuclear threat, the willingness to violate agreed-upon rules and processes would increase as well. If that happened, the terrorists could substantially win without ever firing a shot.

Since the nuclear age began in the 1940's the members of the nuclear club have tried, like the Greek gods protecting fire, to keep the knowledge to themselves. Unfortunately, the members have all played a mercenary Prometheus at times, rushing to sell their secrets and get something for them before another country does. With none of the partners trusting the others to keep the secret, the result is that they all give it up, hoping to be soon enough to get credit—in this case, money and gratitude—for it. Our nuclear technology sales to China at a time when they may be providing nuclear help to Pakistan is a case in point.

The history of failed attempts to keep the nuclear club exclusive is a sad litany of poor planning, mistrust, sovereign pride, and greed. When the United States was the sole nuclear member, the first arms control proposal was to establish an international agency to take control of nuclear facilities and materials worldwide, after which the United States would destroy its nuclear weapons. This plan ended when the Soviet Union, mistrustful of U.S. intentions, demanded that the United States destroy its weapons first, before an international system preventing other countries from making them was established. The United States, equally mistrustful, refused.

Having failed with the Soviets, the United States turned its attention to its allies in Western Europe and, through the formation of the NATO alliance and the development of the Atoms for Peace Program, tried to dissuade them from pursuing nuclear capabilities. Britain concluded its first nuclear-weapons test in October 1952 and France joined the nuclear club in February 1960. So much for NATO.

The United States then switched its tactics from unilateral appeals to stop proliferation to more cooperative efforts, including negotiation of the Limited Test Ban Treaty and the creation of the International Atomic Energy Agency, charged with developing safeguards on the supply and use of atomic energy. Unfortunately, the IAEA could not inspect facilities built with material or assistance from countries that made IAEA compliance a prerequisite to any sale. Facilities developed independently within the country or with help from countries that did not demand IAEA oversight could not be watched. Also, there were several practical and technical problems with IAEA inspection procedures. In 1964, China exploded it first nuclear device, above ground, like all other nations' first tests. China was not signatory to the Limited Test Ban Treaty.

Growing desperate, the nuclear club members overcame their conflicting interests and developed the Non-Proliferation Treaty, which went into effect on March 1, 1970. In 1974, India conducted a "peaceful nuclear explosion." It is also widely believed that Israel assembled the various components needed to make a bomb in the 1970's. As Roger Molander and Robbie Nichols said in their book, "Who Will Stop the Bomb?", "so much for nonproliferation by treaty. It's good as far as it goes but it's hardly good enough unless everyone can be persuaded to sign." And, I might add, to comply.

As proliferation increases, the differences in negotiating a treaty to slow the spread grow exponentially. Multilateral negotiations are much more difficult to conduct than bilateral ones, and as more diverse viewpoints gain a say in the content of the final product, that document almost inevitably becomes weaker and less enforceable. Also, as the market for nuclear products and technology grows, the ability to monitor sale and use, especially reprocessing, becomes almost negligible. Regulating nuclear proliferation is rapidly becoming an impossible task; it is imperative that we act now at least to slow the leakage until we can figure out a way to stop it altogether.

There is hope, though, and there should be progress because this is an issue where it seems that all countries have, on balance, a real incentive to stop proliferation. Certainly, there are market forces at work which encourage proliferation. On the supply side, there are incentives to sell nuclear know-how, similar to those incentives to sell conventional weapons around the world. Short-term fiscal and foreign policy considerations can drive many countries to sell arms almost indiscriminately, regardless of what the long-term cost might be. The difference with nuclear weapons is the staggering burden of that long-term cost, which should outweigh the possible current attractiveness of a nuclear transfer. On the demand side, there are legitimate sovereignty and security reasons for nonnuclear countries to seek nuclear knowledge. Many face real energy problems which they feel can be alleviated somewhat with nuclear energy. Others feel that the nuclear club has little right to dictate terms to them, especially when they are not abiding by their part of the NPT by seeking arms reductions. Still others feel legitimately threatened by other countries or antigovernment forces and know that potential aggressors are much less likely to attrack a government that has nuclear weapons.

Nevertheless, the overriding concern of all countries should be to stop proliferation. Nuclear club members want to keep their club exclusive. Nonmembers whose programs are not advanced want to keep other nonmembers whose programs are advanced from joining the nuclear club. The problem group is those countries that are not members but that have advanced nuclear programs. Naturally, most of those countries have not signed the NPT. I believe it is time to start a multifront program to encourage those countries to help stop proliferation. Probably, there should be incentives, such as added security agreements, aid in developing alternative energy capability and so on. Certainly there should be strong diplomatic pressure applied. And, I think the time has also come for there to be sanctions against the most obstinate countries.

The case is strong for trade sanctions as a measured but effective step. Trade benefits are a privilege for the recipients, not a right. As with foreign aid, we should and do expect something in return for them. In practice, this bill does not change the policy of quid pro quo, it merely places a commitment to nonproliferation high on our list of foreign policy priorities. Trade benefits are easier to adjust than foreign aid. Much foreign aid is tied up in medium- and long-term programs for which disrupting funding could cause real problems. Trade benefits are much less cumbersome. Since they work on a transaction-by-transaction basis, they are easier to adjust and the effects are better contained. Finally, trade benefit programs are clearly a foreign policy tool. MFN, GSP, and CBI were all established for diplomatic as well as economic reasons.

As I have said before, neither of these bills will, by themselves, solve the problems of nuclear proliferation. At the very least, though, passage of these bills would give all countries real incentive to sign the NPT. It would also send a signal that the United States is serious about proliferation and ready to take steps to combat it. By forcing the issue, in a sense, it could bring all countries to discuss proliferation and, if there is general agreement that the NPT is not workable, stimulate discussion on possible alternatives. And, combined with support for a comprehensive test ban, further discussion of additional security agreements and programs to develop alternative energy programs in countries that need them, these bills could be an important part of an all-fronts attack on the scourge of proliferation before it reaches the point where no reasonable type of control is possible.

Mr. Speaker, we don't have time to delay until we find a perfect solution. In the past 40 years, the nuclear club has expanded from one to probably nine members. In another 15 years, several dozen countries could have the ability to manufacture nuclear weapons. There has been much talk about the legacy we are leaving our children by dallying on the issue of budget deficits. I would suggest that leaving them a world of nuclear anarchy would be even worse than the fiscal anarchy we are preparing for them now. I would hope that our sense of stewardship would prevent us from allowing this to happen.

Much of the terror we feel with nuclear weapons grows out of our sense that our technological ability to destroy the world has outpaced our diplomatic ability to save it. We still are not comfortable with the ability of the United States and the U.S.S.R. to handle the awesome responsibility that comes with possessing nuclear weapons and both countries have had almost 40 years of practice. How secure can we feel if a growing number of countries suddenly develop a nuclear capability without having had any experience in handling it, at a time when their political and social systems may be shaky and they may feel seriously threatened by outsiders? I don't believe we can allow ourselves to get into a situation where we have to find out. The potential costs are just too great.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleagues in this Congress will support these two pieces of legislation. I hope they will seize this opportunity to take a first step, to get the ball rolling and to let it lead us to a policy that will effectively control the unregulated spread of nuclear technology. I hope we will be able to do this before we have a disaster and have to explain how we could have been so blind to such a clear and looming and awesome danger.

PIL WOONG LEE RECOGNIZED FOR EFFORTS TO REBUILD KOREA, SERVICE TO U.S. 8TH ARMY

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, when the truce between North and South Korea was signed on July 27, 1953, Korea was a country devastated by war. Clearly, the country faced a long period of rebuilding. Little more than a year after the signing of the truce, on October 5, 1954, a company was formed which would play a key role in bringing Korea back to its feet. That company is the Poong Lim Industrial Co. The company has also been a significant one for the United States because of the many construction projects it has performed with distinction for the United States 8th Army stationed in Korea.

This week, we are honored to have visiting Washington the president of Poong Lim, Mr. Pil Woong Lee. Mr. Lee is living proof that the liberal arts major has a place, and a high one in the world of business. Mr. Lee's undergraduate degree is in English language and literature. He went on to graduate study in business administration at Yonsei University in Seoul. While he completed those studies in 1981, Mr. Lee has 22 years of practical experience in business management. Since 1981, he has been president of domestic operations for Poong Lim.

As with a number of the top management of Poong Lim, Pil Woong Lee gained his initial business experience at the Daelim Industrial Co. where he began to work his way up the ranks in 1964. He began as manager of the domestic projects department, a post he held until 1966 when he became the director of project promotion and administration. Ten years in that position gained him the expertise that elevated him to executive director of that division in 1976 and to senior executive vice president of the entire domestic operations division in 1979. Mr. Lee became president of Poong Lim in 1981. The top management of Poong Lim share a wealth of experience among them. In fact, between them, the president and the chairman of the board have more than 50 years of experience in the construction industry.

A philosophy of quality before quantity has helped to bring Poong Lim within striking distance of being a billion-dollar-a-year company. Today, Poong Lim is rated 99th among the world's top 250 international contractors.

I have been personally impressed with the emphasis that Mr. Lee's company places on safety at all levels. The company takes pride in counseling its personnel that people are more important than things. As a result of this enlightened point of view, the greatest care is taken to ensure the safety of workers. Moreover, the company management believe in going a step farther to build into their designs safety features for those who will operate the plants they build. As an indication of their safety record, one of the many awards the company has received is a citation from the Arab American Oil Co. for having worked 1,010,210 man hours without an accident.

The record of quality, safety, and concern for people has earned Poong Lim many contracts with the United States 8th Army stationed in Korea. Over the years, Poong Lim has built troop quarters, office buildings, sanitary systems, mess halls and family housing for the Army. Since 1981, in fact, Poong Lim his done more than $16 million worth of work for our Army. I would like to take this opportunity to salute Pil Woong Lee and his company for its outstanding work in behalf of the United States Army an for its patriotic effort to rebuild South Korea to a position of prosperity and economic well-being for its citizens.

SANFORD McDONNELL, A MAN TO WHOM WE OWE MUCH

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I often speak of America's new generation and our responsibility to that generation. Our country has the best of everything to offer, and we, in Congress, must preserve the best and do what we can to guarantee that future.

This responsibility is vast and Congress needs the assistance of all Americans. It is a pleasure to know a man who, in his own actions, is also working for the same end. While his means may not be the House of Representatives, he has proven his dedication to the future, to America, and to its citizens. I speak of Sanford McDonnell, chief executive officer of the McDonnell Douglas Corp.

From his beginnings in Little Rock, AR, to the leadership he now shows in the business community, Sandy McDonnell has supported the future. His company has been active in the aerospace industry. McDonnell Douglas is the prime contractor for the Skylab space laboratory, and produced the Mercury and Gemini spacecrafts. Space is the frontier of the future. There is an enormous, unexplored frontier that lies waiting.

Under McDonnell's leadership, his company has been at the forefront of developments in the defense and commercial aerospace and electronics industries.

Aside from his business related efforts, he has also helped prepare future generations for leadership through his work with the Boy Scouts of America. He is currently national president of the Boy Scouts of America. This organization can help mold young men to face what's ahead; to be always aware of the concerns and needs of other; and to lead others to that future.

Tomorrow, Sanford McDonnell will receive the Electronics Industries Association's Medal of Honor. The electronics industry is aware of the work he performs and is honoring him with their most prestigious award.

This is an opportune time for us, in Congress to become aware of the work he has done. It is only through the actions of individuals like Sanford McDonnell that the work Congress performs can be effective. Individuals like Sanford McDonnell care about our society and future that waits just around the corner. I believe that society owes Sanford McDonnell a debt it can never repay. We can only try by honoring him with our thanks and our best wishes.

Every citizen has a responsibility to the future. People like Sanford McDonnell carry that responsibility well and are molding the future for my children, my neighbors' children, and all the children of the world.

ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY AND HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to submit into the RECORD with my colleague and cochairman of the congressional human rights caucus, JOHN PORTER, a statement by Anatoly Shcharansky which appeared in the New York Times yesterday. His comments are especially worthwhile in light of the up-coming international meeting in Bern, Switzerland, regarding emigration and human contact issues.

Mr. Shcharansky writes with incredible clarity about a problem which concerns many of us here in Congress: The continuing persecution of Jewish and other political prisoners in the Soviet Union. Writing with the conviction possible only from one who has directly experienced the horrors of his subject, Mr. Shcharansky depicts the appalling conditions of the "re-education" of political and religious dissidents. These conditions, unfortunately, have not improved in the last 10 years since the signing of the Helsinki Final Act. In fact, Mr. Shcharansky indicates that conditions for political prisoners are actually worsening.

JOHN PORTER and I, on behalf of the congressional human rights caucus, commend this article to the attention of all Members of Congress. We must re-dedicate ourselves to the pursuit of human rights, today more than ever before. We should begin a dialog about the real world—tragically, the gulags are part of that world.

The statement follows:

MOSCOW MUST START COMPLYING WITH THE 1975 HELSINKI AGREEMENT

(By Anatoly B. Shcharansky)

I left the world of the gulag only a few weeks ago, and I am not yet ready to speak in public. Nevertheless, I could not refuse to greet you, if only in a recorded message, because the problems that brought you here today are extremely important to many people fighting for their rights in the Soviet Union and elsewhere in the world.

Ten years ago, several dissidents in the Soviet Union created a public group to monitor Moscow's compliance with the Helsinki agreements. Our idea was that many of the human rights issues that divide the governments of the Eastern and Western blocs could be agreed upon by independent representatives of public opinion—people in both East and West who have a vital interest in the implementation of the Helsinki agreements in their own countries. So we voluntarily took upon ourselves the task of examining how the Helsinki agreements were being implemented in the Soviet Union.

Ten years have passed, and what do we see? The Jewish emigration that began in the early 1970's has been brought to a stop by the Soviet authorities. Several hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews who want to leave the Soviet Union cannot do so for no other reason than that the Soviet Government has decided that they cannot.

I spent nine years in Soviet prisons and camps, and I can certify that the conditions in which political prisoners are detained have been getting steadily worse. I shall mention only two particular problems.

First, a new article of the Penal Code, article 188-1, introduced in late 1983, allows the Soviet authorities to extend almost at will the length of time that one remains in prison or in camp. This measure has already been applied to several members of Helsinki monitoring groups now in prison. It is used by the authorities both to prolong the detention of political prisoners who resist "re-education"—who refuse to comply with efforts to make them change their ideas and convictions—and to intimidate the others.

Second, according to a new official directive introduced barely a year ago in the Soviet Union, political prisoners who start a hunger strike can be immediately thrown into a dungeon—a measure that very much aggravates their sufferings.

These are only two examples of the many ways that the authorities are cracking down on political prisoners in camps. Why is this so important? Because, as a rule, the policy regarding the camps very much reflects the general situation in the country—the disregard for the rule of law and the harshness of the repression.

I would like to attract your special attention to the Sakharov case. I do not need to remind you that Andrei Dmitrivich Sakharov is a hero, a model of a honorable man who continues the very best traditions of the Russian intelligentsia, fighting for the trampled rights—be they national, religious or political—of all people of the Soviet Union.

Needless to say, his present situation is extremely difficult. He is cruely and unjustly isolated from his family and friends, barred from scientific work and normal social activities. His state of health inspires growing fears. I consider it vitally important at this moment to raise our voices and call for the Soviet Government to stop its persecution of Andrei Sakharov—to grant this remarkable man the possibility to continue his noble activities in dignity and normal conditions.

Looking back at the first documents issued by our Helsinki group 10 years ago, I must say that the longer I spent in prison, the more accurate they seemed and the more important. I also believe that it is more necessary than ever now for international public opinion to press the Soviet Union on these matters. It is high time for Moscow to begin complying with the Helsinki agreement signed in 1975.

I think that the Andrei Sakharov Institute and Resistance International have made a great contribution by organizing this meeting. I hope this work will be continued and will lead to further contacts, contributing to a real détente and to the establishment of genuine trust between the superpowers. In the long run, however, there will be no trust or détente until both sides show full respect for human rights in the keeping with the Helsinki agreement.

DON'T ABANDON THE NICARAGUAN PEOPLE—SUPPORT THE CONTRAS

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, Jaime Chamorro, editor of La Prensa, the most prominent newspaper in Nicaragua, a foe of dictatorships of the right and left, has written an important and persuasive article outlining the case against the Communist government of Nicaragua and in support of aid to the democratic resistance.

Yesterday, April 8, the Associated Press carried a story from Managua, stating that La Prensa was not published Monday, April 7 "because government censors had eliminated almost 60 percent of the articles planned for the edition."

Given the circumstances under which he is forced to live by the Communists, Mr. Chamorro has displayed extraordinary courage in bringing to our attention the plight of his country. It is inconceivable to me that anyone could read this article and still not understand the obvious totalitarian nature of the Sandinista's Communist dictatorship.

At this point I insert in the RECORD, "Don't Abandon the Nicaraguan People," by Jaime Chamorro, the Washington Post, April 3, 1986.

The article follows:

DON'T ABANDON THE NICARAGUAN PEOPLE

(By Jaime Chamorro)

MANAGUA.—As the question of sending $100 million in aid to the anti-Sandinista rebels was being discussed in Congress, the bishop of León, Nicaragua, Monsignor Julian Barni, made the following comment: "While in the United States they are discussing the $100 million, the Soviet Union has already given $100 million and much more without any discussion at all." Bishop Barni added: "What is necessary is that both imperialist powers, not one alone, stop complicating matters in Nicaragua. The Nicaraguan people have fought to establish a true democratic regime and hope to achieve one. This is what matters most."

Nicaragua's problem, in effect, is not only a problem of the Nicaraguan people—their loss of freedom, civil and political rights. The problem is not only the total absence of democracy and political pluralism or the suppression of freedom of expression. Nor is it just the problem of discontent that prevails as a result of the same kinds of disastrous social and economic conditions that brought on the revolution. Nor is it only the persecution of the church, as if we have never seen this in the history of our country. Nor is it the 10,000 political prisoners.

In addition to these disgraces, which in one form or another we have seen appear and disappear in most Latin American countries, there emerges a particularly grave situation: the Sandinistas are transforming the Nicaraguan revolution, fought for by all Nicaraguans, into a revolution that serves the purposes of Marxism-Leninism. That is to say, they are taking a national movement and turning it into a beachhead for communist expansion. And they have sacrificed the national interest for the benefit of this cause.

Before the Sandinistas reach this goal, those Nicaraguans who are fighting for democracy have the right to ask for help from wherever they can get it. It is a cause far too important to lose. For the Nicaraguan people, the issue at hand is of such transcendental importance that they cannot vacillate at all in choosing the right position. The future of the freedom of generations of Nicaraguans hangs in the balance.

Those who argue that to give aid to the Nicaraguan rebels would be a violation of the "principle of a people's right to self-determination" are mistaken. These people seem to ignore or perhaps forget deliberately that self-determination applies to peoples, not oppressive governments that do not legitimately represent the will of the people.

They try to forget as well that the same Sandinistas received direct military aid from other countries when they were fighting to overthrow the Somoza dynasty. And despite the fact that the Sandinistas were receiving aid in the form of arms from other countries, no one accused those countries of being guilty of aggression toward Nicaragua. The reason is that the Somoza regime, like the Sandinistas today, did not represent the will of the people.

The free peoples of the world, and particularly those in America, both North and South, must not in this critical time abandon the Nicaragua people because their struggle is also the struggle for the future of the Western democracies. Nicaragua has become an important point of East-West confrontation. That Nicaragua in the long term could determine the balance of forces between the East and the West and ultimately the security of the United States and the Western Hemisphere as a whole may seem an exaggeration. But everything depends on future actions and the capacity of the democracies to defend themselves.

In the United States, the debate centers on whether the Sandinistas represent a serious threat to U.S. security. President Reagan argues firmly that they do. Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega has declared that he is prepared to discuss matters of regional security, but he refuses to speak with anyone regarding Nicaragua's internal situation.

A short time ago, two members of the U.S. Congress debated on television whether to give the $100 million to the Nicaraguan rebels. One of them, who opposed aid, asked: How is it possible that such a small country with a population of only 3 million could pose a security threat to a great military power such as the United States? Against a power like the United States it would be impossible for even a single plane or tank to reach San Antonio, Texas, without it being destroyed.

When I heard the congressman's statement I couldn't believe he was serious. The danger is not military: naturally, when we speak of the military, we think of a war between the United States and Nicaragua. The danger is that the Sandinista revolution is not a revolution of the Nicaraguan people. Managua is filled with internationalists from Latin American countries who wield influence in this revolution and whose aims are the expansion of communist influence and Soviet domination in the region.

Nicaragua with its army of 60,000 men (Somoza's army had only 7,000) cannot be a military threat, nor can Cuba, whose army and militia consist of more than a million men. This absurd idea of a direct military threat from the Sandinistas is an attempt to obscure the real danger of the Sandinistas.

Their strategy is to prop up their communist regime in Nicaragua by sacrificing the freedom of the Nicaraguan people while they inspire, aid and arm, from Managua, insurgencies throughout Latin America, "movements of national liberation" that will convert the entire continent into an immense base of insurrection.

Perhaps now the idea of Nicaragua's becoming a serious military threat to the United States seems absurd, but in the future it could take on a far more serious air. Sooner or later, in 20 or 30 years, Latin America is going to succumb to one form or another of communist domination. Mexico is not necessarily an exception. It might one day be the country most likely to fall. Moreover, Mexico is considered by the communists to be the country that best fits into their strategy.

If all of this comes to pass, the balance of power between East and West, will be definitively in favor of the East and spending $100 million or a billion dollars will not reverse it. It could bring a world war to the doorstep of the United States. When Latin America, or much of Latin America, is under the influence of the Eastern bloc, NATO will no longer be in Europe; it will be in San Antonio, Texas.

But if the president of Nicaragua wants to have a dialogue on the subject of U.S. security, why not do it? We believe that dialogue is necessary. It should not be a dialogue solely on U.S. security, but also on our democracy and freedom—something that repels the Sandinistas, because making concessions by restoring democracy and freedom in Nicaragua will be their political death. The negation of the system that has been established will be the end of their internationalist and expansionist aims.

In addition, the Sandinistas have no reason or motivation to negotiate because the counterrevolution is in a ruinous state. This is because Reagan has not and will not be able to, as a result of congressional opposition, give effective aid so that the resistance can achieve its objective. In negotiations one concedes something in exchange for something else. The Sandinistas have a lot they can give. Reagan has nothing left to offer; Congress has already given it.

Daniel Ortega hopes to achieve the total elimination of the counterrevolution in exchange for the promise not to be a military threat to the United States or to Nicaragua's neighbors; not to allow the Soviets to install military bases, and to remove all Cuban advisers. With this the Sandinistas could achieve their consolidation and a free way to continue their expansionist aims through nonmilitary, but not less dangerous or effective, means.

As Jean-Francois Revel, in his book "How Democracies Perish," writes: Democracy "awakens only when the danger becomes deadly, imminent, evident. By then, either there is too little time left for it to save itself, or the price of survival has become crushingly high."

RICHMOND, CA, CITY COUNCIL URGES BAN ON NUCLEAR TESTS

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, on March 24, 1986, the City Council of Richmond, in my Seventh District of California passed a resolution recognizing the unique opportunity we have to put an end to the madness of the nuclear arms race by joining the Soviet Union's testing moratorium and immediately banning the testing of nuclear weapons.

The active support of the City Council of Richmond for a comprehensive, mutually verifiable nuclear test ban treaty is to be highly commended. Their efforts to focus public and government attention on the economic costs of the arms race, the verifiability of testing, the potential for spreading weapons to nonnuclear countries, and the grave danger of nuclear war are a great service to the citizens of Richmond and the Nation.

More accurate and more destructive weapons are unnecessary and only bring the world closer to the brink of catastrophe. We cannot afford to let a rare opportunity slip away. The city of Richmond and I again strongly urge the President to quit the tests and show the world that the United States is serious about arms control.

The text of the resolution follows:

CITY OF RICHMOND,
March 26, 1986.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed for favorable consideration is copy of Resolution No. 42-86 urging a ban on nuclear testing, adopted by the Richmond, California City Council at its meeting held March 24, 1986.

Very truly yours,

HARLAN J. HEYDON,
City Clerk.

Enclosure.

RESOLUTION OF THE COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF RICHMOND URGING A BAN ON NUCLEAR TESTING

Whereas, a nuclear war would result in death, injury and disease on a scale unprecedented in human history;

Whereas, spending for the arms race is contributing to record budget deficits that threaten our nation's economic security while programs providing essential assistance to communities throughout the country are being cut back;

Whereas, a ban on nuclear testing would promote the security of the United States by constraining new developments in the U.S.-Soviet nuclear arms competition and by strengthening efforts to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons to non-nuclear countries;

Whereas, a ban on nuclear testing can be verified with high confidence by a worldwide network of seismic monitors, satellites and other verification technology operated by the United States and other nations;

Now, therefore, the Richmond City Council calls upon the President to immediately respond to the Soviets' unilateral halt of testing by joining them in a mutual and verifiable suspension of testing as a first step towards freezing and reversing the arms race. This body also calls upon the members of our congressional delegation to support legislation that would enact a moratorium on nuclear testing, to be continued as long as the Soviets do not test. Copies of this resolution shall be forwarded to the President and to the Senators and Representatives comprising our congressional delegation.

DR. LAURANCE V. FOYE

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Laurance Foye, the outstanding Director of the Veterans' Administration Medical Center in San Francisco, retired from the agency on March 1, having served the public for more than 33 years. His leaving the Department of Medicine and Surgery [DM&S] will be a great loss and veterans throughout the great State of California, and others who have benefited from his excellent service through the VA will miss him.

I first came to know Dr. Foye when he was named Deputy Chief Medical Director in 1974. The then Chief Medical Director, Jack Chase, and Larry Foye were a great team and members of the Veterans Affairs' Committees of the House and Senate developed a relationship with "the team" that meant much to the Congress and the VA. They were very good years.

As Dr. Foye retires from Federal service, he can reflect with great pride on a long and eminently successful VA career. Following completion of his military service in 1946, his VA career began at the VA Medical Center, San Francisco, CA, as a medical intern from 1952 until 1953. Dr. Foye's unique abilities were quiclky identified and in 1953 Dr. Foye was promoted to the position of junior and intermediate resident in medicine. In 1956, Dr. Foye assumed the position of senior medical resident at that facility. Following a brief 1 year absence from the VA to further his studies at the Cowell Memorial Hospital, University of California, Berkeley, Dr. Foye returned to the VA Medical Center in San Francisco as Assistant Chief Medical Service in 1958. He remained in that position for 8 years, attaining the rating of chief grade.

Throughout Dr. Foye's illustrious medical career, he concentrated his efforts on cancer research. Having been recognized for his efforts in this area, Dr. Foye accepted the position as executive secretary, Chemotherapy Committee at the National Instituutes of Health in Bethesda, MD, from 1966 to 1968. The National Institutes of Health also identified Dr. Foye's outstanding potential, and, as a result, he was promoted to the position of executive secretary for the Clinical Investigation Review Committee. Dr. Foye remained in this position until 1970 when he returned to the Veterans' Administration accepting the position of Deputy to the Assistant Chief Medical Director [ACMD] for research and rehabilitation at the VA Central Office, Washington, DC. His knowledge of, and accomplishment in, research proved invaluable to the VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery. During his tenure in this position, Dr. Foye was instrumental in expanding the research program of the VA by enhancing cooperative and joint efforts between our medical centers and affiliated medical schools. By concentrating efforts, Dr. Foye was able to reduce duplicative efforts thereby concentrating resources toward a common goal. It was from this effort that arose a new level of understanding and relationship between the VA and affiliated teaching institutions. In 1973, Dr. Foye accepted the position of ACMD for academic affairs and continued to expand his efforts until the majority of VA medical centers were affiliated with university medical schools. To this day the VA remains the organization most responsible for the higher education of physicians within this country.

From 1974 through 1978, Dr. Foye accepted the number two position within the Department of Medicine and Surgery, as Deputy Chief Medical Director. As Deputy Chief Medical Director of the largest medical system in the free world, Dr. Foye was instrumental in providing the leadership necessary to upgrade and expand the overall VA medical system by constructing new and replacement medical centers, obtaining nationally and internationally recognized physicians to care for our veteran patients, and promote the overall quality of care within our system. His aggressive and forthright management style often demonstrated a tolerance for peculiarities of individuals which allowed him the opportunity to mold the diverse personalities of both the administrative and professional staffs toward a common goal.

In 1978, Dr. Foye stepped down as Deputy Chief Medical Director to return to his beloved San Francisco and accept the position of Director of that Medical Center. He quickly identified the need to upgrade and expand the physical plant at the medical center. His 8-year effort has vaulted the San Francisco VA Medical Center from an affiliated hospital to one of the "flagship" medical centers within our system, offering a multitude of specialty care.

Perhaps the most dominant personal characteristic, that of conducting official business with impeccable integrity, is evident in his tenure as Medical District Director. He demonstrated the ability to create organizational structure to address pressing issues and willingness to take controversial positions in the Medical District Initiated Program Planning [MEDIPP] process, when warranted. He served as a preceptor in the development of newly appointed directors. Due to his performance and reputation as one of the top District Directors in DM&S, Dr. Foye was selected to the Chief Medical Director's Field Advisory Committee and has served on national task forces, in the design and implementation of MEDIPP and restructuring of DM&S.

Dr. Foye can be justly proud of his career with DM&S and the Federal Government where he exemplified the qualities of an outstanding, ethical human being as well as an outstanding Federal manager. We wish him well, Mr. Speaker, as he takes time to enjoy some of the finer things in life which he so richly deserves.

BLACK UNITED SERVICE CLUBS OF JOHNSTOWN ANNUAL COMMUNITY RECOGNITION

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to again this year place in the RECORD recognition of a group of community-minded citizens being honored at the annual dinner of the Black United Service Clubs of Johnstown on April 26.

I often remark that the history of our great Nation is written less by the headline-makers than by the individual acts of commitment, dedication, and caring that go on in our communities. That marks what America is all about. That is the pride and tradition of helping one another that has made our Nation great. It is against that measure that America is at its greatest.

And it is against that background, that it is my pleasure to summarize briefly the efforts of this year's award winners.

Robert Zakula: Recognized as an educator, a teacher, and a coach, Zak—as he was known to many—influenced the lives of hundreds of young people. It is impossible to count how many community, business, and civic leaders today received a boost from the attention and instruction of Zak. As we increasingly see in the stories about society's changes, there is no higher calling than working with our young people during the troubled, critical years of their lives. Against that measure, Zak can take great pride in his accomplishments. He has also been active on the Salvation Army Advisory Board, the Lions, retired organizations, and the St. Nicholas Serbian Church.

Dorothy Lewis: Mrs. Lewis is the director of community services for the Cambria County Community Action Council, and has been particularly active in working with disadvantaged youths in the community. Known to many as "Ms. Dice," Dorothy has provided counseling, job aid, and finding training opportunities for many young people. Even more important, Dorothy has providied them with support, with understanding, with letting them know that they can reach their goals, that their dreams are not impossible. For each youth promoted to new achievements and new commitments, our society gains tenfold, and Dorothy has met that challenge with a devotion that has benefited everyone in the community. She is also very active in other community groups including the Pennsylvania Human Relations Advisory Committee and the Mt. Sinai Institutional Baptist Church.

John A. Bennett: While Congress and the courts can pass and approve laws aimed at justice and equality, it is only by making those laws work for people that they prove great, and that is the work that John has undertaken for over 35 years. His leadership in the Johnstown Branch of the NAACP has brought hundreds of members of the minority community into the economic mainstream. His work with the NAACP and the Johnstown Regional Central Labor Council as civil rights chairman has been in the greatest tradition of the basic principles of our Nation, and has deeply affected the lives of many local residents and the entire community. Also active in the Mt. Sinai Baptist Church, John has combined his faith with our Nation's principles to make our community, State, and Nation stronger for striving to fullfill our principles of equality and fairness for all.

Delphine Andrews: Mrs. Andrews has shaped a career over the last two decades that has bridged the gaps of diverse groups in our community, with the constant theme of caring and helping. Delphine worked with the Cambria County Community Action Council as a neighborhood aide; she worked with the Johnstown Chapter of Children with Learning Disabilities; following the disastrous 1977 flood she worked with people who suffered traumatic experiences in the flood; and for the past 7 years Delphine has been a caseworker with the Cambria County Area Agency on Aging. Speaking specifically of raising children, Delphine said, "you may not have a lot of material things to give your children, but give them your love and encouragement." That has been true of Delphine's entire life and community commitment, and because of it, our entire community and hundreds of individuals have benefited. Her service has been in the highest tradition of individual commitment and concern.

It is a pleasure to join in recognition of these individuals and the Black United Service Clubs of Johnstown for their commitment to our area and the great principles of our Nation. It is recognition that is truly deserved.

RULE ON H.R. 3131, THE TELECOMMUNICATIONS TRADE ACT OF 1986

HON. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 14, 1986

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to inform my colleagues that the Committee on Ways and Means on Wednesday, April 9, 1986, favorably ordered reported to the House of Representatives H.R. 3131, the Telecommunications Trade Act of 1986.

I wish to serve notice, pursuant to the rules of the Democratic caucus, that I have been instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to seek less than an open rule for the consideration of this legislation by the House of Representatives.

SENATE COMMITEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, April 15, 1986, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

SENATE—Tuesday, April 15, 1986

(Legislative day of Tuesday, April 8, 1986)

The Senate met at 9:15 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Lord God Almighty, in these crucial, explosive, unpredictable hours, move upon the hearts and minds of the leadership of all nations that justice may be done and truth prevail. Wherever one looks today there is trouble and sooner or later that trouble confronts the Senate and demands a response. Help fallible men and women who bear enormous responsibility for national and world peace and safety and for whom decision is inescapable find their way through controversy and confusion to the way of sanity and peace. We pray for the protection and safety of newspeople and aliens in Libya. Father in Heaven, give us all the resolve to seek Your will and do it on Earth as it is in Heaven. In Jesus' name Who lived to do Your will. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished able majority leader, Senator DOLE, is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders will have 10 minutes each. The distinguished assistant leader, Senator CRANSTON, is here. Following that, special orders in favor of Senators HAWKINS, CRANSTON, HATFIELD, PROXMIRE, DOMENICI, and CHILES for not to exceed 5 minutes each, and routine morning business not to extend the hour of 10 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

At 10 a.m., by a previous unanimous consent, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 426, the hydrorelicensing bill.

The Senate will stand in recess between the hours of 12 noon and 2 p.m. in order for weekly party caucuses to meet.

At 2 p.m., the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] will be recognized to offer a substitute amendment to S. 426. Between 10 a.m. and noon, if the distinguished Senator from Montana has any amendments to S. 426, it is my understanding he will bring up one or more amendments and hopefully complete action on those amendments by noon, but if any rollcall votes should be ordered this morning, they will be later in the afternoon.

We will have rollcall votes throughout the day, and it is the intention of the majority leader to complete action on S. 426 during today's session. I know the distinguished Senator from California has an interest in completing action on S. 426.

Mr. CRANSTON. Yes, I have.

Mr. DOLE. I know the interest comes from around the country. I think we are all interested in completing action on it and perhaps, also, the crime bill. Then we will still be on the motion to proceed to S. 1774 to amend section 1951 of title 18 of the United States Code.

Also, sometime today, as soon as we have damage assessments and photographs, it will be our hope that we can have a rather extensive briefing by the State Department, the Defense Department, Secretary Weinberger, and Secretary Shultz, for all Senators in S-407.

We are advised by Defense and State Department officials that if we can do it a little later in the day we will have more information. So hopefully we could be finished on the floor by 4, 4:30, or 5 o'clock.

I will advise the distinguished minority leader as soon as we are able to firm up a time, and I believe all Senators want information as quickly as possible. But they also want reliable information. They want facts and not conjecture.

So it would be my hope that we can wait until we have some information that will be helpful to all Members.

UNITED STATES AIR RAID ON LIBYA

Mr. President, today is a day for unity—for Congress and the American people to stand together in support of the President, and his action to defend our country and our citizens against terrorism.

For years, Libyan Dictator Qadhafi has orchestrated, and carried out, a reign of terror; not only against the United States, but against innocent people the world over. America has tried every diplomatic and nonviolent response to Qadhafi's attacks. But to no avail.

Now, there is unassailable proof that the trail of blood from the latest atrocity, the bombing of the Berlin disco, led straight to Qadhafi's headquarters. There is unassailable proof that Libya ordered other acts of terrorism, including bomb attacks on innocent foreign citizens trying to obtain visas at a United States Embassy. There is unassailable proof that Qadhafi planned to try again, with assaults on American installations, officials, and citizens on four continents.

We have the facts, we have the will, and we have the right to defend ourselves. That right is written in the United Nations Charter and our own Constitution.

And, as the President said last night, if we have to, we are prepared to defend ourselves again.

We are under no illusion. Qadhafi may strike again. But consider what he would have done had we not acted; had we simply rolled over and pretended that his murderous attacks, his murderous plans would somehow go away. Under those circumstances, the carnage we have seen in Berlin, in Rome, in Vienna, and everywhere around the globe where Qadhafi and his ilk have struck would have been multiplied many times over.

The President did what he had to do. And, in my view, what the American people wanted him to do. He met his responsibilities as Commander in Chief, and he met his responsibilities to the Congress.

Now it is up to us to do our part. To stand by the President, to stand by our Armed Forces, to stand together in doing whatever it takes to answer the challenge of international terrorism.

Mr. President, having been present, as was the distinguished Presiding Officer, Senator THURMOND, at the briefing yesterday afternoon from 4 o'clock until 6, I think it is fair to say this was a decision that was difficult for the President to make. But when you look at the options and the alternatives, there is no doubt, I think, in the minds of everyone there the President made the right decision.

Some would argue that Congress should have been consulted earlier. I guess we can argue that point. I do not think that is the important point. The important point is we are trying to deter international terrorism. Someone has to take the action.

I believe that the President, by consulting with the Congress 3 hours ahead of the strike in the Benghazi and Tripoli areas, fulfilled his responsibilities in a manner consistent with the War Powers Act. The administration intends to continue in that spirit. I am hopeful that there will not be any dispute or hairsplitting over whether or not we had enough notice or that it should have been 5 hours, 7 hours, or the day before yesterday.

I am convinced that Democrats and Republicans, when asked the direct question, "What would you do?" would have the same response.

I know that the President will be concerned when he learns casualties may have included civilians, just as he was concerned when American civilians, innocent women, children, and others were killed by terrorist acts. But I believe the President chose the military target, not an economic target. They chose targets purposely that would keep down civilian casualties.

We can second-guess consultation, and we can second-guess other things. But it would seem to me that there are not any easy choices. There are only hard choices. We have only one President. He made the decision. In listening to some of the congressional response so far, I believe that the support is nearly universal.

I hope now that our allies would understand we are firm in our resolve to stop international terrorism. I must say that it has been less than heartwarming to see the response from some of our allies, particularly France, which would not let us overfly France on the way to Tripoli or Benghazi. So it would be my hope that our allies, and our friends around the world, would understand we are properly concerned for their welfare and the welfare of all of our citizens, for the freedom to travel, for the freedom of the skies, and for the freedom of the seas.

I really believe that the President has set the proper course and the proper tone—a proportionate response directed at terrorist targets in a country whose leader's name, "Qadhafi" has become almost synonymous with the word "terror."

SENATOR HAWKINS' SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wish to read the statement by Senator HAWKINS relating to Ambassador Gavin. The statement is as follows:

TRIBUTE TO AMBASSADOR JOHN GAVIN

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, this country will soon lose the services of a true pillar of support for United States interests in Central America in general and in Mexico, in particular. I am speaking of Ambassador John Gavin, who has announced his intention to resign after serving with true distinction for five long years in Mexico City.

Every American should take pride in the effective leadership demonstrated by Ambassador Gavin during U.S. efforts to provide relief to Mexico following its tragic earthquake. Through his vision of courage, the United States was able to respond rapidly to Mexico's need for medicine, food, doctors, and disaster relief personnel.

Like all great public servants who actually make a difference with the issues they work on, Ambassador Gavin had his share of foes within the bureaucracy. Mr. Gavin did not belong to the "don't rock the boat" school of diplomacy. When necessary he was willing to let the Mexican Government know they were hurting America's interests, whether it be our Central American policy, our narcotics control policy, or our economic interests. Most importantly, he knew how to get their attention. He did not see diplomacy as the art of glossing over real problems that need attention. Rather than covering up, Ambassador Gavin opened up the dialogue to solve problems rather than letting them fester.

Today's narcotics control summit in Mexico, which will be attended by Attorney General Meese, along with representatives of the U.S. Customs Service, the U.S. Coast Guard, the Drug Enforcement Administration, and Department of State, is a tribute to Ambassador Gavin's timeless efforts. For over a decade, no major narcotics trafficker has been convicted in Mexico. Only by the continued interest of senior policy makers in both our nations will narcotics control become a priority in our relationship. The refreshing candor and courage of Ambassador Gavin has established a starting point for United States and Mexican leaders to follow.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished assistant Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. CRANSTON. I would like to ask the distinguished majority leader how late he thinks we will be in today, and if he has any clues.

Mr. DOLE. I think if we have the briefing about 5 o'clock, we would try to complete action in the Senate before that briefing. I do not expect a late evening.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the 5 minutes allocated to me be vitiated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I reserve the time of the minority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BOSCHWITZ). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PRESIDENT'S RESPONSE TO QADHAFI

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the action of President Reagan yesterday in responding to Libya's Qadhafi, who seems intent on spreading terrorism throughout the world.

I was one of those who met with the President at 4 o'clock when he consulted with the congressional leadership at that time. In doing so, I think he met the requirements of the War Powers Act. There is no question in my mind, Mr. President, that the President is pursuing the right course. Time and time again we have had Americans attacked in various parts of the world. Our Embassies have been attacked, and terrorism has threatened our people long enough, the most recent being the American who was killed in Germany by a bomb.

Mr. President, it is well known that Mr. Qadhafi has been training terrorists in his country. It is well known that he is the world's foremost terrorist. It is also well known that he has attacked Americans, he has conspired with others to attack Americans, and insofar as I am concerned, the President acted wisely and courageously in taking the steps that he did.

How long can we go and not defend our people? This was a course pursued in self-defense of the American people.

As the Secretary of State said, it is matter of self-defense. That is what it was. We have been attacked so many times and we cannot afford to ignore this situation any longer. We must take steps to prevent a recurrence.

Someone said Mr. Qadhafi will just come back and again attack Americans.

Well, if he does that, he would have done it anyway. If he does that, I would expect this administration to respond again, and respond in a more severe manner. We simply cannot permit this to continue.

I admire the courage of the President because it took great courage in the face of some public opinion otherwise, and in the face of some political talk otherwise, and in the face of this being an election year. It may be said that we are taking steps here that may cause future trouble. But, Mr. President, President Reagan has pursued the right course. I do not know any other course a courageous President could have pursued.

What else could he have done? How much longer would he have to wait? I think he acted timely, he acted courageously, he acted wisely, and he acted in the best interests of the American people.

I commend President Reagan for the course he did take. I, for one, will back him up on it. I believe the Senate will back him up on it and the House will back him up on it, and I think the American people will back him up on it.

Mr. President, there may be other attacks. We must take steps to guard against further invasions by people like Mr. Qadhafi, whom the President has called a "mad dog." That is a fitting term for him. That is exactly what he is. He has no regard for humanity. He will just kill in spite and try to bring together lawless elements in the world that can harm humanity.

I am proud of the President. I am proud of what he did. I am sure the American people will speak out when the time comes and back him up. I hope this Congress will not fail to back him up.

This is a foreign policy matter and everybody cannot make decisions on that. The President has to make the main decision. He has made the decision. He has made the right decision and I say, let us back him up.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

PRESIDENT REAGAN IS ON TARGET IN LIBYA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the President has taken precisely the right action in response to proven acts of terrorism by Libya under the control of Colonel Qadhafi. The U.S. retaliation was measured. Our air forces specially targeted terrorism installations. We took precautions to spare civilians as much as possible. The only reservations of this Senator is that the U.S. retaliation may not have brought sufficient force to bear on Libya to discourage further terrorist action directed by Qadhafi. The President was completely correct in promising to strike again with similar military retaliation if Qadhafi persists in his terrorist actions.

At the same time, the President has not taken the full economic actions against Libya that he should take. This country can and should insist that all American personnel leave Libya forthwith. We should sever all economic relations with Libya and continue to urge our friends in Europe and elsewhere in the world to do likewise.

GEOGRAPHY GIVES U.S. SHARP MILITARY ADVANTAGE OVER SOVIETS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, what is the single, paramount consideration that most decisively influences the Congress' decisions on military spending? It is the threat represented by the Soviet Union. Is this not what President Reagan, like his predecessors, always uses as his prime argument for more appropriations for the armed services? I have recently spoken on the floor about the demonstrable military advantage this country has today achieved over the Soviet Union in relevant military power. In this speech I shall examine the striking military advantage the United States enjoys over its great superpower adversary for strictly geographic reasons.

The Soviet Union does have the advantage of occupying the largest land area of any nation on Earth. No nation is richer in natural resources, including energy resources, than the U.S.S.R. But the Soviet Union suffers very serious border problems. On its western Border, Russia dominates its neighbors through its puppet governments. The Soviets have a series of sullen, resentful bordering allies, including East Germany, Poland, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Rumania. The governments of these countries are tightly alined with the Soviet Union.

The people of these countries are another matter. They have repeatedly demonstrated their opposition to Russia in demonstrations, strikes, and even bloody uprising against great odds. In any Soviet invasion of Western Europe, the Soviet Warsaw Pact allies would be reluctant, foot-dragging allies or worse. In a Russian invasion of Western Europe, the Soviets would have to be concerned with sabotage and actual revolution from their Warsaw Pact allies.

In spite of its evident weaknesses, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Western Europe would confront the Soviets with a very tough resistance. Keep in mind that both England and France are full-fledged nuclear powers. Each of these countries has begun a buildup of its nuclear capability to a level of 1,000 nuclear warheads. Meanwhile, the United States has stockpiled literally thousands of tactical nuclear weapons throughout Western Europe. So on its western flank, the Soviet Union faces the serious threat of revolt among its own presumed Warsaw Pact allies in addition to a formidable NATO capability.

What does the Soviet Union face on its eastern flank? It confronts the biggest army in the world in manpower. China is four times larger in population than the Soviet Union. It is the biggest nation on Earth in population by far. It is also a full-fledged nuclear power. How about the Chinese economy? Could it support a Chinese military engagement against the Soviets. No question; the Soviet economy is clearly superior but no developed nation in the world has enjoyed the growth in economic strength that China has experienced over the past 2 or 3 years. And the economic explosion continues. Russia faces the same long historical conflict with China that it confronts with its presumed Warsaw Pact allies on its western front.

The hostility between the Soviets and its bordering neighbors east and west has persisted for centuries through profound ideological shifts. Those of us in the United States Congress consider the Soviet military force that confronts NATO. We too often ignore the fact that a third or more of the Soviet manpower, tanks, artillery and nuclear capability must be committed to its eastern border and we are reminded daily of the weaknesses of Russia's military machine in its dismal showing in Afghanistan. After 6 long years of Soviet military offensives, the primitive, feebly armed Afghans continue to defiantly rattle the superpower Soviets.

Now compare this Soviet geographic dilemma with what our country faces. We have one nation that shares our southern border: Mexico. Mexico has become our firm friend. Its government shares the same democratic system that we enjoy. The United States is far and away Mexico's principal trading partner. Mexico does not constitute the remotest kind of a military threat to the United States. Our countries both have a firm opposition to communism and Kremlin power plays. On our north, the United States occupies the longest undefended border between two sovereign countries in the world with Canada. Canada and the United States are each respectively the No. 1 trading partner of the other. We speak a common language. Both nations are proud of their democratic governments. Canada, like Mexico, has become our international partner and close friend.

On the east, this country is separated from Europe by one of the two great oceans of the world. On the west, the Pacific constitutes the vastest moat on Earth. It is true that an ocean can be viewed as a highway, an access for enemies as well as friends. A great coastal nation like the United States suffers a vulnerability as well as a protection by virtue of its ocean border. Which it is—a protection or a vulnerability—depends on seapower. Does the United States have the naval power to protect our coasts from invasion? The United States is without question the greatest seapower in the world, by far. That makes the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans our great protection against invasion which they, in fact, have been since 1812.

That is not all the geographic advantage enjoyed by this country. The Soviet Union shares the Eastern Hemisphere—Europe and Asia—with other independent, large, highly developed and militarily powerful countries. The European Common Market consists entirely of Western European countries that are opposed to the Soviet Union and communism. Its gross national product exceeds that of the Soviet Union by more than 2 to 1. The Soviet Union in no sense dominates its hemisphere.

Now, how about the United States? Our country does dominate our hemisphere. It shares a far higher standard of living with Canada and no other Western Hemisphere country. Our country has a gross national product literally three times greater than the GNP of all other Western Hemisphere countries combined. We are the only nuclear power in the hemisphere. Our Navy greatly exceeds the combined force of all other Western Hemisphere navies. This is also true of our Air Force. Our land forces also enjoy conspicuous superiority in the Western Hemisphere to all other Western Hemisphere nations combined.

So, Mr. President, when the admirals and generals so consistently tell the Congress they would not trade our military position for that of the Soviet Union, you can see how right they are.

Mr. President, recently I said on the floor that the military advantage of the United States vis-a-vis the Soviets in conventional and nuclear military capability makes now, today, the ideal time for us to press for arms control negotiations. For those who say we should negotiate from strength, the answer is: Today we can deal from solid and demonstrable strength. Our geographic advantage makes that specially clear.

WHO'S RIGHT: STOCKMAN OR THE STOCK MARKET?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, David Stockman's new book is a devastating indictment of the Reagan economic policies. That should shock a lot of Americans, who have viewed Reagan economic policies as just what the doctor ordered for the American economy. David Stockman understands more about the Reagan economic policies than any man alive or dead. Stockman was on the inside all the way. He has been the supreme numbers cruncher, the No. 1 budget wizard, the expert par excellence.

So is he right? Is the American economy headed for disaster? Who can convincingly rebut Stockman? Let's start with today's stock market. After all, where can you go for a more convincing or objective judgment of the country's economic future than the American stock market? The stock market is not rhetoric. It is not political puffery. The stock market goes up or down depending on how smart, hardheaded investors feel about the future of the American economy.

This is not a barroom boast investors are venturing. This is not a political speech. It is the commitment of hard cash by cold-eyed, calculating investors. And today's investors are not little guys. These are not the daffy old widows and dim-witted inveterate gamblers. These investors in today's stock market are highly trained professionals who manage massive funds. Have they been tested? They have, indeed. They are promoted or fired depending on their record, not on their personalities or whom they know.

So David Stockman tells us that the policies of the Reagan administration are leading the country to a historic collapse. To Stockman, the succession of runaway Federal deficits spell not just disaster; they spell economic collapse. On the other hand, the stock market in the last 6 months has put on a dazzling performance month after month for 6 months that appears to show a massive consensus of hardheaded, cold-eyed investors believe the American economy is on a happy, profitable, uphill, prosperous roll. So who is right? Have the Reagan economic policies given us an economic nirvana as the stock market boom seems to promise? Or is this country in for a first-class depression 1930's style, as David Stockman's analysis tells us?

Mr. President, here is one vote for David Stockman. Oh, sure, the stock market has been right more often than it has been wrong. And yes, today's stock market investors are, indeed, better able to judge the economy than the investors of years ago. But why have stocks been rising? Why have investors been selling bonds and buying equities? The answer does not have much, if anything, to do with the economy's future. The answer has to do with the choice America's investors have between a bond market that is promising a steadily lower return and a stock market that promises to rise in value precisely as interest rates fall.

For example, any investor who bought stocks 6 months ago and enjoyed the average upward rise received by the vast majority of stock market investors as reflected on the broad stock indices would have enjoyed an increase in the value of his investment of better than 30 percent, and that is in only 6 months. The annual rate of appreciation would be about two-thirds!

But if the investor instead chose to slug his investment away in a fixed interest security, the rise in value would be far less. So investors have been buying stocks on the assumption that interest rates would fall, thus driving investors from the bond market into the stock market. Will they continue to fall? Probably. Why? Because inflation will likely moderate for some time to come. The glut of oil will hold down energy prices. The oversupply of farm products will continue to hold down the price of food. There is also a massive 7 percent of the work force, more than 8 million, unemployed. That will hold down wage pressure on prices.

What has low inflation to do with low interest rates? Answer—everything. The prospect for continued moderate or declining inflation will hold down interest rates for the foreseeable future. Why? Because the major element in interest in any period of volatile prices is the level of inflation—the inflation premium. If prices stay down, interest rates stay down. And prices seem very likely to stay down. So the stock market has been rising not because economic prospects are bright. The stock market has been rising because interest rates are falling. That makes stocks a better investment than bonds.

All of this brings us to the main reason why inflation interest rates are declining. What is that? It is not the strength of the economy. It is the weakness of the economy. Do interest rates fall in a resurgent, exuberant economy? Of course not. Does inflation moderate when demand pushes the economy ahead? Never and no way. The American economy today is weak. It grew by less than 1 percent in the last quarter of calendar 1985. And the worst is yet to come. David Stockman calls the mountainous deficits of the past 5 years a disaster. He is right. Strangely enough, the rise in stock prices confirms the Stockman thesis that the economy is headed for disaster because this particular stock market boom is based on weakness, not strength.

We are, indeed, climbing a mountainous disaster. Getting down off that mountainous disaster is going to be sheer political hell. Every step of the way down from the $200 billion deficit level will carry this feeble economy down with it. Slashing the deficit is a prescription for recession.

So why do it? Because failing to cut the deficit is worse. It means we are piling up a mountain of debt for our citizens and future generations. So much of that debt will be owed to foreign countries that this country will lose much of its historic freedom. Eventually, that debt will force interest rates higher as lenders become surfeited with American debt and less and less confident that we have the will to repay it. And future Congresses will be tempted to turn to superinflation as the only way the country can meet its immense multi-trillion-dollar Federal debt obligation.

So, between the judgment of the stock market in the past 6 months and the judgment of David Stockman, this Senator not only chooses Stockman—he is right; but this Senator believes the stock market confirms that he is right. That means we cut spending, cut spending, and then cut spending some more. Meanwhile, we raise revenues by requiring every person and every corporation to pay its fair share of taxes. The time to start is now.

MYTH OF THE DAY: THE CONTRA WAR IS JUST DEMOCRATIC RESISTANCE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that the Contra rebels are true Jeffersonian freedom fighters.

To hear the administration tell it, the Contras are modern-day "minutemen" and the war they are waging in Nicaragua is "democratic resistance," to use the administration's own words.

Well, an article in the February 20th issue of the New York Times reveals that the Contras' war is far more than "democratic resistance."

There seems to be a great deal of terrorism in the Contras' violent revolution.

For example, the Times reports that one recent Sunday night on an unpaved road near the Nicaraguan border, a land mine blew up a pickup truck carrying 17 civilians.

A rebel band waiting in ambush then opened fire, killing five women, ages 28 to 70, and a Swiss agronomist.

That, Mr. President, is not democratic resistance. That is a terrorist attack.

"In recent months," according to the Times, "rebel bands have carried out attacks in which civilians have been killed, robbed, or otherwise abused."

A recent study by Amnesty International found that Contra rebels were guilty of torture and murder. The Washington Office on Latin America also recently reported 118 instances of rebels abusing civilians.

Now to be sure, the Sandinista government in Nicaragua also is guilty of terrorist activities. No doubt about that. Both Amnesty International and the Washington Office on Latin America also cite instances where the Sandinista government has abused civilians.

But that does not diminish the abuse that is being perpetrated by the Contras.

In pressing for military support of the Contras, the Reagan administration should not forget that some of those military activities it is supporting the administration would classify as terrorist attacks if they occurred in other parts of the world.

It is a myth to believe otherwise.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR HATFIELD

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, under the information of the leadership, I understand there is some time remaining. I ask unanimous consent that I might be able to finish my statement with 2 or 3 additional minutes, if necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BACKSLIDING AGAIN

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, today is April 15. Heretofore this date has been infamous for being the filing deadline for Federal income tax returns. Now we have a new reason to rue this day, for April 15 is upon us and Congress has not completed action on a budget resolution. Indeed, Congress has hardly begun.

In 1974, Mr. President, Congress enacted the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act—Public Law 93-344—in a fit of missionary zeal that only reformed reprobates can muster. Those of us who were here at the time—and only 29 were—remember a good deal of praise for the act as our savior from haphazard action and frustrating delay. A new, orderly process was created with logical, manageable deadlines for action on the budget. A first concurrent resolution on the budget was to be reported by the Budget Committees by April 15, and adopted in identical form by both Houses by May 15. A second concurrent resolution on the budget was to be adopted by September 15, with all 13 regular appropriations enacted by the start of the fiscal year, which we moved from July 1 to October 1 to give us 3 additional months for budget deliberations.

I am getting older, Mr. President, and my memory may not be as sharp as it once was, but I do not recall that the Congress of the United States ever was as zealous in its adherence to those goals as it was in prescribing them. But that is only human nature, after all. It should not have surprised us too much. John Wesley was only one of the more recent theologians to remind us, as he did more than 200 years ago, of our fondness for backsliding.

While I may not clearly recall every budgetary episode of the past 12 years, I am very clear on last year, when Congress did not adopt a conference report on a budget resolution until August 1, right before the August recess, thus delaying action on appropriations bills and forcing us to resort to a continuing resolution of sizable proportions. Oh, how everyone complained when we dealt with the appropriations process in that way. There was great weeping and gnashing of teeth, and somber statements uttered within this Chamber and without, about what a travesty it was to conduct the Nation's fiscal business in such an irresponsible way.

So once again, Mr. President, Congress has found itself wandering in the fiscal wilderness with a troubled soul and the burden of manifold sins and iniquities. And once again, there arose a new priesthood, calling upon us to abandon our decadent ways and cling to a new ritual that would surely lead us to salvation and a paradise of balanced budgets. Why we fell for it, I do not know. But in clouds of incense, with incantations of magic formulas ringing in our ears and dire warnings of failure to abide by the new rules, the Congress passed Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, and went home with new conviction.

And where are we now? Alas, Mr. President, we have backslid again. Our conviction has waned. We have failed to adhere to our new ritual. We should not be surprised. No mere change in ritual can save us from our errant ways. We can concoct all the budgetary rigmarole we like, and offer up across-the-board cuts as burnt offerings to deficit reduction, and we will wind up no better off unless we have had a change of heart. The term is "repentance."

In the throes of revivial last fall, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amended the 1974 Budget Act to require that the concurrent resolution on the budget be adopted by both Houses by April 15, a full month before the deadline that had been created by the 1974 act and observed most often in the breach. There were assurances all around that this time we would meet the deadlines. Well, we have not, Mr. President, and the reason is that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings did not regenerate the spirits of all the competing factions and special interests that created delay under the old regime. It just arbitrarily established a new deadline and hoped the magic of the new ritual would take over.

Not that an effort has not been made. Under the leadership of PETE DOMENICI, the chairman, and LAWTON CHILES, the ranking minority member, the Budget Committee of the Senate has produced a concurrent resolution on the budget covering fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989. That resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 120, was ordered reported by the committee on March 24, 1986, by a bipartisan rollcall vote of 13-9. Seven Republicans and six Democrats voted to report the resolution favorably. The measure has been on the calendar and available for consideration in the Senate since we returned from the Easter recess.

As always, there are a number of reasons for our backsliding, and there are a number of consequences. I am not here today to blame anyone, but I cannot help but wonder where our zeal has gone, and I do want to mention some possible consequences of inaction.

The first that comes to mind is the effect of delay on the appropriations process. Under section 303(a) of the Budget Act, as amended, it is not in order for the Senate to consider fiscal year 1987 appropriations bills until a fiscal year 1987 budget resolution has been adopted by the Congress. The longer we delay the budget resolution, the longer the appropriations process will be delayed. The longer the appropriations process is delayed, the greater the likelihood of a massive continuing resolution, with all the anguish that causes. I cannot help but remember how the anguish of last year in part prompted the creation of our new ritual, and I cannot help but wonder why those who presided over that creation are not more vocal now in urging prompt and decisive action on a budget resolution.

I should say here that the procedural situation is not quite the same in the other body. There, too, it is not in order to consider an appropriations bill for any given fiscal year until the budget resolution for that year has been adopted, but that requirement can be waived at any time by adoption of a rule providing for consideration of an appropriations measure, and is not applicable at all under the terms of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings statute after May 15. This is but one example of different procedures in the two Houses under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I will address others as the occasion arises.

Perhaps of greater importance than the immediate consequence of inaction for the appropriations process are the implications for our being able to meet other requirements of the ritual as we proceed with the process. It is accepted truth in this body that the easier decisions are made first and the harder ones are delayed. I have great admiration for the work of the Budget Committee in producing Senate Concurrent Resolution 120. I realize it was not easy to do. But it strikes me that reporting the measure, and considering it here in the Senate, are easier tasks than casting hard votes on the bills that will enact the resolution's recommendations into law. If we are stymied now on the relatively simple matter of considering the budget resolution, what will happen later? I am not optimistic.

Again, Mr. President, I am not here to cast blame, I know the majority leader and others are assiduously seeking a consensus so that we can consider and adopt a budget resolution at the earliest possible time. Senator STENNIS, the ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee and the dean of the Senate, gave a forceful speech last week urging prompt action so that we can proceed with our business. I join with him in that, and I urge the 61 Senators who voted for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings last fall to rekindle their conviction. In light of the new religion I might be an old reprobate, but I believe we should at least proceed with the first steps of the new ritual.

Mr. CHILES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. CHILES. I compliment the Senator from Oregon on his remarks and certainly thank him for his kind reference to the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator DOMENICI, and myself.

I join with much of what he says. I sense the frustration he feels as we find ourselves at April 15, the deadline imposed by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings which said that we needed to speed up the budget process. I think the Senator is right. We tried in the Budget Committee to take that to heart. We went to work earlier. We produced a budget quicker than I can remember, and did it in a bipartisan way. We wanted to take it up before the Easter recess so it could be acted upon by this body well before the deadline. But to our chagrin, we find we still have not taken it up. I join with the Senator in saying I cannot understand why we do not have some of the sponsors of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings on the floor every day. This is their act. It is being violated. Where is the zeal we saw when that act was passed, and we moved up the deadline to April 15? It certainly would be helpful to the Appropriations Committee and to other committees if we could have prompt action on the budget. We in the Budget Committee have often felt the pressure when the authorizing committees chided us for failing to do our work. So we were attempting to move quickly this time in the spirit of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. However, we now find the deadline is here, but the budget is not.

As you see, Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee is with us on the floor. The distinguished ranking member, Senator STENNIS, as the Senator from Oregon said, has already made his very strong statement. I certainly compliment him for the statement he made last week. And now you see the chairman of the Budget Committee and the ranking member also here. They have been here on a number of days saying why can we not take this up. Now we find ourselves today going by the deadline.

I say to the Senator I understand his frustration. He is not alone in feeling that frustration. I wish we had more allies. It seems to me those allies should be the principal sponsors of the act. I do want to say for my distinguished friend from South Carolina, I know he wants to take it up and has been saying that right along. But I am surprised that we do not see some more helpers here in that regard.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator for his response. I, too, am puzzled by the absence of any evidence of Gramm-Rudman. The only evidence I see in this Chamber is a stale stench of the incense that does not help us get over our present problems or the responsibilities we must ultimately implement.

Mr. DOMENICI. I wonder if the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee will yield for a couple moments.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. DOMENICI. Let me say to my friend from Oregon it was by happenstance that we are here together on the floor. I had decided to come here today because it is a momentous day; people are all filing their taxes. They do not like that. By coincidence, we set that very same day as the final day for getting our budget house in order. I thank him for the analysis he made here today to the extent that it points out the differences in procedures between the House and Senate. I did not get to hear all of the remarks, but I assume the distinguished chairman is absolutely correct.

I do want to say to him the reason we reported out a budget resolution on March 24 is that we intended to get our work done on time. We intended this to be a very good year from the standpoint of completing the budget and appropriations processes on time. I looked forward to the pressure of Gramm-Rudman bringing us to the point in time when the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee and all of his subcommittee chairmen would bring appropriations bills to the floor and we would consider them in the framework of a budget resolution as we are obligated to do.

Now, there is a new theory around which I want to share with the distinguished chairman. There are some who are saying it does not matter about April 15; it does not matter about the appropriations schedule, because what we ought to do is do nothing with these processes which are difficult for 100 Members of the U.S. Senate to try to comply with.

There is a new notion around here that we ought to just fumble through here: Things are looking somewhat better, people say; reconciliation is in place; you have $9 billion more. You look at the numbers, and there is a $10 billion float under Gramm-Rudman-

Hollings—that is, the target for fiscal year 1987 is $144 billion; but at the end of the year, so long as you do not exceed 154, the automatic reductions are not triggered. This allows for miscalculations on economics. Now some are saying, "Let's let everything float."

I suggest to the other 99 Members of the Senate that if we are to abide by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, which was thought by many who supported it to be an impetus for us to determine policy, and not wait until the end of the year and gamble on a sequester, we need to decide how much we are going to cut. Almost everyone who voted for it said we should make the policy—we should vote on a budget resolution and then have the appropriators do their appropriations bills, so that when we get to August we have had an input.

The new idea is to say to the chairman: "Wait until August and take all these bills, packaged in a ribbon, called a continuing resolution, and maybe we'll get close to the budget targets and won't have to do anything."

I submit that anybody, including the White House, who has that theory and that thesis for activity here certainly is acting absolutely inconsistent with the way they voted and with the rhetoric of praise for that new approach called Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Yes, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings can work. But it will not work if we are going to graft on it some new theory that we do not need to do anything and we can let the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, in the waning days of this session, package up everything.

If that happened, this Senate would be denied, as the chairman knows, an opportunity to express its will. Nobody would be able to understand a continuing resolution, packaged all together. Nobody would be able to do anything significant, because it would be too late: a continuing resolution is too big and too complicated.

I urge all my colleagues who have an idea that we should fumble through this and do nothing to consider what that would do to their individual rights and privileges to have something to say about what happens to the fiscal policy of this country.

I want individual appropriations bills this year. I think they should be here. The Appropriations Committee should have an opportunity to go through those House appropriations bills and work its will, bring them to the floor, have 1, 2, or 3 days on each one, as we should be doing. We would not do that, under the newest theory in town—that things are OK and we do not have to do anything; that we will come out all right at the end of this year. I think we will come out with an absolute disaster from the standpoint of policy. We are gambling where we do not have to.

I say to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee that I do not know whether he has received any letters, but I do not have anybody telling me about alternative budgets. They are all saying: "Let's not do this. We can't do this, the budget the committee reported out." Has the chairman received any suggested budgets from Members? I have not seen any.

I ask, where are those budgets? If you want to add more to defense, let us hear about it. Perhaps there should be more money. Nobody has said that the budget resolution is inviolate. Where are the people who want to cut domestic spending more? They say we have not cut enough. Where are their proposals? Where will we find $10 to $12 billion more in outlay savings on the domestic side? If they have a proposal, I have not seen any clamor to sign up on some alternative.

Has the Senator from Florida seen any such proposal?

Mr. CHILES. Not yet. I am looking.

Mr. DOMENICI. I noticed that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana is here, wearing two hats: part of the leadership on the Democratic side, a member of the Appropriations Committee, and a member of the Budget Committee. Has he seen any proposal that we should get to debate?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I say to the Senator from New Mexico that I think the product produced by the Budget Committee was so good as to subsume everything else and sweep it right out the door.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I thank the chairman of the Budget Committee. I agree with him fully on his analysis.

I think that even we who are heathens and voted against Gramm-Rudman-Hollings are here ready to try to help make it work. I believe we have an obligation, once the Senate works its will, to fall in line and try to implement that decision. Here we are, the laity, so to speak, and the priests have abandoned us. We have to call the priests back to the temple and get them back into their incantation or ritual.

I am ready to move, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee. I am locked in by this foul, new ritual we have adopted that has already proved its unworkability. At the same time, we should give it a try. I am only challenging the priests to come back to the temple, to help us out.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I came across a proverb the other day that said, "One of these days is none of these days." I do not know who said that first, but it seems to me the White House has embraced that proverb as its basic attitude toward the budget. Their approach is a little like the old saying that by the street of by-and-by, one reaches the house of never. Well, by the same street, you can also reach the house of sequester.

If the administration wants to sit like a bump on a log and not negotiate the budget, I hope they will remember that at the other end of that log is the buzz saw of sequester.

I wonder how many times you can ask, how many times you can knock on a closed door, knowing that the person is home but will not answer? But that is the reaction we have had at the door of the White House.

At the same time, I notice the President derives great glee from whipping on Congress because we have not passed the budget by April 15. The reason we do not have it in place is because we cannot get any help from the White House at all in this matter.

If we do not have a budget, the sequester guillotine falls on October 15. That is 193 years almost to the day that it fell on Marie Antoinette's head. If it falls this year, it falls on all of us. It will mean we have already lost our heads, and it will mean a lot of people here will probably lose their jobs.

It seems to me that the most critical letters we face now are the letters GRH, and they do not stand for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. They stand for "get Reagan's help." That is what I think we need, and we need it right away.

Four years ago, Milton Friedman said the deficit is a hidden tax. It is a tax in the form of money borrowed from the public. He is certainly right. The interest on the national debt this year is going to be $148 billion, roughly the same level to which we are trying to reduce this year's deficit. Yet, we find ourselves in a strange situation where we cannot get the budget up so it can be debated

Is there a Gramm alternative; is there another White House measure to come before us? We will never find that out if we cannot schedule the issue for debate. Many of us have been trying to do our job by April 15. I hope we will have the opportunity to do our work as soon as possible.

THE BOMBING OF LIBYA

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to say I support the action the President took last night in striking at Qadhafi. I think the action was necessary in view of the overwhelming evidence that Qadhafi has consistently engaged in acts of terrorism, in acts of murder, against citizens of the United States and citizens of many other parts of the free world.

It is frustrating that we could not get our allies to totally join us with economic sanctions. I hope they will now.

We will, of course, have to review the results of this mission. Many of us hope the action was sufficient to deter further acts on the part of Qadhafi and people who would sponsor terrorism.

This is certainly an issue in which Congress must involve itself, and try to determine how we deal with the state-sponsored terrorism.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). If the Senator from Florida will yield for an inquiry from the Chair, according to the order under the previous order, the Senator from New Mexico was to be recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes followed by the Senator from Florida being recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Is the Chair going to understand that both Senators consider that to have been executed?

Mr. CHILES. I do.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico considers he used the time. If he has not, I yield back the time.

Mr. CHILES. I yield back the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appreciates the response.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period of routine morning business with statements limited to 5 minutes each.

TRIBUTE TO JUDGE WILLIAM LUTHER RHODES, JR.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to a distinguished South Carolinian, Judge William Luther Rhodes, Jr., who died on Tuesday, April 8, in Varnville, SC. To his wife and his three daughters, Mrs. Thurmond and I extend our deepest sympathy.

Judge Rhodes served in the State house of representatives from Hampton County from 1951 to 1960 and as chairman of the house ways and means committee for his last 4 years in the legislature.

He left the house to become a circuit judge and, for 15 years, was judge of the 14th circuit. He was first elected to the supreme court as an associate justice in 1975 and earned a reputation as a fair and careful jurist whose decisions were seldom reversed on appeal.

A native of Loris, SC, Rhodes was a graduate of Duke University and the University of South Carolina Law School. He served in the U.S. Army Air Corps during World War II.

Judge Rhodes was a great public servant, a dedicated leader, and an honest jurist. South Carolina and our Nation have lost one of their finest in his passing.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join me in paying tribute to this great American patriot and my good friend, Judge William Luther Rhodes, Jr., and I ask unanimous consent that the following article which appeared in The State in Columbia, SC, on April 4, 1986, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the State, Columbia, SC, Apr. 9, 1986]

RETIRED JUSTICE RHODES FOUND DEAD AFTER CRASH

Former legislator and retired Judge William Luther Rhodes Jr. died Tuesday, apparently after a heart attack, while driving in downtown Varnville.

The retired associate justice of the state Supreme Court was found dead at the wheel of his car after it left S.C. 278 and struck an empty pickup truck in a parking lot shortly afternoon.

The accident was reported to Varnville police at 12:42 p.m.

Hampton County Coroner Gordon Rhoden was not available for comment late Tuesday, but a spokesman for the funeral home Rhoden operates said that the death was attributed to natural causes and that no autopsy is planned.

Funeral arrangements will be announced today by Peoples-Rhoden Funeral Home in Hampton.

Rhodes, 67, served in the state House of Representatives from Hampton County from 1951 to 1960 and as chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee for his last four years in the Legislature.

He left the House to become a circuit judge and, for 15 years, was presiding judge of the 14th Circuit, which encompasses Allendale, Hampton, Colleton, Jasper and Beaufort counties.

First elected to the Supreme Court as an associate justice in 1975. Rhodes filled the unexpired term of J. Woodrow Lewis, now retired, when Lewis was elevated to chief justice. Rhodes was re-elected to a full 10-year term on the court in 1979, but retired a year later because of ill health.

Rhodes was known as a fair and careful jurist whose decisions were seldom reversed on appeal and as an affable gentleman judge who frequently said that spittoons disappeared from South Carolina's courtrooms after women were allowed to serve on juries and that the ladies' presence had enhanced the quality of justice as well.

Rhodes also liked to share anecdotes about his years on the bench particularly when he "rode the circuit" to hold court in small counties. He said he once told a bailiff to take the jury to lunch and watched from the window of his chambers while members of the panel dutifully rode away in the back of a pickup truck after the bailiff found they wouldn't all fit in one car.

A native of Loris, Rhodes was a graduate of Duke University and the University of South Carolina law school. He served in the U.S. Army Air Corps during World War II and opened a law office in Varnville after leaving military service.

Hampton County voters elected Rhodes to four terms in the House. He later became the county's first resident trial judge. In his hometown, Rhodes remained "The Judge" throughout his life.

He was married to the former Elizabeth R. DuBose of Varnville.

Surviving are his widow and three daughters, Mrs. Thomas J. Ruhf, Mrs. Harold L. Peeples Jr. and Mrs. Varn Cummings.

IN SUPPORT OF PRESIDENT REAGAN'S ACTION AGAINST LIBYA

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the action taken by President Reagan in striking Libyan facilities which have been used to promote and support international terrorism. While the direct, documented, Libyan involvement in the recent bombing of the Berlin discotheque serves as the "smoking gun" which justified the President's action, ample evidence exists to demonstrate an interrelated nature of terrorist activities coordinated and sponsored by the Libyan Government.

In fact, in a February 19 hearing entitled "Libyan Sponsored Terrorism: A Dilemma for Policymakers," conducted by the Judiciary Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, which I chair, evidence disclosed extensive involvement in international terrorism by the Libyan Government.

At that hearing, Dr. Yonah Alexander of Georgetown University's Center for Strategic and International Studies testified using maps and charts provided by intelligence sources. He was able to identify 44 terrorist training camps located in Libya, alone. The larger camps, several of which were hit last night, are located at Zawarah, Tarhuna, Al-Aziziyya Misurata, Sirte, Tocra, Baida, Ras el Hilal, Tubruq, Jaghbub, and Umm Al-Aranib. All of the bases except the last two are located along the Mediterranean coast. At these camps, terrorists from around the world are trained by Libyans, Cubans, East Germans, Soviets, Syrians, and Palestinians.

Moreover, the Libyan Secret Police, the dreaded Mukhabarat, is lead by Gen. Marcus Wolfe, chief of the GDR's Intelligence Service which, of course, is controlled by the KGB. Libya is supporting terrorism on two levels, by creating its own groups and by aiding those in existence. Qadhafi has restructured Libya and institutionalized the revolution within the bureaucracy. The revolutionary committees abroad keep dissidents in line and coordinate with the Peoples Bureaus—Embassies—which serve as an operation base for revolutionary activity.

The three primary bodies operating under Libyan auspices are the National Arab Youth Organization for the Liberation of Palestine (active against American civilians); the Revolutionary Arab-Palestinian Committees (based in Lebanon and operating against Israel); and the National Command for the Arab Revolutionary Force (which coordinates activities of terrorists from Syria, Iraq, Lebanon, and radical factions of the PLO).

Libyan Embassies reportedly serve as arms warehouses, even terrorists based in Indonesia have received money and weapons from Libya. The Libyan Embassy in Kuala Lampur, Malaysia serves as the contact for Asian terrorist groups. The role of the Libyans is not limited to supplier, for as you know, two Libyan diplomats were forced to leave Spain in December 1985, following the discovery of evidence that they had been planning an attack.

Ambassador Robert B. Oakley, Director of the State Department's Office for Counterterrorism and Emergency Planning, who today is on a mission abroad to gain support for our effort against Libya, has provided the subcommittee with a voluminous history of Libya's support for and involvement in international terrorism, citing numerous specific incidents in the Middle East, Europe, Africa, and many other parts of the world.

Mr. President, at this point, I would ask unanimous consent that a "white paper" entitled "Libya Under Qadhafi: A Pattern of Aggression," prepared by the State Department and presented to the subcommittee by Ambassador Oakley, be placed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

Mr. President, Libya is not alone in its participation in state-sponsored terrorism. Over the past 5 years, the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism has held more than 60 hearings on terrorism and related subjects, and those hearings have yielded abundant and conclusive evidence of a network, a global unity in the sources of support, strategy, tactics, and goals of international terrorists. The thrust and power of this network amounts to a new, highly effective form of low-intensity warfare, which is being waged by various nation-states to erode the influence and strategic position of the United States and Western democracies, in general, and to enhance the power of the Soviet Union, its client states and allies, in particular.

The hearings of the subcommittee have provided a reservoir of information sufficient to inform the Congress and the American public of the interrelationships between terrorist activities and, to show the nature and extent of this network's new threat to humanity, freedom, and U.S. economic as well as security interests. But the reservoir has not been tapped sufficiently. The information is not widely enough known by the Congress, the public, or the executive branch. Against such ignorance, informed policymakers face impediments. What should be chess has remained checkers, one move at a time. For too long, our policy toward terrorism has been fragmented, reactive, defensive and ad hoc, dealing with each incident as though it were an isolated occurrence, entirely unrelated to other terrorist acts. This approach to the problem ignores the voluminous record developed by this subcommittee and, also, the publicly declared policies and intentions of terrorist groups and the states, such as Libya, which support them.

The joint hearings held last May by the Senate Committees on Foreign Relations and the Judiciary disclosed, graphically and comprehensively, the interrelated nature of the international terrorist network. But few Senators seriously attended the hearings or studied the disclosures. Since those hearings, the American people have witnessed further the handiwork of the terrorist network as we have suffered through some depraved and outrageous episodes of international barbarity.

The shocking hijacking of the Italian cruise ship, the Achille Lauro, TWA flight 847, EgyptAir 648, the airport massacres in Rome and Vienna, the bombing of TWA flight 840, and the bombing of the Berlin discotheque were not isolated incidents. They were only a few of the more than roughly 705 terrorist acts that were committed in 1985, at a cost of death or injury to nearly 150 Americans and countless others. They are among only the most recent of the thousands of terrorist acts undertaken since 1973, except that the hijackings and the airport massacres have served to heighten American awareness of the cold, calculating nature of those persons or groups who use international terrorism to advance their political and ideological objectives. They have starkly revealed how little regard their perpetrators, strategists, and financiers have for human life and the values that are the core of the Western democratic world.

These incidents have revealed, more clearly with each occurrence, the existence of a multinational support system for such terrorist activities with Libya at the center of the support system. The airport massacres in Rome and Vienna were perpetrated by terrorists of the Abu Nidal faction who were able to cross international borders with the assistance of phony passports reportedly issued by Libya. The Libyan connection was established more firmly by statements made by Libyan leader Qadhafi describing the murders as "heroic" acts and pledging continuing support for such abominations. The U.S. Government reported that it had hard evidence that terrorists of the Abu Nidal and other factions were being harbored and trained in Libya.

The subcommittee's hearing also examined Libya's connection with that has become a "radical entente" of nation-states—including Libya, Syria, Iran, Cuba, and North Korea—which, since the early 1980's, has attempted to coordinate a worldwide strategy designed to expel United States military, political, and economic presence from key areas of the world. Terrorist acts are but one part of a strategy which plays heavily with politics, media, and psychological warfare. This radical explusion strategy includes efforts: First, to "decouple" the United States from its allies; second, to force the United States to abandon key military and diplomatic outposts; third, to stretch thin U.S. military forces over the world by coordinating the occurrence of terrorist incidents and other crises simultaneously or in succession in different parts of the world; and fourth, to deny the United States and other free nations access to trade vital to the survival of the free world's economy.

The activities of the "Radical Entente," only part of a global network, are nonetheless especially relevant to the Brezhnev, clearly stated Soviet goal of expanding Soviet hegemony into developing countries by fostering so-called "wars of national liberation," an ultimate end of which is to deprive the United States of trade in those key areas of the world. Mideastern oil and African metals and minerals should be in the forefront of our minds as we examine the entente's activities in the areas, especially when linked to the Communist-controlled ANC and SWAPO in southern Africa.

In the case of Libya, this hostile strategy is, as in other cased, directed primarily at the United States because of its leadership position in the Western World, the ideals and culture of which the radical entente considers to be inimical to the values both of its Muslim and Communist members. Also, the Arab members of the entente direct hostility toward the United States because of its long standing support for the State of Israel.

The Soviet Union supports the entente's operations with military hardware, the arrangements for terrorist training and other assistance, and encourages the core radical countries to focus their hostility more exclusively against the United States. Soviet stick-and-carrot intimidation discourages Third World countries from moving to maintain closer ties with the United States for fear of incurring the wrath of the radical entente. While the Soviet Union does not actually control the core countries of the radical entente, Moscow foments hatred of the United States and clearly benefits from the entente's anti-United States strategy and Soviet-sponsored tactics.

An understanding of the international support structure for terrorism is essential to developing a policy to combat it. After all, the commission of the terrorist act itself, although important, is only the tip of the iceberg; we must attack the core of the problem. We must have the intelligence capability to interdict and/or to discourage terrorist acts from occurring in the first place; and to discourage Soviet support for terrorism. If prevention of a terrorist act is not possible in a given case, we must be able to quickly identify and punish the terrorist group or groups involved and the nation-states which have facilitated their acts.

With the notable exception of our response in the Achille Lauro incident and President Reagan's response last night, we as a nation have rarely demonstrated an ability to prevent or effectively respond to terrorism.

I hope that the attention of the Congress and the American people will now be focused on the urgent need to develop a policy to combat international terrorism. The American people are alarmed and frustrated by what they perceive to be an apparent inability of the United States to prevent or effectively respond to international terrorist attacks. We must develop a consistent policy to deal with terrorism on a continuum—not with "fire engine diplomacy" that treats each terrorist incident as an isolated event. The Soviet Union's march via terrorism to accomplish our destruction through the achievement of the two Brezhnev policy goals must be arrested before it makes further progress.

Moscow's progress toward denying the United States access to previously available trade has already cost the United States more in annual budget deficit terms than any other factor.

The common predictions, about, and general acceptance in Congress of, gross reductions in our armed services, foreign operations, intelligence and counterterrorism funds in today's and tomorrow's security/international trade environment is unworthy of government's prime function: To assure the survival of our people, of our freedom and of our chance to prosper.

Mr. President, I again commend President Reagan for taking the necessary measured response to Libyan state-sponsored terrorism. And I congratulate and express gratitude to those members of our armed services who gallantly put themselves in harm's way to execute the President's orders.

Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objecton, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIBYA UNDER QADHAFI: A PATTERN OF AGGRESSION

CHARACTER OF LIBYAN POLICY

Mu'ammar Qadhafi seized power in a military coup in 1969. Since then, he has forcibly sought to remake Libyan society according to his own revolutionary precepts. Qadhafi's ambitions are not confined within Libya's borders, however. He fancies himself a leader and agent of historic forces that will reorder Third World politics to his taste. His vision provides both a motive and a rationale for providing military and financial aid to radical regimes and for undermining moderate governments by creating or supporting subversive groups and abetting terrorists. Qadhafi's aggressive policies increasingly have focused on undermining U.S. and other Western interests in the Third World, as he sees these as the main barrier to his radical and expansionist goals. Qadhafi's use of political, economic, and military resources in support of anti-Western activities worldwide may be surpassed only by the Soviet Union, its East European allies, and possibly North Korea or Cuba. He is particularly hostile to Israel and the United States. His tactics include a mixture of threats and material support for terrorism, offers of cooperation, economic incentives and intimidation, and outright military aggression.

LIBYAN INVOLVEMENT IN TERRORISM

Qadhafi has used terrorism as one of the primary instruments of his foreign policy and supports radical groups that use terrorist tactics. Tripoli operates numerous training sites for foreign dissident groups that provide instruction in the use of explosive devices, hijacking, assassination, and various commando and guerrilla techniques. It also provides terrorist training outside Libya and abuses diplomatic privilege by storing arms and explosives at its diplomatic establishments, as demonstrated by the shootout at its embassy in London in April 1984.

The main targets of direct Libyan terrorist activities have been expatriate Libyan dissidents and leading officials of moderate Arab and African governments. In almost all cases, the assassins kill their victims with handguns, often provided by the Libyan diplomatic establishment in their country. Qadhafi generally uses Libyans for anti-exile operations; for other types of attacks he tends to employ surrogates or mercenaries.

The Libyan Government in 1980 began a concerted effort to assassinate anti-Qadhafi exiles. By the time the first phase ended in 1981, 11 Libyan dissidents living abroad had been murdered. Libya in 1985 sponsored five attacks against exiled Libyan dissidents. Targets of these attacks lived in Greece, West Germany, Cyprus, Italy, and Austria.

Qadhafi has at least twice tried to murder Libyan exiles in Egypt only to have his agents intercepted by Egyptian security. In November 1984, Egypt fooled Qadhafi into believing that his hired agents had assassinated former Libyan Prime Minister Bakoush. After the Libyan press acknowledged Tripoli's responsibility for the murder, Egypt revealed the sting: the four Libyan agents were in custody, and the pictures of the alleged victim were fake. In November 1985, another four-man Libyan team was arrested during an attempted attack against a gathering of exiles near Cairo. After the arrests, Egypt released audio and video tapes incriminating Libya.

Libya also has plotted anti-exile attacks in the United States. A Libyan exile in Colorado was shot and wounded by a Libyan-hired assassin in 1981. In May 1984, the FBI arrested two Libyans near Philadelphia for attempting to buy silenced handguns—the usual Libyan assassination weapon. A year later in May 1985, a Libyan diplomat at the United Nations was declared persona non grata and a ring of nonofficial Libyans was broken up in connection with a plot to kill Libyan dissidents in four states.

Qadhafi also targets moderate Arab governments for their refusal to continue the military struggle against Israel and for their links to the West. There is evidence of Libyan-backed assassination plots against President Mubarak of Egypt. For example, those arrested after last November's attempted attack on Libyan exiles in Egypt stated that Qadhafi's target list included Mubarak. Former Sudanese President Nimeiri has also been targeted by Libya. We believe that Qadhafi has added Jordan's King Hussein and Iraq's Saddam Husayn to his hit list because of restored ties to Cairo and Washington, respectively.

Qadhafi also has been implicated in plots to assassinate other moderate heads of state. In September 1984, the Chadian Government uncovered a Libyan-sponsored plot in which a briefcase bomb was to explode during a Cabinet meeting chaired by Chadian President Habre. More recently, Zairian officials thwarted a Libyan-sponsored plot against President Mobutu in September 1985.

LIBYAN LINKS TO MIDDLE EAST RADICALS

Longstanding Libyan support for radical Palestinian groups is growing. Qadhafi has provided safehaven, money, and arms to these groups—including the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine—General Command, the Fatah dissidents, and the notorious Abu Nidal group. Training for Palestinians and other radicals frequently takes place at several locations in Libya. These anti-Arafat Palestinians are widely engaged in terrorist activities and focus their terrorist activity on Israel and the occupied territories.

More recently, however, Libya's support has broadened to include logistic support for terrorist operations. For example, Libya provided passports to the Abu Nidal members responsibile for the attack on the El Al counter in Vienna. the Abu Nidal group is particularly appealing to Qadhafi because of its track record of successful terrorist operations. Abu Nidal's targeting of moderate Palestinians and moderate Arab leaders is consistent with Libya's antipathy toward participants in the peace process. According to Libyan press reports, Abu Nidal met with Qadhafi in Libya at least twice in 1985. Abu Nidal also gave an interview in Tripoli to a German publication last year and met with Qadhafi's chief lieutenant, Abd al-Salam Jallud. In addition, Libya has provided sanctuary, training assistance, and financial support to the Abu Nidal organization, and there are reliable press and other reports that its headquarters has been moved to Libya. The evidence points to Libya's having been involved in the bloody hijacking of Egyptair 648.

Libya is trying to improve ties to other regional terrorist groups. Qadhafi would also like closer links to Tehran's terrorist effort. He announced a "strategic alliance" with Iran last summer, which he hopes to use as a foundation for joint operational planning for terrorist attacks against various regional foes. He also supports Egyptian and Tunisian dissidents.

Libya also provided refuge for the notorious international terrorist Carlos, who has headed a network of terrorists for hire. His group was responsible for numerous vicious attacks including the hostage-taking of OPEC [Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries] oil ministers in Vienna in 1975.

LIBYAN TERRORISM AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

During the past 18 months, Qadhafi has made several public references to expanding his terrorism campaign to cover U.S. targets. In a June 1984 speech, for example, he told his Libyan audience that "we are capable of exporting terrorism to the heart of America." During a speech last September observing the 16th anniversary of his takeover, Qadhafi remarked that "we have the right to fight America, and we have the right to export terrorism to them. . . ." Qadhafi recently threatened in a press conference on January 2 to "pursue U.S. citizens in their country and streets" if the United States takes action in response to Libya's alleged involvement in the Rome and Vienna terrorist attacks.

There have been several instances over the years of Libyan-sponsored attacks against U.S. interests. These examples include the sacking of our Embassy in Tripoli in 1979 and the discovery by Sudanese authorities of a Libyan plot to blow up the American Embassy Club in Khartoum by planting explosives in stereo speakers. U.S. personnel also have been on Qadhafi's target list, as indicated by the plan in 1977 to assassinate our ambassador in Cairo.

RADICALISM IN THE ARAB WORLD

Qadhafi's foremost ambition is to dominate and unite the Arab world. He frequently compares himself to Garibaldi or Bismarck and has justified his use of violence and terrorism against moderate Arab regimes as necessary to achieve Arab unity.

Egypt, because of its peace treaty with Israel, is a special target. Libyan agents have been active in Egypt since the 1970s, and Qadhafi has offered support to various opponents of the Egyptian Government. In October 1981, immediately after President Sadat was assassinated, Qadhafi called on Egyptians to overthrow their government; within a week, at Cairo International Airport two bombs exploded that had been concealed in luggage unloaded from a flight originating in Tripoli.

More recently, Qadhafi has sought to embarrass the government of President Mubarak and undermine the Egyptian economy. In July 1984, a Libyan ship commanded by a senior Libyan naval commando laid mines in the Red Sea and Gulf of Suez that damaged 18 merchant ships. In May 1985, the Egyptians thwarted a plot by radical Palestinians backed by Libya to destroy the U.S. Embassy in Cairo with a truck bomb. Last summer Qadhafi expelled over 10,000 Egyptian workers in Libya—confiscating their savings and most of their belongings—in what was, in part, an effort to place a greater burden on the strained Egyptian economy. Also during 1985, Cairo captured several teams of Libyan-supported Egyptian dissidents who reported that their plan was to destabilize the Mubarak government through sabotage and inciting civil unrest.

Sudan also is a priority target. Qadhafi has long offered training and support to Sudanese dissidents and sponsored acts of sabotage against the government of former President Nimeiri. He was a major source of arms and money for southern Sudanese rebels who began a guerrilla war against the central government 2 years ago. In February 1983, the Sudanese, with Egyptain assistance, thwarted a Libyan-sponsored coup attempt, and in March 1984, a Libyan TU-22 bombed Omdurman, Sudan, in a failed attempt to destroy a radio station there that broadcast condemnations of Qadhafi's policies by Libyan oppositionists.

Since Nimeiri's fall from power, Qadhafi has exploited the resumption of diplomatic ties to Sudan to build a network for subversion inimical to Sudan's efforts to establish a parliamentary democracy. A number of known Libyan terrorists have been assigned to the Libyan People's Bureau (Embassy) and the Libyan airline office in Khartoum. Qadhafi also has provided arms, funding, training, and probably direction to the Sudanese Revolutionary Committees, a small group in Sudan dedicated to establishing a government on the Libyan model in Sudan. In May, a planeload of these dissidents arrived in Khartoum armed with assault rifles.

Qadhafi also is working to expand his influence in the countries of the Arab Maghreb. Qadhafi refuses to negotiate with Algeria to determine the correct location of the Libyan-Algerian border. Perhaps angered over President Bendjedid's moderation, Qadhafi reportedly provides money to Algerian dissidents such as Ahmed Ben Bella.

In Tunisia, Qadhafi has long sought to bring down the pro-Western government of Habib Bourguiba. In 1980, Libyan-supported guerrillas attacked the southern Tunisian mining town of Gafsa; when France offered its support to Tunis, Libyan mobs burned both the French and Tunisian Embassies while security forces stood idly by. Following bread riots in Tunisia in January 1984, saboteurs originating in Libya dynamited a pipeline near the Libyan-Tunisian border. In an effort to exacerbate social tensions this past year, Qadhafi expelled over 30,000 Tunisian workers and confiscated their property. In September, when Tunisian newspapers attacked Qadhafi for the expulsions, a Libyan diplomat attempted to mail letter bombs to the critical journalists. Several exploded, wounding two postal workers and causing Tunis to sever diplomatic relations.

Libya is staunchly opposed to the Middle East peace process, and Qadhafi is doing all he can to subvert it. In Lebanon, Libyan arms and money have flowed to different militias and Palestinian groups actively opposed to the government of President Gemayel. Qadhafi has been especially eager to undermine the influence of PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] Chairman Yasir Arafat because Qadhafi perceives him as too willing to consider a negotiated settlement with Israel. As a result, Qadhafi has thrown his support to radical Palestinian groups—including the Fatah Revolutionary Council led by Abu Nidal—that advocate continued war against Israel. Since 1981 Qadhafi has shipped these groups items as prosaic as uniforms and as powerful as tanks and BM-21 multiple rocket launchers. In 1984, Libyan troops participated in the Syrian-backed assault on Arafat's forces in northern Lebanon.

The Persian Gulf also is an arena for Libyan medddling. Qadhafi has allied himself with Iran in its war against Iraq and has provided Tehran with T-55 tanks, antitank and antiaircraft artillery, ammunition, and even Scud rockets. In addition, Libya provides arms and money to Kurdish separatists in northern Iraq and to the antigovernment group, the "Union of Iraqi Democrats." In 1984 and 1985, Libyan agents attempted to disrupt the Islamic pilgrimage ceremonies in Saudi Arabia; in 1984 entire planeloads of Libyan "pilgrims" were discovered to be carrying arms. Libya continues to enjoy good relations with and has provided support to the National Democratic Front that operates out of Marxist South Yemen against the government of President Salih in North Yemen. Although Libya restored diplomatic relations with Somalia last May, Qadhafi has not severed his relationship with Somali opposition groups he has long supported.

INVOLVEMENT IN SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA

Tripoli views black Africa as a principal arena for forging a group of anti-Western radical states that will strengthen Libyan influence in international forums and confer upon Qadhafi status as a world leader. Qadhafi's aggressiveness has been strengthened by the propensity of the international community to ignore his often blatant disregard for the sovereignty of small African nations.

Chad, of course, is the most egregious example. In 1973 Qadhafi forcibly annexed the northern portion of Chad known as the Aozou Strip. Throughout the 1970s, Libya supported various tribal and guerrilla groups in Chad in a bid to install a pliable regime in N'Djamena. Having failed to achieve this indirectly, in October 1980 the Libyan army entered Chad and attempted to impose a union between the two countries. The Libyan occupation force withdrew in November 1981, but returned in 1983 when the pro-Libyan Chadian leader Goukouni Oueddei was ousted by current President Hissein Habre. Only intervention by French armed forces confined the Libyan occupation to the northern 40% of Chad. French forces were withdrawn in the fall of 1984, but Qadhafi reneged on an agreement reached with President Mitterand and continues to occupy northern Chad with an army of several thousand.

The drought-battered countries of the Sahel offer Qadhafi many opportunities for meddling. Qadhafi continues to provide arms and training to the nomadic Tuareg tribesmen in an effort to undermine the Governments of Mali and Niger.

Qadhafi also is determined to topple President Mobotu of Zaire. Qadhafi is motivated by hostility to Kinshasa's close ties to the West, its recognition of Israel, and its support of Chadian President Habre. Qadhafi also is aware of Zaire's role as a leading producer of cobalt and other strategic minerals. Tripoli provides training in sabotage and small arms to several different guerrilla groups including the National Front for the Liberation of the Congo and the Congolese National Movement. Libyan diplomatic facilities in countries bordering Zaire are centers of support for these groups.

MEDDLING IN LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN

Qadhafi's determination to strike at U.S. interests and to spread his philosophy of revolution has led to a more aggressive Libyan posture in Latin America. Although many governments and groups in this region are wary of Qadhafi, some are willing to accept his financial and military support.

Tripoli views Nicaragua as its base in Central America and accordingly seeks to strengthen the Sandinista dictatorship in Managua. In addition to several hundred million dollars in economic assistance, Qadhafi's support to the Sandinistas has included antiaircraft guns, SAM-7 surface-to-air missiles and launchers, and small arms. At least several dozen Libyan military pesonnel are in Nicaragua. Libyan support has enhanced the Sandinistas' ability to subvert neighboring states. In addition, Libya has provided some arms and money to insurgents in Guatemala and El Salvador, as well as the M-19 terrorist group in Colombia. During the past year, Libya has provided training, guidance, and funds to a key farleft terrorist group to enable it to expand armed action against the Government of Chile.

Libyan agents have been increasingly active among the Caribbean islands, especially since the summer of 1984. The loss of its People's Bureau in Grenada following the callapse of the Bishop government in 1983 forced Tripoli to attempt to establish its centers for subversion in other diplomatic posts in the region. Qadhafi also has used religion as a cover for intelligence activities in the area, sponsoring Islamic conferences in which the Libyan participants often are intelligence officers or operatives of the Libyan Revolutionary Committees. Leftist leaders from the Dominican Republic, Dominica, Barbados, Antigua and Barbuda, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, St. Lucia, the French Departments, and elsewhere have also been invited to Libya for "seminars" and paramilitary training. Particularly worrisome is Libyan urging of leftist politicians to undertake violent action rather than pursue legal means to replace moderate governments in the region.

SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA

As elsewhere, Libyan diplomatic missions in this region provide the infrastructure for Libyan subversion, disbursing funds, and arranging for the training of leftists and other dissidents.

In South Asia, Libyan activities are focused on the Islamic states. No doubt reflecting his dependence on Russian arms, Qadhafi is one of the few Muslim leaders who does not criticize the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Although Libya maintains relations with Pakistan, it has also been involved with the "al-Zulfiqar" terrorist group. Qadhafi, in addition, has provided training and money to opponents of President Ershad of Bangladesh.

In Southeast Asia, Qadhafi concentrates on Muslim minorities. For some time, he has provided paramilitary training to the small Muslim insurgency in southern Thailand. In the Philippines, Libya continues to send assistance to the Muslim Moro separatists on Mindanao, despite a 1976 agreement with Manila to cease such aid. New Caledonia, a French possession in the South Pacific, has no appreciable Muslim population, but Libya has, nevertheless, provided military training and some funding to the Kanak Socialist National Liberation Front, the group responsible for most of the pro-independence violence on the island. Libyan intelligence operatives are known to be active on other islands in Oceania.

THE EROSION OF INTERNATIONAL NORMS

Qadhafi's subversion is not confined to those countries that are the direct object of his ambitions. The international community as a whole suffers from Qadhafi's disrespect for international norms of behavior and accepted practice. Qadhafi has abused diplomatic privilege for terrorist purposes, reneged on international agreements, and blatantly used terrorist violence against political opponents. In addition, Qadhafi's support of terrorism, regardless of his direct operational involvement in a given terrorist act, helps legitimize terrorism as an acceptable political activity.

The Abu Nidal Group

The Abu Nidal group is among the most dangerous of the Middle Eastern terrorist organizations. It is probably the best organized and most effective of the radical Palestinian terrorist groups, carefully planning its operations and keeping its information tightly compartmented.

The group has repeatedly demonstrated its ability to operate in any country it chooses. It has staged attacks in over 20 countries on three continents and operates throughout the Middle East.

Abu Nidal has conducted over 60 terrorist attacks during the last 8 years—at least 30 of them since the beginning of 1984. Two-thirds of the group's nearly 20 attacks this year have taken place in Western Europe, as innocent bystanders increasingly have become casualties of the group's assaults.

The simultaneous attacks on airline offices in Rome and Vienna on December 27, which have the hallmarks of Abu Nidal, left more than a dozen dead, including five Americans. Three of the passports used n the Vienna attacks were traced to Libya; two were seized from Tunisians as they were expelled from Libya last summer, and the third was lost in Libya by a Tunisian worker there in 1977.

The Egyptair hijacking in late November ultimately cost the lives of 59 passengers.

The group bombed the British Air office in Rome in September, injuring 15 persons, many of them passers-by.

Abu Nidal members threw grenades at Rome's Cafe de Paris in September, injuring 38 tourists—among them Americans, Germans, Britons, Italians, Argentines, and Brazilians.

The group bombed two hotels in Athens—one in September that injured 19, mostly British tourists, and one in August that injured 13 Britons.

In Spain, Abu Nidal attacks in July at the British Air office and the nearby Alia ticket office killed one and wounded 24 customers and employees.

Also, in July, the group was probably responsible for the bombing of two restaurants in Kuwait, killing eight and injuring almost 90.

In April, an Abu Nidal terrorist fired a rocket at a Jordanian airliner as it was taking off from Athens airport. The rocket hit the plane but did not explode. Hundreds of casualties might have resulted had the operation been successful.

The official name of the Abu Nidal organization is "Fatah-the-Revolutionary Council," which it usually employs when attacking Israeli targets. But it has employed a number of cover names for its operations. Originally, the group operated under the name Black June; more recently, the group has used the name Arab Revolutionary Brigades when it staged attacks against Persian Gulf targets. It also acts as Black September when it attacks Jordanian and Palestinian targets and employs the name Revolutionary Organization of Socialist Moslems (ROSM) as its signature for attacks against British targets. It added Egyptian nomenclatures when it hijacked the Egypt air plane in November.

BACKGROUND

The group, which is headed by Sabri al-Banna (who uses the nom de guerre Abu Nidal), grew out of elements that broke away a decade ago from PLO Chairman Arafat's Fatah organization. The group is committed to the use of violence to destroy diplomatic efforts designed to reconcile Israel and the Arab states, especially those mounted earlier this year by King Hussein and Arafat's PLO. The Abu Nidal group also calls for the destruction of ruling "reactionary" regimes such as Jordan, Egypt, and the Persian Gulf states and is critical of what it sees as Arafat's and the PLO's moderation and lack of revolutionary base and zeal. Consequently, the group contends that both inter-Arab and intra-Palestinian terrorism are needed to force the all-embracing Arab revolution which, in turn, would lead to the liberation of Palestine.

The group was formed in 1974 after Arafat instituted a ban on PLO involvement with international terrorism outside Israel and the occupied territories. Abu Nidal radical views found favor at the time with the Iraqi regime, which helped him to create the organization that Abu Nidal called "Fatah-the-Revolutionary Council to promote his claim that his organization, rather than the one led by Arafat, was the legitimate Fatah. He has similarly duplicated other Fatah organizational titles to suggest a parallel structure with the original.

Beginning in the early 1980s, Baghdad suppressed activities of the Abu Nidal group out of Iraq. Elements of the group then moved to Damascus. Since early 1984, Libya began to provide increased support to the group, and Abu Nidal himself and many of the group's operations may have moved there within the last 12 months.

The group probably has several hundred members, although an accurate count is difficult. We believe the group has a number of cells throughout Western Europe and the Middle East and makes use of the large number of Palestinian students studying abroad, sometimes involving them in operations after only perfunctory training. These new recruits, for example, were involved in the five grenade attacks staged by the group in 1985.

CURRENT OPERATIONS AND TRENDS

Based on the style of Abu Nidal attacks, it is evident that the group is willing to cause indiscriminate casualties. Apart from assassinations of particular individuals, Abu Nidal operations through November 1985 resulted in nearly 70 deaths and 201 wounded among innocent bystanders—and the number could have been much higher if the Jordanian airliner attack in Athens had been successful. In the previous year, 111 died in the crash of a Gulf Air jet on which an Abu Nidal bomb may have exploded.

The Abu Nidal group has concentrated on attacking Jordanian interests since 1984. These attacks were provoked by the Jordanian agreement to host the PNC [Palestine National Council] meeting in November 1984 and King Hussein's February accord with Arafat to restart the stalled Middle East peace process. Abu Nidal operatives thought to have assassinated former West Bank mayor and Palestinian moderate Fahd Qawasmeh in December 1984 shortly after his election to the PLO Executive Council. The anti-Jordanian/PLO campaign has not abated. As long as Jordanian and PLO efforts toward Middle East peace negotiations continue, attacks against both Jordanian and Palestinian targets probably will also continue.

Aside from the attack on Alia offices in Madrid in July and the attempt to down a Jordanian airliner over Athens in April, other incidents involving Jordanian targets in 1985 have included:

The November 24 assassination of a Palestinian in Amman;

The murder of a Jordanian publisher in Athens in September;

A plot to assassinate the Jordanian Ambassador to Greece in August;

The murder of a Jordanian diplomat in Ankara on July 24; and

A rocket attack on the Jordanian Embassy in Rome in April.

The group has also targeted British interests. ROSM claimed responsibility for the kidnaping in March 1985 of a British journalist in Lebanon and the assassination of British diplomats in India and Greece in 1984. The purpose of the attacks probably is to force the United Kingdom to release group members imprisoned for the attempted assassination of the Israeli Ambassador in London in June 1982.

Even before the recent attacks on the Vienna and Rome airports, Abu Nidal had begun to concentrate his field of operations in Western Europe. Although his targets have been his usual enemies—for example, British, Israeli, moderate Arab—he has become very indiscriminate about injuring bystanders. The relatively relaxed controls in West European countries have been conducive to his operations there. The pattern of concentrating his efforts in Europe has coincided with the strengthening of his links to Libya. The likelihood of Libyan financing, safehaven, and logistic assistance should be very helpful to his future international terrorist operations.

CHRONOLOGY OF LIBYAN SUPPORT FOR TERRORISM

1985:
December	Italy/Austria		Passports used by Abu Nidal terrorists in attack on El Al counter provided by Libya.
November	Malta		Hijacking of Egyptair airliner by Abu Nidal supporters may have involved Libyan support.
	Egypt		Four-man team of Libyan agents arrested shortly before attempting to attack gathering of Libyan exiles. Former Libyan Prime Minister Bakoush was the main target.
October	Greece		Libyan merchant wounded in Athens by two gunman; the victim had left Libya 5 years earlier.
September	Tunisia		Libyan diplomat smuggles about 100 letter bombs addressed to journalists into Tunisia. Several explode, injuring two postal workers and causing Tunisia to sever diplomatic relations.
May	United States		A Libyan diplomat at the United Nations was declared persona non grata, and 16 non-official Libyans were subpoenaed to appear before a U.S. grand jury in connection with a plot to kill dissidents in several different states.
April	West Germany		Moroccan citizen resident in the F.R.G. since 1960 killed by a Libyan, who was arrested at the scene.
			Anti-Qadhafi Libyan student killed in Bonn by Libyan gunman who was arrested. The assassin also wounded two German passers-by, one seriously. The victim had been a target of the Libyan regime for at least 2 years.
	Cyprus		Libyan businessman assassinated in downtown Nicosia by an unidentified gunman. The victim was the director of an offshore holding company and was believed to be an opponent of the Libyan regime.
March	Italy		Libyan jeweler murdered in his shop in Rome. A silencer-equipped pistol was left at the scene by the assassin.
February	Austria		Former Libyan Ambassador to Austria severely wounded by two shots fired from a car outside his home in Vienna. The victim had supported Qadhafi's seizure of power in 1969, but he quit his post in disgust at the regime in 1980.
1984:
November	Egypt		President Mubarak announces that four assassins sent to Egypt by Libya to kill former Libyan Prime Minister Bakoush had been arrested and forced to send fake pictures to the Libyan Embassy in Malta showing Bakoush apparently dead. Official Libyan press sources then claimed Bakoush had been executed by suicide squads sent abroad "to liquidate enemies of the revolution."
September	Italy		A Libyan exile was found gagged and strangled in a hotel in Rome. The victim had been the subject of Libyan requests for deportation to Libya.

1980–85—Continued

	Chad		Chadians discover plot to assassinate President Habre with an attache case bomb. Evidence of the plot, including photographs of the bomb, was provided to the United Nations the following February when Chad lodged a complaint against Libya.
August	United Kingdom		One of six Libyans awaiting trial for bomb attacks in London in March 1983 found shot to death in a London apartment. The victim may have been silenced by the Libyan Government.
	Belgium		A bomb wrecks a car parked in front of the Zairian Embassy in Brussels.
July	Belgium		A bomb exploded in the Brussels office Air Zaire.
	Red Sea		Libya mined the Red Sea, damaging 18 merchant ships of varying nationalities.
	Greece		Two Libyan students found murdered in their apartment in a crime reminiscent of Libyan killings of anti-Qadhafi students in 1980 and 1981. The two were beaten, strangled, and gagged before being shot twice in the back.
June	Greece		Anti-Qadhafi Libyan editor of an Arab newspaper in Athens killed by two men on a motorbike.
			A Libyan-born citizen known to distribute anti-Qadhafi literature at his store shot by a Libyan employee of Libyan Arab Airlines.
May	Libya		Jana, the official Libyan news agency, announces "the Libyan masses have decided to form suicide commandos to chase traitors and stray dogs wherever they are and liquidate them physically."
April	United Kingdom		A bomb hidden in an unclaimed suitcase probably unloaded from a Libyan airliner explodes at London's Heathrow Airport, injuring 25.
	Libya		A number of British subjects in Libya arrested on trumped-up charges as hostages in order to pressure British Government during siege of Libyan People's Bureau in London.
	United Kingdom		British policewoman killed and 11 anti-Qadhafi demonstrators wounded by gunfire from London Libyan People's Bureau. After a siege, British authorities found weapons and spent shell casings in the vacated embassy.
March	United Kingdom		Four bombs explode in London and Manchester near homes of Libyan exiles or at businesses frequented by them. Over 25 people injured. Three other bombs defused. Nine Libyan suspects arrested.
	Sudan		One Libyan TU–22 bomber drops bombs on Omdurman, Sudan, site of a radio transmitter used by anti-Qadhafi oppositionists.
February	Libya		Following annual Libyan General People's Congress, the Libyan Revolutionary Committees announce that all Libyan exiles must return to Libya or face "the death penalty."
			Libyan authorities take no action while a mob burned the Jordanian Embassy in Tripoli.
	Congo		Chadian dissidents ready to negotiate with Government of Chad threatened in Brazzaville, Congo.
1983:
August	Burkina		Libya gave material support to coup in Burkina.
July	Chad		Libya invaded Chad for the second time. Occupation continues into 1985.
June	West Germany		Eight Libyan students in West Germany, all members of an anti-Qadhafi group, complain Libyan agents are harassing and threatening them.
February	Libya		Libyan General People's Congress warns all Libyans in exile to return home or face the "anger of the Libyan people."
1982	No incidents known
1981:
November	Sudan		Several bombs explode near government installations in Khartoum.

1980–85—Continued

October	Sudan		Planned assassination of visiting Chadian official, Hissein Habre, failed when those sent to conduct the operation surrendered.
	Egypt		Two bombs explode in luggage being unloaded from a plane coming from Libya via Malta.
August	Libya		Two Libyan SU–22s that fired at U.S. Navy F–14s over Gulf of Sidra shot down.
July	United States		Anti-Qadhafi Libyan student killed in Ogden, Utah.
June	Sudan		Bomb explodes in front of Chadian Embassy in Khartoum.
February	Italy		Libyan gunmen open fire on passengers arriving at Rome's airport on a flight from Algiers. Prominent anti-Qadhafi exile was the target.
1980:
November	United Kingdom		Anti-Qadhafi Libyan student brutally murdered in London.
			Two children of an anti-Qadhafi Libyan poisoned by eating peanuts containing thalium
October	Chad		Libyan forces occupied Chad. Qadhafi attempted to force a Libyan-Chadian union.
	The Gambia		Libyan subversion in The Gambia caused break in relations. Senegalese troops intervene under a mutual defense treaty.
June	Italy		Anti-Qadhafi exile wounded in Rome.
			Libyan exile killed in Milan within hours after expiration of a deadline set by Qadhafi for all Libyan exiles to return home.
May	Italy		Libyan exile shot at in Rome. The arrested Libyan gunman says he was sent by Libya "to kill an enemy of the people."
	Greece		Libyan exile killed in Athens. His throat was slit.
	Itlay		Libyan businessman found strangled to death in Rome.
	West Germany		Libyan exile gunned down in Bonn.
	Italy		Libyan exile killed in Rome by two gunshots to the head.
April	United Kingdom		Libyan lawyer shot and killed in London.
	Italy		Well-known Libyan businessman killed. The arrested assassin said the victim was an enemy of Col. Qadhafi.
	United Kingdom		Two gunmen kill an anti-Qadhafi Libyan journalist.
February	Libya		Tunisian and French Embassies in Tripoli sacked and burned by a mob while Libyan authorities took no action.
1979:
December	Libya		An estimated 2,000 Libyans set fire to the U.S. Embassy in Tripoli. The Libyan authorities did not respond to requests by the Embassy for protection.
November	West Germany		Two Libyans arrested with three suspected Palestinians for an unspecified terrorist operation.

QADHAFI, TERRORISM AND THE STINGER

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the previous sale of Stinger missiles to Saudi Arabia contained tight security measures that were conditional to the sale. We cannot guarantee that such safety measures can or even will be taken by the rebels fighting in Angola or Afghanistan. There is no need to give these freedom fighters the best that our military has to offer without full faith and knowledge that these missiles will be stored under the same conditions outlined for Saudi Arabia. I wish to reiterate what has been stated in the past: "Not a single airplane or airport in the civilized world will be safe if these weapons fall into the wrong hands."

Today, we are assaulted by a terrible war. Not a war of conventional means, however, but a subversive, insane war. A war that has no rules, no set battleground and no clear warriors. Terrorism, Mr. President, is a cancer—springing up in isolated incidences, killing without reason, direction, or justice.

Recently, the United States has been under attack by this cowardly siege. A TWA airplane, flying over the Mediterranean, had a hole ripped through it in which four innocent victims plummeted to their death. All of these victims were Americans. One was a 4-month-old child. This bomb was allegedly planted by a known international terrorist who boarded in Cairo and debarked in Athens. This terrorist is associated with the Arab Revolutionary Brigades, which is linked with the Abu Nidal group, the group responsible for the Rome and Vienna airport bombings last December.

Recently, a bomb exploded in a Berlin discotheque killing 21-year-old Army Sgt. Kenneth Terrance Ford and injuring 64 other GI's. There is no one in custody, but there is strong belief that Libyan leader Qadhafi is responsible for this brutal murder.

In addition to the terrorist threat, delivering the Stinger to Savimbi in Angola will escalate regional conflict and seriously impair United States efforts to negotiate a peaceful settlement between Angola, Namibia, and South Africa. This will also increase the tension between the United States Government and the Soviet Union in the South African region and globally.

Providing these Stinger missiles to Mr. Savimbi raises many questions in this Senator's mind. He has claimed to have shot down commercial/civilian airliners on four occasions. The State Department verifies that at least twice he has successfully shot down Diamond Mine Co. commercial aircraft carrying employees.

The U.S. Department of State, in its publication "Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1984," described Savimbi's UNITA by stating that ". . . with increasing frequency in 1984 UNITA's tactics have verged on terrorism." In 1983 a UNITA spokesman claimed to have shot down a plane which carried 126 civilians. Do we want UNITA to have Stingers?

We have been slow reacting to terrorism in the past. I support the President's action to strike in pre-emptive fashion against Libya even though it certainly is not pleasant to have to do something like this. I have been critical of President Reagan and past Presidents when they have talked tough and not acted. I am glad that in this instance specific and strong action has been taken. This was a high risk response, but I see no alternative when faced with such a radical leader as Mr. Qadhafi.

Mr. Qadhafi has virulently stated, "We have the right to fight America, and we have the right to export terrorism to them." From my training and experience as an attorney, statements such as this connected with the evidence in the Berlin disco and TWA bombing give the United States the right to use self-defense as justification for this action. The United Nations legally recognizes this right in article 51. Democracies have a right and duty to defend their citizens.

We also need to think long and hard about preventive actions before terrorists strike. The transfer of the Stinger missiles to rebel forces in Afghanistan and Angola is irresponsible and hasty. Having these weapons available in areas where we are unable to monitor them or ensure that regulations are adhered to appears to be inviting terrorist organizations to advance to a new level of terrorism. In 1985 we had 13 significant terrorist attacks involving U.S. citizens. It is difficult enough to combat these murders without the Stingers. The Stinger missile is the wild card in Colonel Qadhafi's deck of terrorist cards. In this volatile conflict with Libya we are virtually at war over terrorism. The "mad dog" of the Middle East does not need U.S. weapons to further escalate this battle.

THE NEED TO TAKE ACTION ON THE BUDGET

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I want to express my great concern about our failure to take up and act on the budget resolution for fiscal year 1987. The Budget Committee reported a budget resolution on March 24, and Members have had ample time to study it. Yet action on the measure has been delayed, jeopardizing the orderly consideration of appropriations legislation and increasing the risk that the entire budget process will fall apart leaving us with automatic Gramm-Rudman cuts as our only option in September. None of us wants that to happen.

We are writing $200 billion in hot checks a year, and everyone claims to be extremely concerned about the national debt. Yet, here we are on April 15, the official deadline in the budget act for the entire Congress to complete action on the budget for the next fiscal year, and the Senate hasn't even begun to debate the issue. The Senate Budget Committee approved a budget and sent it to the full Senate 22 days ago. I understand that the White House is opposed to this budget, but the President is unwilling to negotiate an alternative, so the budget is languishing while the President and Congress are at loggerheads. While we fiddle, the budget burns. We need to begin the debate on the budget now. These tremendous deficits may be the most critical issue we face as a nation, and we cannot afford to let political squabbling keep us from acting responsibly and in a timely fashion.

The budget bill reported from committee is not perfect, but it is a bipartisan, responsible measure. It certainly can stand to be improved, but it is a good starting place and there is no reason to delay further in bringing it up.

I urge the majority leader to turn to the consideration of the budget forthwith. The other issues we are debating pale in comparison to the enormity of our $2 trillion-plus national debt, and we need to get on with taking the tough measures necessary to deal with it.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

ELECTRIC CONSUMERS PROTECTION ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of S. 426, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 426) to amend the Federal Power Act to provide for more protection to electric consumers.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Montana is recognized to offer his amendments on wheeling of power.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, last Friday afternoon when we discussed this bill, I laid down the criteria for what I thought a worthwhile amendment would be. We discussed it for about an hour, I suspect. Out of that discussion came some interesting points.

Immediately afterward, I asked, as I said I would do on Friday, the Edison Electric Institute to look at the language of the proposed amendment and to give me a critique on it, their learned feelings and understandings of what effect it would have on current law.

They used some of their fine attorneys to provide that critique, which was given to me yesterday about noon. I very much appreciated that.

I believe while we have not satisfied by any means their objections to the proposed amendment, nevertheless there was an indication that there might be some method to satisfy their objections and still satisfy the public interest.

I suspect that anybody reading this RECORD would wonder first what it is all about to use that term "wheeling." I will attempt a definition of wheeling.

As I understand it, and I believe this to be correct, wheeling means the electrical transmission on lines owned by one utility of the electrical power generated by another utility. The utility company which owns the transmission lines is paid for the service by the second utility company.

Mr. President, I shall offer a limited and narrow amendment to pertinent sections of the Federal Power Act passed in 1935, as amended by the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act, called PURPA, amended in 1978.

The amendment will change existing law in circumstances when one utility company would be required to carry electrical power generated by another utility company over its transmission lines.

The amendment will be narrow and limited because its requirements will meet these objectives.

A. The utility company with the transmission lines must have room, that is, unused capacity, to carry additional electrical power.

B. The utility company would not use capacity on its transmission lines and cannot be forced to carry additional power if in doing so the circumstances would significantly burden the utility company's ratepayers. In other words, my amendment would not have a significant cost or harmful cost effect on the consumers of the utility company required to carry electrical power generated by the other utility company seeking the wheeling contract.

Third, the need by the applicant utility company asking for the wheeling contract must be able to be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission that the wheeling contract is in the public interest.

Finally, the wheeling contract must not violate State law.

This issue, wheeling, is an old, old issue which has never been resolved in Federal law. The Federal Power Act passed in 1935 did not solve the wheeling issue. Section 211 and section 212 of that 1935 act were amended by the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act, PURPA, enacted in 1978, and it was proclaimed by some in Congress and in the electric utility industry that those amendments would resolve the issue.

That simply did not prove to be the case.

Although many stated that their hopes were at that time, in 1978, that those amendments would put the wheeling issue to bed, it turned out to be a very short slumber.

Federal courts soon ruled that FERC had little or no additional authority to require wheeling contracts. Nevertheless, it is fair to say, and it should be said, that there have been dramatic increases in voluntary contracts for wheeling between utility companies during the past decade. These voluntarily negotiated wheeling service agreements are filed at FERC and more than 1,380 such agreements have been entered into since 1976. That is real progress.

It is apparent that wheeling contracts are in the public interest, and that it is good business practice for the utility company who gets paid for transmitting the electrical power of the second utility company that it can have its electrical power carried on unused capacity of an existing transmission line.

The public interest is further served by cutting down on the number of transmission lines that must be built to carry the electrical power to where it is needed.

For all the citizens who have been involved in the debate that surrounds the location and construction of new transmission lines which blight the environment and the esthetics, it is obvious that if construction of new transmission lines can be avoided, there is a huge sigh of relief from all sides. I believe that a significant number of American citizens have been involved in such arguments—where will a new transmission line be built, or will it be built? If so, how do you mitigate the environmental damage and, besides mitigating those potential damages, how do you satisfy the esthetics? Those are tough debates and hard, crushing conflicts.

To avoid building the new transmission lines not only makes good economic sense, it makes good sense for holding down the blood pressure acquired in the rousements that are caused by the thought of inflicting another huge transmission line across somebody's land, across somebody's favorite glorious area. So from all sides, if you can avoid building new transmission lines, it is always good to do so.

Mr. President, the Western Systems Coordinating Council, which includes a large part of our Big Sky Country of Montana, has worked diligently and consistently to make sure that where wheeling contracts are practical and efficient and needed, all sides get together to agree on them, get them in operation. It is that type philosophy upon which I shall offer an amendment to this bill to plant in bedrock that wheeling contracts are in the public interest and should be entered into if the following conditions are met—and I repeat them once more.

First, the utility company with the transmission lines must have room—that is, unused capacity—to carry additional electrical power.

Second, the utility company with unused capacity on its transmission lines cannot be forced to carry additional power if, in doing so, the circumstances would significantly burden the utility company's ratepayers.

In other words, my amendment would not have a significant cost or harmful cost effect on the consumers of a utility company required to carry electrical power generated by the other utility companies seeking the wheeling contract.

C. The need by the applicant utility company asking for the wheeling contract must be able to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission that the wheeling contract is in the public interest.

D. The wheeling contract must not violate State law.

That is a narrow amendment, one that I believe should be adopted. There is need for the amendment because there are documented cases where these conditions have been met and, for at least one or more reasons involving competition or greed for profit, wheeling contracts have not been voluntarily negotiated.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission under existing law in the Federal court case decision that I previously referred to have been restrained or prevented from issuing wheeling orders. Not one wheeling order has been issued by FERC since the 1978 amendments and the court case came down. To those who want wheeling and that is generally small utilities, rural electrics, and utility districts, they point out that there are instances when it is impossible to get wheeling contracts. To those companies who do not want to be bothered except by voluntary wheeling contracts that they negotiate, which is, generally speaking, large utility companies with large transmission lines, they point out that only three applications have been made to FERC for wheeling contract orders since 1978. For that reason, they say any change in the law is unnecessary. Both sides have a point but the strength of the argument of each side should be weighted to determine what is in the public interest. There is need, in my judgment, for enactment of an amendment for wheeling contracts. When the criteria of A, B, C, and D, which I have already detailed twice, are met, and FERC should make that wheeling contract required to be entered into.

It is wise that PURPA has required consumer protection against the provisions of inefficient costly transmission services or those services which would adversely affect system reliability. That is what PURPA does. I would not offer an amendment that would discontinue that. I would not offer an amendment that would alter it. There is, however, compelling evidence that the present voluntary approach has not always worked and that some proposals that have been documented have not resulted in an FERC order for wheeling when it should have. Some economic and efficient wheeling services have not been able to be agreed to under contract because FERC was prevented by law from requiring it. Congress has pursued overall a restrained course in requiring mandatory actions even where it was necessary in the public interest. There need be no further debate on whether or not FERC lacks authority to require wheeling contracts. It does not. In some narrow instances where a wheeling contract would be good for the public, it is in those cases that I shall offer an amendment seeking to correct the inadequacy of present law. That is only common sense, it is only good business. It is a furtherance of competition in the marketplace.

Mr. President, from the debate or the discussion on Friday and from my visits with Edison Electric Institute attorneys, it is obvious that an argument is made that this is a very detailed subject, very difficult to understand, very difficult to modify, very difficult to balance all factors. I will not argue with that. I will not argue with that at all. That is why I shall offer an amendment that is very narrow and limited so they understand it, so everybody understands it, even Congress; so we can understand.

In furtherance of that line of discourse, it will be said, well, it is too big a thing to take on here, on the floor. Mr. President, this is the floor where we decide issues in the public interest. I do not want to burden anybody with too much detail and too much confusion; so I shall offer a very narrow, limited amendment that requires in some instances that I have outlined—A, B, C, and D—twice put in the RECORD, twice enunciated here certain things. Those points can be understood by everybody.

I know FERC is on a big study. Indeed, they ought to be on a big study. They want to look at this whole issue of wheeling. But I do not want them to bog themselves down in the eternal study.

But the more they learn about wheeling, I guess the better protected the public will be. But FERC cannot do anything about it. Only Congress can. They will talk about there is not time to do this; we will hold hearings next year; the House wants to hold hearings next year.

Well, there is time to do it. Where is the report on this bill? Do we have a report on this bill? I hope so.

Here it is. I have it in my hand right now. October 22, ordered to be printed—October 22, 1985. That is when it was printed. I have some minority remarks in here. Those additional views state that we ought to consider a wheeling contract. Let us see, that is the first year of this Congress. We had this bill up in a rather timely fashion, the first year in this Congress. This is April, the second year of this Congress.

Now, I want to see this bill pass. I think this bill is in the public interest. I think it is probably even necessary, beyond that. I do not know what would happen to some of these dams if this bill did not pass this year. So do not bother to tell me what will happen. I want to see it pass. I want to see this bill passed by the Senate and House and signed and sealed by the President before the Congress adjourns this year, which, as I understand it, will be the first week of October. Having said that and with all due deference to everybody's view, I believe there is time, plenty of it, to adopt an amendment of the type that I shall offer, this narrow, limited clarification of authority. It is new authority to FERC——

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. MELCHER. Not at this point, thank you—clarification to FERC that they do have the authority. We could adopt such an amendment when we arrive at what is the best language. But to get to that best language let me point out a couple of things. In my book, the Edison Electric Institute serves a very fine purpose. They can coordinate, bring to the public and to Congress the views of private utility companies. With me they have good credibility. And so I cast no aspersions on their motives, but to continue this delay, which existed, I suspect—I was just a kid in 1935, but I suspect there was plenty of discussion before the Federal Power Act was enacted by Congress in 1935 that said why can we not do something about wheeling. The 1935 Federal Power Act did not resolve it. In 1978—and I was here then and was no longer a kid—I remember somewhat the debate on how these PURPA amendments, which were enacted, were going to resolve wheeling issues. And so there is some merit to that argument if you just measure it on voluntary agreements. There is real merit to that argument if you just measure it on voluntary agreements, but there is not too much merit to the argument which says that the amendments to PURPA brought that on.

I do not think those amendments did much to bring that on. What brought it on was just good common sense and good business practices and people did what ought to be done, make voluntary agreements where it was good for both sides and assuredly in the public interest. But there is no doubt that in some instances wheeling contracts that are in the public interest and should have been entered into were not on a voluntary basis, and there is no way of getting FERC to force that because FERC does not have the authority. Congress has not granted it the authority.

Now, why now? Why now? Why not next year, the year after, 10 years later? Why not later rather than now? Well, I suspect I will have to give my answer from my own viewpoint, and I shall do so. There is not a whole lot of desire by Members of the Senate—and I will not speak for the House on this, but I do not think there is much desire by the Senate to get balled up in a long argument over a narrow amendment on this subject of wheeling.

I can just imagine next year. What bill would we have? Would we get a bill out of committee? I believe we would.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. MELCHER. Thank you, not right now. I believe we would. But what would it have in it? I do not know. Would it be passed? Well, I do not think it would be passed unless Edison Electric Institute wanted it to be passed.

I do not think it would be passed unless they liked every jot and tittle. And I do not say that out of any disrespect. They represent an awful lot of people across this country who generate electricity, which is then provided to consumers. But I believe this is the right time to consider it because I believe they want this bill passed this year, just like I do. Just like I do, they want it passed. Now, there is some hydrorelicensing that affects Montana and I want it enacted, I want the bill enacted. I think this is the right time to address a narrow amendment on wheeling because we are going to pass the bill. I do not know whether that will happen next year. I think this is the right time to address the issue.

Now I will be delighted to yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes. I was simply going to ask the distinguished Senator from Montana if he has an amendment written up and if we will get to see it?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes, I respond to my friend from Louisiana. It is the same amendment that was available and was examined by the staff for the past, I do not know, week or so.

As the discourse went last week, last Friday, that amendment was not right, but we make it right. We still have not properly ascertained what is wrong with it.

While I have had a critique supplied by very learned counsel—and I thank him for it, because it is a good critique—I have not had any suggestions. We seem to have a common interest. We talk about public interest. We talk about why voluntary agreements are good, and so forth. But we really have not gotten down to the nitty-gritty of "If you don't like it the way it is, what do you like, in order to take the needed, narrow, limited step forward to correct the defects?" It does not do us much good to say there are no defects in the present law.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not arguing with the Senator. I simply want to know whether he is going to offer the amendment from last week, and when.

Mr. MELCHER. I will offer an amendment of the nature that I described on Friday, that I have described today, and of a nature that the learned Senator, my great friend from Louisiana, has looked at over the past several days. But I hardly think it is wise to just have an exercise in futility. When it is offered and if it is not acceptable, it will be tabled.

So let us do the obvious. Let us get together on an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I think the Senator knows that the Senator from Louisiana—and I think the distinguished chairman, the Senator from Idaho—have been telling the Senator for 5 months that we do not like wheeling more than PURPA has provided for. In the PURPA amendment, we went into great detail, after hearings to confect an amendment which is now the law, which is working, which is working very well. I do not think it comes as any surprise to the Senator to know that we oppose his amendment and why we oppose it.

I guess what I am asking is, Is the Senator really going to propose an amendment, or is this an exercise in filibuster?

Mr. MELCHER. It is much to take that dismal attitude, that a filibuster might be necessary.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. I will yield to the Senator from Idaho as soon as I respond to the Senator from Louisiana.

I want a narrow amendment to move forward in the public interest on wheeling. We can take the attitude that it is not necessary, that everything is fine. That attitude might easily prevail on a vote. I suspect that it would prevail overwhelmingly, that attitude expressed by the Senator from Louisiana. But I have consciously and sincerely expressed my intention.

I believe we can make some headway any time we want to. But we have to determine whether or not we want to try. Until we do that, I suspect that we are not going to make any progress at all, except discourse.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I submit that last week's amendment was not narrow in scope at all. It was very broad, and the objections to it are very specific. We have cooperated with the Senator not only in giving our specific objections, but also, I think he has been furnished with a paper from me which further specifically details what those objections are.

Now there is a new amendment which is described as narrow.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I cannot deal further at this point. The amendment was very narrow. To say that it is not very narrow is merely to compound confusion that exists over what wheeling is to begin with.

I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUDMAN). The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I think I sense what the Senator is trying to do, and I will not cast it in the worst light. I will try to put it in the most favorable light I can, as I understand it, and make a comment to the Senator, to see if it will yield any progress on the legislation.

First of all, the Senator points back to the fact that some months ago, this bill was reported, and the Senator wrote minority views that indicated he thought something should be done about wheeling. So the committee certainly was on notice, as was the Senate on notice, that the Senator from Montana has something in mind that he would like to accomplish. In fairness to the Senator, we would have to say that we still do not know what that is, exactly.

The Senator suggests that he offered an amendment last week and that he will offer an amendment similar to that one, which has similar objectives as outlined today, but he does not have that amendment drafted, and that maybe if we talk, we will find a solution, which seems to me that, having been put on notice some months ago and having been put on notice last Friday, in the next 20 minutes we will be able to come to an agreement.

I say that because I think that is what the Senator is groping toward, if I understand what he is saying.

I suggest to the Senator that while he thinks this is a simple subject, there are many other people—and this Senator is one—who think it is a very complex subject.

Frankly, I did not know, at the time this matter was before the committee and the Senator first raised this question, nor do I know any more since last Friday, after having seen for the first time an amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Montana, what the objectives are or what the reason might be, nor do I see a solution any more clearly today than 5 months ago, when I do not even know what the problem is.

Mr. MELCHER. I will help the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. May I go a step further and make a suggestion?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes.

Mr. McCLURE. I do this in absolute sincerity and believing the Senator from Montana is operating in good faith, and I assure him that I am, too.

The background of the problem, if there be one, the question of whether PURPA has worked, or the provisions in PURPA have worked, the question of whether there are or are not problems, and the question of how to solve those problems, if they can be identified and do exist, is something we are not going to find in 20 minutes. In my judgment, we are not going to be able to develop either the background or the comments or the information that is necessary to reach the objectives that the Senator from Montana apparently has in mind—although I do not know what they are—in the time that is allotted for the consideration of this bill.

So, while the Senator can say that we have lots of time, I think it is more complex today, as a matter of fact, I say in candor to my friend from Montana. I think it is the kind of thing we ought to develop through the hearings process on a specific proposal, so that everybody can look at it and analyze it, and talk about it and think about it, and comment upon it, and offer amendments to it.

I sincerely offer to the Senator from Montana the opportunity for that kind of process within the committee hearing structure, but I do not believe we can do it on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend from Idaho and my friend from Louisiana.

First of all, I do not think we can do it on the floor of the Senate, either.

Second, I am going to respond again. Not having seen the language, the Senator had every right to see it, because the staffs had it for quite a few days. They could have had it even earlier.

As to this shuffle around of responsibility for looking at amendments, it is indeed sometimes a very hard task to pin down when language of a proposed amendment was available, and I do not quarrel with that. But the language was submitted to staffs on each side. and it was asked. "What do you think of it?"

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield on just that point?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes.

Mr. McCLURE. To the best of my knowledge, the staff of the Energy Committee first saw the language on Friday morning of last week and I have consulted with the minority staff as well as the majority staff. None of us are aware of any such language being available to anyone prior to Friday morning of last week.

Mr. MELCHER. My staff just tells me he thinks you both had access to it. On Wednesday it was shoved at you, your staff. The staff over there shakes his head. Staff can argue with staff.

But the fact is the amendment is not that complicated and the fact is that while it should not be written here on the floor, there has to be willingness to want to have an amendment of this nature before we are going to have a good one.

Mr. McCLURE. Yes.

Mr. MELCHER. We are just going to say we will wait until some other time we can go on. I would have preferred, as a matter of fact, that the amendment would have been drafted and worked out in committee. I guess we could be truthful about this and honest about this and say "by the staff for our review." That was not done. Staff was not directed to do it.

It was looked at and thought why should a hydrorelicensing bill get into all of that? I am not even going to quarrel over that argument.

I think it might be a conclusion that under different circumstances if I were the chairman or the ranking minority member, such as my friend from Idaho and my friend from Louisiana, I might make the same decision.

But this is a difficult issue. This issue has been round and round and round. To the extent that it has been resolved, it has been resolved simply because it is good business practice to resolve it.

Now if my language is not good language, what is wrong with getting better language that does something? Why do I not hear from either this side or that side?

Mr. McCLURE. Introduce an amendment.

Mr. MELCHER. Why do I not hear from either side that there are instances when people wanting wheeling contracts could not simply get them and there are instances when the merits for awarding the contracts seemed to be justified.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. I asked a question. I will be delighted if the Senator would answer it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is very simple because the reason is that it is to the detriment of the customers of the company being asked to wheel to take away its customer base, in effect to pirate its customer base for someone else's benefit.

There is a limited ability to require wheeling as provided in PURPA and we think it is a proper requirement which has encouraged voluntary wheeling in ever-increasing amounts, but it is not in the interest of the customers to require further change, it is not in the interest of——

Mr. MELCHER. Now, would the Senator permit me?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes.

Mr. MELCHER. I would not want what you just described, a utility company to be forced to wheel to lose some of its customers.

Now might I ask my friend is that not a beginning point? That is one of my ABC's. Is that not a beginning point between us?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think it is but I think the Senator's amendment from last week would allow what we call pirating.

Mr. MELCHER. There is a difference of opinion on that, see, between counsel. One say, oh, no, it does not. Then you say it does and other learned counsel say it does. So there is a difference of opinion on that point. I would not offer anything that allows pirating.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. So that is a beginning point of agreement between us.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator will yield, his amendment provides that if you strike subsection (c)(1) of section 211 of the Power Act, and that is that provision which specifically prevents pirating, that is to say that is the amendment that is the part of PURPA that says "No such order may be issued under subsection (a) unless the Commission determines that such order would reasonably preserve existing competitive relationships."

That is to prevent pirating specifically.

Mr. MELCHER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. And I think the Senator's amendment would have done that.

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator will agree that between us we reached an agreement on a very basic point, as one of my A, B, C, and D's, that I set the amendment aside. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator says he did not want to do that, we can——

Mr. MELCHER. I do not want to offer anything that causes pirating—I think we understand that—the same way it causes a utility company offering or required to wheel I would cause them to lose part of their customers. I do not want that. We are in agreement on that.

You see, Mr. President, we might as well take each other seriously and have respect for each other's sincerity, because I think we are coming from the same point. The question is when learned counsel of one side says, "No, no, that language doesn't mean that," and learned counsel on the other side says, "Yes, it does mean that," that is exactly what would happen. All I ever said, to me we are seeking the same result; we better get language that we agree on.

I say that not as a learned counsel, just as a learned horse doctor and sometimes that helps. You can get in the middle between learned counsel and say let us get language that does exactly what we want it to do, to instruct FERC to carry it out.

I am delighted to yield to my friend from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, dealing with a sick horse is a little different. The horse cannot comment and cannot talk about it.

Mr. MELCHER. That is what makes it real tough sometimes.

Mr. McCLURE. It makes it easier in some respects because you do not have to ask the horse, do not have to get his consent and have to persuade what you do is right for him. You do it. He gets better or dies.

Mr. MELCHER. The horse always want good results, I remind my friend, let alone the owners of the horse.

Mr. McCLURE. I am sure he does.

Let me say to my friend from Montana that I am really not certain that I know how to help him draft an amendment because whether it be 5 months ago or last Friday, I still do not know what the problem is we seek to address when, as a matter of fact, the PURPA amendments tried to focus upon encouraging voluntary arrangements and in the decade past, we have had nearly 1,400 wheeling agreements entered into that have been with FERC. During the same period of time there have been five applications filed for the use of the authority of FERC to order wheeling under the provisions of the PURPA. One of those was denied, was denied under the provisions of the section the Senator seeks to strike. Two are still pending and two were settled or withdrawn.

If that is true, and I think those facts are irrefutable, I think that at least those facts are right. There may be some other facts of which I am not aware but at least those facts are right. If they are, then what is the problem, what is it we are trying to cure? Where is the wheeling that ought to take place that is not taking place? Where are the opportunities for mandatory wheeling which are available under PURPA? And FERC does have the authority to order wheeling under the test established under PURPA. Under criteria established in current law, FERC can order wheeling to take place.

They have only in one instance in the last 10 years denied such a request when made. What is the problem?

And that I guess is the dilemma of the Senator from Idaho, who has been trying to help the Senator from Montana draft an amendment to do what? To cure what ill? If indeed there are some problems that need to be addressed, we could develop that in a suitable hearing record and then start in pinpointing what there is in current law that is inadequate to meet the problems that are then identified.

But the Senator from Idaho does not know what the problem is and certainly cannot prescribe a cure for an illness which is not apparent.

Again, it seems to me that if indeed the Senator from Montana knows of such instances and problems, and others can do so, and they will present that to us in a hearing record, then we will start in honing in on why PURPA is not working, why the existing Federal power agency provisions are not adequate to meet the tests.

It seems to me, as I listen to the Senator from Montana, that the wheeling he desires to be done and believes should be done are all possible under existing law; that FERC has the authority under existing law to entertain an application and to make an order precisely as the Senator from Montana outlined as his desire that they should do, and the record does not indicate they have not followed nor applied the law.

So I start out from the beginning in a complete quandary as to how I can help the Senator from Montana because I do not know what he wants to do.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend from Idaho. I know he is in a quandary on what the best language is. I can accept he does not understand for sure that there is a real problem out there.

The PURPA amendments were adopted in 1978. I believe the court case I referred to was of that same year, if I am not mistaken. And there was not any way that FERC could require wheeling unless it was voluntary.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes.

Mr. McCLURE. I do not remember the Senator having identified a specific case.

Mr. MELCHER. No.

Mr. McCLURE. To what case is the Senator referring?

Mr. MELCHER. I am not sure.

Mr. McCLURE. Neither am I.

Mr. MELCHER. But we will supply it to you. The Senator well knows that the PURPA amendments were tested. The Senator well knows—and I stated a couple of times in my remarks—that the ruling of the court on the interpretation of those PURPA amendments says FERC simply does not have that authority.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield? There is a case which I think would be instructive, and that is Southern Power Administration versus Kentucky Utilities Co., which is a 1984 proceeding before the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. And that one is the first case in which the Commission analyzed section 211 of PURPA with respect to wheeling to wholesale customers. And in SEPA, the Commission denied the application by the Southeastern Power Administration for an order requiring Kentucky Utilities, Inc., to wheel power generated by SEPA to eight of KU's municipal customers.

But that is just looking at the question of hiring and wheeling. That is a loaded term. The opportunity of different utilities to service customers within a service territory of another utility. That was pursuant to section 211 of PURPA.

PURPA has worked primarily because the whole theory of PURPA was set up on criteria that everyone could know, that are very clear and precise and well understood by people on both sides so everyone knows what the ground rules are and then seek voluntary arrangements. And that has worked. It has worked almost 1,400 times. It has failed to work five times, and two of those five were settled or withdrawn. It has only failed to work in one place where the Commission denied the application and in two cases they are still pending.

Now, that does not indicate to me that there is a problem that we need to fix. It indicates to me the law is working the way we intended it to work.

I am quite willing to explore the deficiencies of a statute or changes that might make it work better, but I need some evidence that it is not working and then, secondarily, what needs to be done to make it work better, neither of which has been presented to us either in committee or in debate on the floor.

Mr. MELCHER. First of all, Mr. President, I thank my friend from Idaho for his comments and his reference to the Southern Power Administration versus Kentucky Utilities Co. case before FERC, 61-206-983. I thank him for that and for his explanation.

But let me respond to this one point. In stating that—and it has been stated many times by the utility companies, at least privately owned utility companies—that only three applications for wheeling under sections 211 and section 212 had been made to FERC and that is good—now, that is a good indication that those desiring that, when services are able to obtain them, that that is through voluntary methods, and they have, by and large, obtained them through voluntary agreement.

But the fact is there are so many restrictions on the exercise of wheeling support granted FERC in sections 211 and 212 that the probability of prevailing before FERC is almost zero; that is, zilch.

That means there is not a chance of the proverbial snowball in Hades. Now, that is not how sections 211 and 212 are described ordinarily by those who drafted them, I suspect, in 1935, and those of us, including the two distinguished colleagues that I have on my left and my right, the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Idaho. Senator McCLURE assisted in drafting amendments to PURPA in 1978 to stress these very sections; that is, not to give any opportunity to approach FERC and say, "We want a wheeling contract, but this big meany over here won't give it to us." That is what those amendments were supposed to do.

If a little outfit comes in and says, "We want a wheeling contract with this monstrosity here. They won't give it to us. FERC, what do you think about it? Why can't you give us some guidelines and require it?" That is what that is supposed to do, but it does not do it.

Nobody applies because if you cannot get a voluntary agreement, there is no use applying to FERC. The cases well document that they are not going to get it anyway by application.

The issue of congressional preemption in the area of interstate transmission of electricity has already been resolved. The Federal Government has already preempted the States in this area. There would be no additional preemption to States' rights, under an amendment that I have described and will offer. When we find the narrow path, I will offer it. At the present time, however, there is no forum. FERC just cannot be the forum. They cannot deal effectively and expeditiously with refusals.

When somebody says, "Well, we want to negotiate with this other company way over here, this big one, but they won't negotiate a wheeling contract with us. We are asking you, FERC," and FERC cannot do it.

So there is no forum for these people seeking a wheeling contract that they believe is in the public interest and can meet all the criteria in the law. There is just no forum to go to.

You know, State commissions cannot deal with this and this is interstate. We want something uniform, not set it aside as a State commission's authority, but we do want something uniform on interstate. So it has to be under the Federal Power Act. It has to be decided by FERC. Only FERC can do it.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. MELCHER. The reason FERC cannot do it is, there are deficiencies in sections 211 and 212. If you do not like my approach to it, let us correct the deficiencies anyway. You give me the approach. I will go your way.

Yes. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. McCLURE. First of all, I do not know what the deficiencies are that the Senator has in mind. I have not been able to identify them. I look at section 211. It says:

The Commission may issue such an order if it finds that such an order is in the public interest, would conserve a significant amount of energy, would significantly promote the efficient use of facilities and resources, or would improve the reliability of any electric utility systems to which the order applies and meets the requirements of section 212.

That is section 211 of the Federal Power Act as amended by PURPA.

It goes on in the remainder of section 211 to say that the Commission may issue an order after a hearing, and after a notice, if they find the electric utility that has been asked to provide wheeling is either constructively or specifically denied access to wheeling, and if such order meets the requirements of section 212.

If you look further under section 211, it says the order cannot be issued unless the Commission determines that the order would reasonably preserve existing competitive relationships. That is the section the Senator seeks to remove. Subsection (a)(2) says in effect that the order may be issued which requires the electric utility subject to the order to transmit during any period an amount of electric energy which replaces any amount of electric energy required to be provided, and so on, during the contract period currently provided to the applicant by a utility subject to the order pursuant to a rate schedule on file.

It says further in subsection 3 of subsection C, no order may be issued under the authority of subsection A or B which is inconsistent with any State law which governs the retail marketing areas of electric utilities. No order may be issued under subsection 4 under subsection A or B which provides for the transmission of electric energy directly to an ultimate consumer. That is the antipirating provision.

If you flip the page to section 212, the order cannot be issued unless the Commission has determined that the order is not likely to result in a reasonably ascertainable uncompensated economic loss; subsection 2 refers to an undue burden; subsection 3, the impairment of the reliability of the utility, and will not impair the ability of the electric utility affected by the order to render adequate service to the customer.

I do not know what is wrong with that. I do not see where it has failed. I have not been presented any information by the Senator from Montana on any specific cases where it has not worked.

I guess again the only bottom line I can reach in this conversation is I do not know what the problem is. I cannot define the fix. And there is not unlimited time. We last week debated this issue some. We by unanimous consent fixed a period from 10 o'clock this morning until 12 o'clock this noon to deal with these amendments. We still do not have an amendment offered. We will go into recess at 12 o'clock and return at 2 o'clock to hear the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Colorado. At 3 o'clock we will vote on that amendment.

I say to the Senator from Montana that if we do not get this bill resolved within that timeframe we are on notice from the leadership that we are going to turn to other matters like the budget resolution, and that once we get on the budget resolution we will be talking about it for awhile.

That is a contentious issue with a great variety of issues which are going to occupy this Senate.

I think the Senator from Montana knows, as does the Senator from Idaho, that there are relatively few legislative days remaining in this session this year to deal with the myriad of subjects which will come before the floor of the Senate. If we have not completed this bill today it is unlikely that I can give any assurances to anyone that we will have a predictable opportunity to get back on the bill and complete it at some undefined later time.

So I plead with the Senator from Montana to indeed give us the opportunity to hear from the Senator from Montana and any other interested witness in the form of a committee hearing to identify what the problem is, and to start trying to identify answers.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I very much agree with the frustration and concerns expressed by my friend from Idaho. He is absolutely correct. We can talk about a proposal forever and never get to any resolution. I mean for ever in a very lucid time frame because forever is a couple days around here right now because there are only limited days.

I am not advocating that this is the place to resolve this issue. But I do strongly urge and encourage my friend on the committee, my colleagues in the entire Senate, to address this issue, and take some concern in it because there will be an amendment offered. I will ask for support on it.

But I am not going to offer an amendment that is not going to get any support, and to which a tabling motion is going to be made. We are going to have almost an unnecessary recorded vote because it will be overwhelming against it. I am going to offer an amendment on the basis of what is practical and needed, and necessary at this time.

That does not mean a filibuster. It would be unwise for us to waste our time doing that. What would be wise is to recognize that indeed the issue can be resolved. This is a good place to resolve it, and we can agree on language.

Twenty years ago the Federal Power Commissioner, Charlie Ross, said in the hearing before the Senate Commerce Committee that:

It is the parties who control the transmission, the arteries of the industry, that control the destiny of the millions of rate payers of this Nation.

I think we have made a great deal of headway since that time. He was talking directly about wheeling. I think there has been a great deal of headway since that time.

Let me give some examples to both my friends, the chairman, the Senator from Idaho, and the ranking member, the Senator from Louisiana, whom I do not see at the moment. But I know he is within listening distance.

Let me give you some examples. Utility companies do refuse to wheel on occasion despite those almost, as my friend from Idaho says, 1,400. I know that figure is accurate. It must be 1,400, maybe even above 1,400. It has been issued on a voluntary basis since 1976. That is good. That is real good. But there are utility companies that refuse to wheel.

Let me continue about these examples. In California, transmission service from Pacific Gas & Electric Co. has been obtained only through protracted negotiations and by accepting unreasonable terms and conditions. The Northern California Power Agency began negotiation with PG&E for wheeling before 1970 without result. In 1976 as a condition for obtaining the license for the Diablo Canyon nuclear project, PG&E was required by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to provide wheeling when capacity is available. In 1983—13 years after negotiations started, 7 years after the licensing condition was imposed—the FERC approved a "negotiated" wheeling agreement whose terms are highly favorable to PG&E.

Throughout these negotiations, PG&E refused to submit controversies to FERC. Among other things, PG&E demanded that any transmission service change be filed with, and approved by FERC, thus creating a 3-month delay in each instance. Consequently, NCPA can make no day-to-day "opportunity" changes in operations that could save the consumers money.

Another example, like PG&E, Southern California Edison has actively sought to prevent California consumer-owned utilities from gaining access to independent power supplies.

Anaheim, California, is an island within Edison's service area; without transmission, it must remain wholly captive. Anaheim has tried to buy energy from the Pacific Northwest, but Edison refused to allow transmission. Anaheim was barred from participating in the Navajo coal-fired powerplant in Arizona when it could not secure transmission through Edison's facilities. Anaheim asked Nevada Power Company, manager of a proposed coal plant, the Henry Allen-Warner Valley Project, for participation in that project; Nevada referred Anaheim to Edison, a project co-owner, which replied that participation requests should be addressed to Nevada; Anaheim wrote to all participants—without result. In 1979, Anaheim asked Edison for firm transmission for power from the Cholla Generating Project of Arizona Public Service Company. Edison demanded a contractual condition which made the purchase impossible—and then bought the Cholla power for itself.

In Florida, Wisconsin, and Kansas, municipal utilities must pay "pancaked" double or multiple wheeling rates to two or more utilities—in contrast to New England's joint rates for transmission across the lines of multiple utilities. Kansas municipals anticipate an allocation of economical power from the Western Area Power Administration in 1985—but it must be wheeled through up to four utilities, each piling on charges with little relationship to cost. The result—WAPA waterpower may be unaffordable. In Wisconsin, Northern States Power demands that Wisconsin Public Power, Inc. (WPPI) pay double charges to NSP Wisconsin and NSP Minnesota—even though the two companies are fully integrated, both financially and operationally. WPPI and its ratepayers have thus foregone economical power supply arrangements available both from Manitoba Hydro and Minnesota Power Company.

In Florida, municipal systems dependent on transmission by Florida Power and Light are unable to take advantage of economical short-term transactions with other utilities. FP&L refuses to file a transmission tariff and will deal only on a contract-by-contract basis. By the time negotiation can be concluded, opportunities have passed.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. I will in just a moment.

Mr. President, my amendment would not take care of all these cases. I cannot offer an amendment that is narrow and limited to deal with the A, B, C, and D criteria that I set out. I am not saying that all of these purported inequities would be corrected by my amendment. But I can offer an amendment that, in a narrow way, will open the door for those limited cases that FERC ought to consider and be the proper arena and forum to resolve quickly. That is what I shall offer.

I yield.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator for yielding. I thank the Senator for sharing with us specific kinds of cases with which he is concerned and to which he has now referred. I think that begins to allow us to lift the veil on the problem that the Senator is concerned about and may seek to deal with.

These cases, almost uniformly, are dealing with the anticompetitive antitrust aspects of utility operations and not wheeling. The Senator is not really dealing with a wheeling problem, per se. It is not something that is being done within FERC; it is something that is primarily within the purview of the courts under the antitrust law. That might yield the conclusion in the Senator's mind that FERC is powerless to deal with them because in an antitrust matter, not a wheeling matter, it is dealt with in the courts under an entirely different body of law and it is inappropriate for us to try to solve or deal with that area of the competitive situation between utilities in the guise of talking about wheeling.

It is an inappropriate attempt to remedy some of the problems that deal in an entirely different area of the law.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend from Idaho for his observation, but I do not want the record to show that I agree with his observation. Indeed, wheeling in involved in each one of these observations that I briefly described.

The point really is this: Since you cannot get anywhere at FERC on having arrangements to quickly resolve wheeling orders, and, that lacking, no proper forum to go to, there are not many wheeling arrangements that are made on occasion when the utility company that does have the capacity does not want to transmit that power for another utility company because it would be advantageous of what they view as advantageous to a competitor, not hurting then but advantageous to a competitor in those instances they seek to correct.

I yield the floor.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12 noon having arrived, the Senate will now stand in recess until 2 p.m.

Whereupon, at 12 noon, the Senate recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. HELMS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] is recognized to offer his substitute, on which there will be 1 hour of debate equally divided.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] is recognized.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I understand that the Nation has undergone some fairly dramatic events in the last 2 hours. I am just notified in the last 2 minutes the President of the United States is now going to talk on television to the American people about the Middle East situation. Is that correct? Does the Senator from Idaho know?

Mr. McCLURE. I cannot add any information at all. I have been in a meeting, and I do not know what we might have been told.

Mr. HART. The Senator from Colorado is wondering, since this is an issue, an item of concern to all of us, whether some temporary quorum call might be entered for 5 or 10 minutes without eating into the time set aside for the amendment.

Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, we have reserved 1 hour of time for this debate on the substitute offered by the Senator from Colorado. I do not think there would be any problem in us absorbing 15 minutes out of that time if the remainder is equally divided or even if we just take it out of our time. I think we can do that.

Mr. HART. Mine is a serious amendment and I cut way back to 1 hour on a serious amendment. I would like that time not to come out but I would like 15 minutes so I can find out what is going on.

Mr. McCLURE. I am in no position to offer to the Senator any other arrangement than that without consulting with the leadership on this side of the aisle.

Mr. HART. Would the Senator from Idaho agree to a unanimous-consent request to move the whole process forward 15 minutes?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, without coming to that, let us see if we cannot arrange that. We will just have a quorum call and see if we cannot arrange that in the meantime.

Mr. HART. I cannot do that because I do not want to lose half an hour.

Mr. McCLURE. I cannot do better than that at the moment.

Mr. HART. I think 15 minutes would probably be eaten up by trying to find out whether we can get 15 minutes.

Mr. McCLURE. If the Senator will yield, I do not have the authority to make this arrangement but let me take a chance in spite of the fact that I do not have the authority to make the arrangement. I do not see the distinguished minority leader on the floor and he ordinarily would demand that for a matter of this kind he should be consulted. If we can just postpone the whole thing, we will start at 2:15 and end at 3:15.

Mr. HART. That was the request, but I understand even that has become academic because the President's statement is over, whatever it is he said, so I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator from Colorado. I wish we could have moved more rapidly.

AMENDMENT NO. 1783

(Purpose: To recapture for the public benefit, including the enhancement of environmental values, hydroelectric sites, upon the expiration of licenses therefor, issued to for-profit corporations under the Federal Power Act, and for other purposes)

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMM). The clerk will report the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART], proposes an amendment numbered 1783.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted, insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the Hydroelectric Power and Environmental Improvement Act of 1986.

SEC. 2. The Congress finds and declares that: This Act amends the Federal Power Act to provide mandatory take over by the United States of hydroelectric power projects held by private, for-profit, entities when the license expires, to provide for the marketing of power from those projects and to commit future revenues from such projects to fish and wildlife enhancement and for other environmental purposes.

SEC. 3. Title I of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. Subsections 791a–823a) are amended in the following respects:

(a) In section 3 (16 U.S.C. Section 796(3)) by:

(1) inserting "or cooperatives" after the word "municipalities."; and

(2) adding a new subsection as follows: "(17) 'Cooperative' means any entity organized under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States which is entitled to preference in the sale of power and energy sold by the United States as provided in 16 U.S.C. §§ 831i, or 825s, or 43 U.S.C. § 485h(c)."

(b) In section 7 (16 U.S.C. § 800) by striking "States and municipalities" in subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "States, cooperatives and municipalities" and by striking subsection (c).

(c) In section 14 (16 U.S.C. § 807):

(1) In subsection (a), by striking "have the right" after the words "United States shall," striking "to" after the word "license," striking "to" after the word "thereafter," adding the words "held by a corporation as defined in section 3 hereof (16 U.S.C. 796)" after the word "license," and adding a comma and the words "shall have" after the first use of the word "or".

(2) By striking subsection (b).

(3) By adding a new subsection "(b)" as follows: "Take over by the United States pursuant to the provisions of this section is mandatory unless, within two years from the date of the Commission's notice given under subsection (a) of this section, an Act of Congress declares that takeover of a project or projects by the United States shall not concur.".

(4) By adding a new subsection "(c)" as follows:

"(c) In the event the United States by reason of an Act of Congress does not take over a project or projects under subsection (b) of this Section (or if the project is not subject to takeover under that subsection), the Commission shall, after not less than two years from notice published in the Federal Register, accept applications for a new license and decide them in a relicensing proceeding pursuant to the provisions of section 15 (16 U.S.C. 808)."

SEC. 4. Upon the effective date of a take over by the United States of a project as provided in section 14(b) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. § 807(b)), operation of the project shall be assumed:

(a) By the Tennessee Valley Authority if located on or along the Tennessee River or any of its tributaries or in any geographic area in which the Authority is authorized to sell electric power;

(b) By the Bureau of Reclamation if located in the seventeen conterminous western states;

(c) By the United States Army Corps of Engineers if located outside the areas covered by (a) and (b). The recaptured project facilities shall constitute power generating facilities held by the designated operating entity.

SEC. 5. Upon assuming operation of a project, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Corps of Engineers or the Bureau of Reclamation, as the case may be, shall reassess the project and its operation for possible modification as needed to meet then current standards for fish and wildlife protection and enhancement and shall make such structural and operational modifications, including additions and betterments, as the agency determines is needed to provide equitable treatment for such fish and wildlife with the other purposes for which the project is operated. In the case of the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation such reassessment shall be in accordance with the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act (16 U.S.C. §§ 661–666c). In the case of the Authority such reassessment shall be in accordance with cooperative arrangements between the Authority, the United States Fish and Wildlife Service and the National Marine Fisheries Service conforming to the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act.

SEC. 6. (a) Wherever practicable and feasible, a project, the operation of which is assumed pursuant to section 4, shall be integrated with other federal hydroelectric projects.

(b) The electrical output attributable to a project the operation of which is assumed pursuant to section 4 which is surplus to the operating needs of the project itself shall, if operation is assumed by the Tennessee Valley Authority, be marketed by the Authority pursuant to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended (16 U.S.C. §§ 831–831d). In all other cases, such electrical output shall be marketed by the Secretary of Energy under section 302 of the Department of Energy Organization Act (41 U.S.C. § 7152) and pursuant to (1) 16 U.S.C. § 825s where the project is located in the marketing areas of the Southwestern, Southeastern or Alaska Power Administrations, or is located outside the marketing area of any existing Department of Energy power marketing administration; (2) the acts governing the marketing of power by the Bonneville Power Administration, where the project is located in the marketing area of that power marketing administration; or (3) section 9(c) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 where the project is located in the marketing area of the Western Area Power Administration.

(c) For purposes of determining the financial requirements of a project the operation of which is assumed under section 4, the costs of the project shall consist of expenses of operation and maintenance, costs of replacements, modifications and betterments, including costs resulting from the implementation of section 5, and payments, if any, arising out of section 7(a) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. § 807(a)).

(d) Rates for power marketed pursuant to subsection (b) of this section shall be determined as follows:

(1) Where the project is interconnected with other federal hydroelectic projects constructed by the United States, power from which is marketed by the same entity, the rates for each class of service shall be the rate charged by the marketing entity for that class of service from the interconnected system, determined without reference to the financial requirements specified in subsection (c).

(2) Where the project is isolated from other federal hydroelectric projects constructed by the United States, the rate for each class of service shall be the marketing entity's average rate for the class of service involved.

(3) Where the marketing entity is the Secretary of Energy but the project is located outside the geographic area of any power marketing administration, the rate for each class of service shall be the average rate charged for that class of service from all federal power developments: Provided, That in the event the Secretary of Energy (i) establishes a power marketing administration to market power from the project or extends the area of an existing power marketing administration to include the project and (ii) the project is interconnected with other federal hydroelectric projects constructed by the United States and from which power is marketed by the same power marketing administration, paragraph (1) shall govern the establishment of rates.

(4) If rates determined in accordance with paragraphs (1), (2) or (3), whichever would be applicable, would not, for the project involved, return an amount sufficient to meet the financial requirements specified in subsection (c) plus any applicable interest, the rates shall be established at levels which will provide the necessary revenues.

SEC. 7. (a) There is hereby established in the Treasury of the United States, a trust fund entitled the "Environmental and Conservation Trust Fund" (hereinafter the "Fund"). All revenues received on account of projects the operation of which is assumed under section 4 which for any prior project are in excess of the financial requirements specified in section 6(c) shall be deposited in the Fund, as shall repayment of loans made pursuant to subsection (c) of this section.

(b) The Fund shall be administered by a Board consisting of the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (or their designees) and five, members selected by the President by and with the consent of the Senate, from among persons who by experience or training possess special qualifications in the fields of conservation or environmental protection. The Secretary of the Interior (or the Secretary's designee) shall serve as chairman of the Board and shall provide office space and staff for the Board, as the Board determines to be necessary, from staff and resources of the Fish and Wildlife Service and the National Park Service. Members of the Board who are not federal officials shall, when engaged in official duties, receive compensation at the level provided for federal officials at the initial step provided for federal employees holding the grade of GS 18, together with per diem or other allowances fixed in accordance with law while in travel status on official business. Other federal agencies shall provide such assistance as may be agreed upon on a reimbursable basis except that no charge shall be made for furnishing data and records in the possession of any federal agency, which data and records shall be provided as requested by the Board. The Board shall constitute an "agency" under 5 U.S.C. § 552b, and its records shall be available as provided in 5 U.S.C. § 552. All expenses of the Board shall be met from the Fund, within appropriations therefor.

(c) The Board may, within the limits of appropriations from the Fund, make grants and loans to other federal agencies and to state and local public bodies for conservation and environmental purposes in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Board. The Board's proposed budget shall be included in the annual budget for the Department of the Interior and shall be transmitted to the Congress as adopted by the Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado offers this amendment so as to turn this debate away from the details of the bill and to concentrate—even if for only 1 hour—on its underlying philosophy.

In the early years of this century, our Nation was blessed with certain foresighted leaders, among them President Theodore Roosevelt, who called themselves progressives. They were conservationists in the simplest and truest sense of the word. They were concerned with how best to care for and develop our physical environment long before the birth of the contemporary ecology movement.

Among the ideas they fought for was the idea that national resources such as forests and waterways should be managed to maximize their potential benefits to the public at large. Another of their ideas was that this stewardship was best entrusted to those who were directly responsible to the public.

These men believed in private ownership and profit making. But they also shared a profound belief that America's natural resources were assets of the Nation, the property of the people and a legacy to be willed to future Americans. They feared that assigning these assets to private concerns would interpose profit and the interests of shareholders between the resources and the people. Ordinary citizens would share in the development of these resources only as customers—and not as their rightful owners.

One of the fruits of this philosophy was the Federal Power Act of 1920, under which our waterways have been dammed to produce hydroelectric power. The 1920 act expressed the vision of the progressives and the conservationists by giving public bodies precedence in the granting of hydropower development licenses.

Nevertheless, most of those who raised the capital to build these facilities were—at least in the initial decades— private corporations. It was understood that, where public bodies could not do the job and private entities could, the Government should grant a license rather than leave the resource unused.

So the private corporations were licensed to develop power for a profit but for a period of time. It was an arrangement that all parties understood to be temporary.

The law made it clear that the resources in question were subject to recapture by the Federal Government when the licenses expired. And an adequate amount of time was allowed for the private utility to recoup its investment and then some.

Today, we face the question of renewing original licenses for private entities where public bodies are available to take over. The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has been inconsistent in interpreting the right of public preference in relicensing decisions. The courts have stood by the Public preference in a succession of decisions, but that battle is still joined.

So, Mr. President, here we are, struggling to resolve the issue by legislation. The resulting bill before us provides a kind of compromise between various interested parties. But in seeking that compromise, and in accommodating the interests of the current licensees, the bill has short-changed the essential principle that informed the act of 1920—the principle that the water resources that generate this power are a public resource—first and last.

This bill does not go so far as to repudiate the public franchise overtly, of course. Yet it would, in effect, grant existing hydropower licenses to the current licensees in perpetuity—whether those licenses are held by public entities or private.

A licensee under this bill would only need to meet the barest requirements of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in order to retain the license. Any competing entity, public or private, would be required to meet a impractical standard to prevail.

So we are locking in the current licensees, Mr. President. I suspect that will satisfy most of the interests that have made their influence felt in the process thus far. But let us be clear about the price attached. Because that price is essentially the abandonment of a commitment—one that our predecessors in this body were foresighted enough to enact into law three generations ago.

We are today reversing the presumption that the ownership of national assets should be as close to the people as possible. The new presumption says that the license holder, whomever it may be, should be preferred.

This reversal is not without its practical effects. The strongest enforcer of responsiveness and responsibility today is not regulation but the potential of a license challenge. Under the new rules, it is hard to imaging a licensee feeling the same weight of responsibility.

We have heard this looking-in of current private licensees defended as a means to keep the cheapest power flowing to the greatest number of consumers.

The majority of affected consumers are served by private utilities because these utilities still hold most of the licenses. But this Senator remains unconvinced that the cheap power these consumers now enjoy would somehow be lost without this bill to preserve it. We are not discussing the existence of power but its ownership and management.

The benefits of this low-cost power could still find their way to those who enjoy them now—and without being diminished to satisfy the claims of shareholders. The achievement of such delivery is a major practical objective of the amendment this Senator has offered. And it is a natural by-product of keeping faith with our own progressive political heritage.

But before detailing this proposal, we should take note of another reason we should not proceed to approve this legislation today. In recent days, several indian tribes, among them the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma and the Navajo of New Mexico, have raised questions concerning the potential infringment of their rights under this bill. The legislation makes not mention of the rights of tribes, nor does it make clear how the granting of permanent private usage rights will alter the claims of tribes to Federal resources.

The amendment I have sent to the desk would restore the presumption of public ownership that began our use of these national resources.

It would make the Federal recapture of privately licensed projects—which is now allowed under the 1920 act—automatic upon expiration of the original license. The recapture would occur unless the Congress acted to authorize extension of a current license. This restores the 1920 act's presumption that the hydropower resources and facilities would revert to public control.

The compensation features of the 1920 act would be retained, to maintain and respect the understanding under which licensees originally reached agreement with the people of the United States.

The amendment would preserve the preference for public bodies holding hydropower licenses and extend that preference to rural electric cooperatives, which do not now enjoy such a preference. These publicly responsible bodies would not be subject to Federal recapture.

The amendment would provide for recaptured projects to be operated by the Bureau of Reclamation in the 17 Western States, by the Tennessee Valley Authority in the TVA region and by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in the rest of the country. Where it is found to be impractical to recapture and manage a given project, Congress retains the option of extending the license.

The power output from recaptured projects would be marketed by the Department of Energy through the existing power marketing agencies wherever possible. The Department would be empowered to create new power marketing agencies if and where necessary.

Each class of power would be sold at the average cost for that class in the relevant power marketing area. Where revenues from sales on this basis exceeded actual costs, the excess would be deposited in a trust fund for the purpose of meeting environmental objectives in the area from which the revenues are received.

The amendment also would require the agency managing each recaptured project to conform its operation to the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act or—in the case of the TVA—to conform to the cooperative agreement now operative between the TVA and the Fish and Wildlife Service. In this way, we would be keeping faith with conservation dream of our forebears, as well as their progressive vision.

Mr. President, if we adopt this amendment, we can lend some substance to the title of the bill before us—"The Electric Consumers Protection Act." We would maintain our historic commitment to popular ownership of our national resources.

We would recognize that the 50-year relationship between these investor-owned utilities and the Federal Government was always designed as a mutually beneficial but temporary arrangement—dependent on a set of economic circumstances that has changed substantially.

And we would establish a framework in which the rights of all parties—utilities, consumers, tribes, and the Nation as a whole—are fully protected under law.

This is the philosophical framework that men such as Teddy Roosevelt fashioned as our heritage. This is the inheritance we are on the brink of disowning. This is what we would exchange for the sake of allowing utility executives to rest easy on guaranteed access to cheap hydropower.

Whatever stands to be gained under the bill before us, this Senator believes we owe the authors of our progressive and conservationist heritage at least enough respect to reflect upon the virtues of their public philosophy before turning our backs on it. And for that reason, this Senator offers this amendment for the Senate's consideration.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, this amendment is proof that even a fine and gifted Senator can occasionally make a very serious mistake.

What this amendment does is to seek to unscramble an egg which has been scrambled now for over 30 years, and unscramble it in a most unfair way.

Actually, what this amendment seeks to do is to take electricity generated by hydroelectric facilities and take it from investor-owned utilities and give it to cities, public power entities. Just in one fell swoop, it would do that.

That taking is concealed in the language of the amendment, because it says that at the expiration of the license, the dam shall be turned over to the federal power marketing administrations and TVA. But if you look further in Federal law, you will find that publicly owned utilities, have first call on the power from PMA's and TVA. So you are effectively taking it from investor-owned utilities and giving it to public power utilities.

Mr. President, the issue here is which consumers get the power and which consumers lose the power. There is nothing intrinsically right or wrong or legal or illegal about one set of consumers being chosen over another. The question here is, how are consumers best served?

Under this legislation, the legislation produced under this bill, we have a carefully calibrated test that bases the right to the power, the right to the license, the right to the electricity, on the public good.

What the amendment of the Senator from Colorado would do would be to make a judgment that the electricity should be taken from the investor-owned utilities and given to public power authorities. It is as simple as that.

In many cases, Mr. President, it would wreak economic injustice, chaos, and confusion. It would result in tens of thousands of customers who are now getting electricity at rather good rates suddenly being deprived of that electricity, which is then given to public power authority bodies, to municipalities, or others, and indeed it will be a great windfall for the municipalities.

Mr. President, there simply is no reason to take power from consumers served by investor-owned utilities and give it to cities or to public power authorities.

I wonder if the Senator does not agree with me that that is the effect of his amendment since the Corps of Engineers and these other groups which would be given this power, since public power authorities have——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Could I have 1 additional minute?

Mr. McCLURE. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized for an additional 2 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator does agree the existing law does give publicly owned utilities preferential access to all power generated by the Federal power marketing administrations and the TVA. Therefore, the effect of this would be to take the power from the investor-owned utilities and give it to the public power authorities.

Mr. HART. The Senator from Louisiana is incorrect. First of all, the power does not belong to the privately owned utilities. They are licensees of the Federal Government who are the citizens of the United States. This power belongs to the people of the United States and the presumption operates in favor of or against.

The law clearly contemplated in 1920 that it operate in favor of public bodies where bodies are available to own and operate the projects. So it does not take anything from anybody that they owned. They are licensees of the people of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Let me put it another way. I think the Senator makes a point. Indeed, they do not own the power but they have a right to it under their present license which will expire.

Mr. HART. Presently, it is temporarily right.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There is not a preference that is given to the public power people. There is an absolute right under the law, is there not? They are given preferential access to all power generated by the PMA's and TVA.

Mr. HART. Yes. Does the Senator from Colorado understand in the bill before us, that will change that fundamental right by permitting private licenses as far in the future as one can see?

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator understands that under our bill, the one under consideration, there is no absolute right, but rather a public interest test and whoever is best under the public interest test gets the power, except in the case of a tie.

Mr. HART. We should not skip over that "whoever is best." The standards established by the bill presently before the Senate are clearly standards that mitigate against anyone who challenges the incumbent licensee and makes it almost impossible to overturn that presumption in favor of the present private licensee.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I beg to differ. I mean if you can make the economic case and show that the greatest good for the most people under economic, under reliability, under efficiency as well under environmental considerations, then you can indeed get someone else's power.

Mr. HART. Why not have the presumption operate in the way that the original law contemplated and that is in favor of the presumption operating in favor of the public operator rather than private operator? That is all.

Mr. JOHNSTON. First of all, the Senator's bill does not contain a presumption. It simply turns that power over to the PMA's and TVA, which in turn must turn it over to the publicly-owned utilities. The Senator agrees with that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 2 minutes yielded to the Senator from Louisiana have expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. President, first of all, I concur with what my colleague from Louisiana has said in characterizing the effect of the proposal now before us. I think there are a number of serious questions that need to be asked and I might characterize the Hart amendment as the new flip side of the Stockman proposal to divest Bonneville Power and the PMA's. It is the flip chart of "let's get the Federal Government out of all of it" and the opposite side of the, "let's get the Government into all of it."

I submit that while many of us ask many questions about OMB's proposal that the Power Marketing Administration be sold and Bonneville Power be sold to the highest bidder and the impact that that would have, I think we have the same kind of questions with respect to the broad and sweeping effect of the existing proposal.

This bill, if enacted, and I pray it will not be, will cost the consumers of utilities which currently hold FERC licenses billions and billions of dollars. I am not sure the Senator from Colorado can give us an estimate. I think it is very difficult to know exactly how much existing consumers would pay as a result of the application of the terms of this amendment if adopted.

I think we also would have to look at the question of how many more Federal employees would have to be hired to manage what is now being managed in non-Federal entities. There would be a substantial increase in the scope, the size, and the cost of the Federal Government just to administer what is now being administered in the non-Federal sector.

I think there is one other thing that I am sure the Senator from Colorado would be very much concerned about which cannot be answered. I will not ask the question because it would simply be a rhetorical question for which there is no answer, at least I cannot answer, and that is the effect of this proposal with respect to State water law and the appropriation of waters pursuant to State law and how that would be preempted and wiped out by the application of this amendment.

What section 5 of the Hart amendment would require is in effect an open-ended authorization to the Bureau of Reclamation and Corps of Engineers to make any kind of modification which they desire with respect to fish and wildlife on dams which they take over with no estimate. It is an absolutely open-ended amount. It would be whatever they desire it to be over whatever period of time they desire.

The primary concern I have is the impact upon consumers of utilities that now know what the cost of their electricity is and who will benefit over a future period of time for the amount of money which the consumers have paid for electricity generated from that power.

After all, that is where the money came from to pay for the dams and facilities in the first place. It seems to me that if indeed there is to be a benefit in the future, it ought to run to the very people who have paid for the facility, not a new set of consumers who had nothing to do with that. Is it not really a question of whether or not we are going to favor an existing utility? Are we going to favor or permit the continuation of benefits to an existing group of consumers or will we invest that benefit in others? Unless indeed we are going to sell these at market value, put them up on an aution block—and I suspect we out in my section of the country will have the British Columbia Hydro, a provincial entity of the Province of British Columbia, Canada, being one of the highest and best bidders for these facilities in the United States, if indeed we put them up for auction—I think there are a number of questions that we can ask, that need to be answered. If indeed the power is taken away from an existing utility and given to some other group or consumers for their benefit, then that existing utility must find power from some other source. Rather than causing less environmental disruption, it is going to cause more as the existing utilities go out and build new nuclear powerplants and new coal-fired plants to produce the power now being produced which they lose. And who is the double loser? Again the consumers in that particular utility service area.

So for all of these reasons, Mr. President, I hope that the pending amendment is not adopted.

I would just note that I have an estimate from one utility of how much it would cost them. In Alabama alone they have estimated it would cost $2.8 billion in 1985 for new investment only, just $2.8 billion for one area and that would raise their rates by 24 percent for every one of the more than 1 million Alabama consumers affected.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, how much time remains on the side of those who favor the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado has 18 minutes.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, to respond briefly to the Senator from Idaho and several observations, first of all, any private utility operating under license on these Federal resources, publicly owned resources, made whatever investment they made understanding that they did not have a permanent right to operate these facilities or to indeed earn a profit.

So if investments were made they were made with the clear knowledge of the intent of the law over some 65 years. It is very difficult to contemplate now that 10, 20, or 30 years ago hundreds of millions of dollars that were invested were invested with the thought that in 1986 a bill would be introduced in the Senate in effect to privatize those investments, which is essentially what the pending measure does.

The Senator from Idaho says that the consumers are going to change. I am not sure what consumers are going to change.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HART. If the Senator can just respond. The same people being served by the temporary, privately licensed private entity. The public licensed, private entity would be served by presumably a publicly owned operating entity.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. HART. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana for a question.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes. For example, Colorado Public Service, which is an investor-owned utility, has four licenses and it receives 324 megawatts from that. Now, if the Senator's amendment passed, that power would pass from Colorado Public Service to WAPA, Western Area Power Administration, and then be subject to the public power preference; that is to say, publicly owned utilities served by WAPA would have a preference and would be entitled to first call on the power WAPA acquired. It is not a presumption, it is not a test, it is an absolute right that the publicly owned utilities served by WAPA would have to that 324 megawatts.

Now, my question to the Senator is: Would that not be likely to raise somebody's rates, and whose rates might that likely raise?

Mr. HART. Not necessarily, at all. It would depend upon the economics of the circumstances. I do not know why one should assume that if a publicly owned or publicly managed utility is operating a facility, that rates are going to go up necessarily. I think they could well go down. It depends on the demand for energy in the region and a lot of other economic considerations.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If Colorado Public Serivce would be serving its customers out there and all of a sudden that power goes to WAPA and WAPA then reallocates but with an absolute right of cities and towns and public power authorities to get that power in preference to Colorada Public Service, and then Colorado Public Service would have to go make a contract with someone else to get the power, is that not likely to raise some rates and lower some rates and redistribute economic benefits?

Mr. HART. It could well, but we are arguing here once again what was always contemplated by the Congress of the United States to be resources owned by the people of the United States. What the Senator's bill does, what the manager's bill does, is in fact take what is a public resource and give it to some private entities for the benefit of some shareholders. I would think that publicly operated entities running these facilities would run then as economically perhaps as those private entities and the beneficiaries would be the public at large, as well as the existing consumers.

Let me just finally say this: I think what we are dealing with here, Mr. President, is not the technicalities of management or even the economics of power. We are dealing here with the fundamental philosophy: that is, who owns the power developed on Federal water facilities, on national water facilities? It was never contemplated by the Congress, at least until this bill was introduced, that that ownership and that control would pass semipermanently into private hands. The departure here is not by the Senator from Colorado, it is by the sponsors and managers of this bill.

I reserve the balance of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. McCLURE. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I say to my colleagues, as well as to the Senator from Colorado, that our bill, S. 426, does not give an absolute right at all to the present holders of a hydroelectric license to keep that license. There is a carefully calculated test, and I invite the Senator's attention to page 6 of S. 426, which is section 4(b) of the bill, which states the factors upon which the Commission shall decide who gets the license. They are: Who best develops, conserves, and utilizes the water resources of the region? That, in turn, is a test contained in section 10(a) of the present act and is well understood, and it involves environmental factors as well.

Second, the relative economic impact upon customers; third, the economic impact, in the case of a nonutility holder, upon the operation and efficiency of the dependent industrial facility or related activity; fourth, the ability of each applicant to operate and maintain the project in a manner most likely to provide efficient, reliable electric service—and, reliability, of course, is a very important thing here. Finally, the need of each applicant for the electricity generated by the project to serve its existing customers—surely, a legitimate matter.

Now those are the tests upon which you vie for the right to license. We give the present license holder that license only in the event of a tie. You keep the status quo only in the event of a tie. And I might point out to my friend from Colorado that publicly owned power authorities now have four times the amount of hydropower on a per capita basis as do the investor-owned utilities. So this works to the advantage of both the investor-owned and the public power authorities that they are allowed to keep the status quo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 2 minutes have expired.

Mr. HART. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON. My time is up, but I would be glad to yield on the Senator's time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HART. I yield myself 1 minute to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question. Is the Senator saying, under this bill, the pending measure before the Senate, that there is not a presumption in favor of the existing licensee?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Only in the event of a tie.

Mr. HART. Well, what is a tie?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Well, in other words, if this is an applicant who presents his application and, based on each of these five factors, for example, the relative economic impact, FERC says, "We cannot tell, both are equally meritorious," it is only in that instance where there is an equality of merit that the present holder of the license keeps the license.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 1 minute has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ZORINSKY. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I rise in opposition to S. 426, the Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1985. This bill proposes to eliminate the preference granted smaller, nonprofit, publicly owned electric utilities in the relicensing of hydroelectric power facilities. Thus, it is a serious threat to a fundamental public policy regarding use of the Nation's resources.

The rivers and streams which drive these hydroelectric projects are public resources which belong to the Nation as a whole, not to individual companies. Congress has always recognized and lived up to its responsibility to ensure that these public resources are used in a manner which promotes valid public policy goals. Congress has consistently found that preference would foster competition in an essentially monopolistic industry. Congress has deemed it appropriate to provide, through preference, an opportunity for communities to exercise local control over an essential public service. Finally, Congress has stated time and again that the benefits of these public resources should flow directly to the public without passing through the tollgates of private, profit-oriented enterprises.

After several years of debate, Congress passed the Federal Power Act in 1920. The act authorizes the issuance of Federal licenses for up to 50 years for the operation of hydroelectric projects using Federal water. Under the law, a State or municipal applicant for a license is to be preferred over any private company as long as the plans of the public applicant are equally well adapted "to conserve and utilize in the public interest the water resources of the region."

Earlier in this century, many licenses were granted to investor-owned utilities. However, this was done with the express understanding that they would last for specified terms up to 50 years. Definite-term licenses were established to prevent private power companies from having the rights to public resources in perpetuity. The relicensing process was designed to provide a method by which the public could reclaim their resources after a 50-year period. Yet, S. 426 eliminates preference to municipal utilities in relicensing of hydro projects, and instead, grants to the private company license holders what amounts to perpetual rights to the use of a valuable public resource—falling water.

We must remember that as the law is now written, preference is applied only if two applicants are in equally good standing in what they propose to do with the project. You could say that the preference clause works as a tie breaker. Thus, the existing law clearly promotes competition in relicensing to the benefit of the public.

Now, just when implementation of preference in the relicensing process is being called into play, the private companies are asking Congress to change the rules of the game and undo the preference clause. They want to eliminate preference in relicensing, the tie breaker, and avoid competition. This would amount to a giveaway of valuable public resources, and that would be bad public policy.

No licenses have changed hands under provisions of existing law. The only impact of this law to date is that certain current licensees have been forced to compete for the privilege of the future use and enjoyment of a public resource. There is no need for Congress to act now. We should let the preference principle in relicensing work as it was intended.

Preference in the licensing and relicensing process is in the best interests of the public. I urge my colleagues to vote against S. 426.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. ZORINSKY. I thank the Senator from Idaho for his courtesy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is so moved by the powerful statement of the Senator from Nebraska in favor of this position that I am prepared to yield the equivalent amount of time back to the managers of the bill, if that is considered fair play.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Nebraska would be opposed to both the amendment and the bill.

Mr. HART. I take back my offer.

[Laughter.]

Mr. McCLURE. I thought perhaps in candor the Senator should know that.

Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, first of all I do not want to get involved in the debate of either of my colleagues today with respect to whether or not the Federal Government owns all of the water and owns all of the resources because I do not think they own the water any more than does the Federal Government own the oil, or gas, or coal, or soil, or timber, or air that exists in this country. There is a fundamental disagreement in the matter of philosophy and principle.

But that is not really the crux of my objection, although that might be the crux of the approach of the Senator from Colorado. My main objection is that there are winners and losers. Under the provisions of the amendment as offered by the Senator from Colorado, there is no way of now determining who those winners and losers will be because there is no congruence between the service areas or the consumers served by existing entities that hold licenses today, and those who might hold the license in the future.

To just use a hypothetical, and I will use it because it happens to be the Senator's State and not mine; that is, if a nonmunicipal or publicly owned utility, an investor owned utility in the State of Colorado has a license that expires and a public body in southern California applied for that license, they would get it. It would not be the people of Colorado who paid for the facilities through the rates they paid who would have the benefit of the use of that facility in the future. It would be consumers in southern California who would have the advantage of those lower rates.

Who is really going to be helped or hurt? It is not the investors of a utility who are helped by the extension of the license period. It is the consumers from that utility because if that utility is regulated by a competent State regulatory agency, once the cost of the facility is written off it is no longer a part of the rate base for the purpose of fixing the rates for that utility, and the rates are therefore lower than they otherwise would be.

Any other investor that comes in, or if that utility itself were forced to put in new capital or any other entity that comes in is forced to put new capital in, the consumers' total aggregate bill has to rise because there is a new element in the rate base upon which the rates must be fixed, and that, I submit, is not good for the consumers. I do not care whose consumers they are or where they may be. I would submit that is really an aid to those who loan money.

If you want to help Wall Street and hurt the consumers, pass this provision. Wall Street will be the winner. The consumers will be the losers.

Mr. HART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. Who yields time?

The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, with all due respect, my response is it is patent nonsense. First and foremost, the Senator from Colorado has never talked about the Government owning this water. I have gone out of my way to talk about the people of the United States owning this water. That is what Theodore Roosevelt and the pioneer progressives and conservationists themselves understood and appreciated, and if I may say so, the drafters of the basic 1921 act. It is not the question of the Government owning the water. It is the question of the people of the United States owning the water.

Second, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho well knows that the Senator from Colorado is not offering a bill for the benefit of Wall Street. This is an amendment offered for the benefit of the taxpayers and the citizens of this country who own these waterways, and who are entitled to the benefits of the power generated on them. That again was the underlying philosophy of the law.

It is in fact the Senator from Idaho and the sponsors and managers of this bill who seek to reverse that 65-year tradition—indeed, even 200-year tradition.

Finally, Mr. President, this notion that a privately operated and owned utility cares more about local consumers than a publicly owned and operated one is again just patent nonsense. Why in the world should the Senator from Idaho presume that a public entity responsible for the local constituency is going to export power to some other part of the country? I think quite the reverse is the presumption here.

It is those whose sole concern is the profit motive as obviously it should be, and the rights and interests of shareholders under the law that are going to take their profits and sell their power wherever they can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCLURE). Would the Senator suspend for just a moment? I apologize. The Chair is uncertain whether the Senator yielded himself a specific amount of time.

Mr. HART. No. I did not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HART. So, Mr. President, the law as it presently exists and has existed for over 65 years said that private licensees who expended capital for the construction of facilities did so with the understanding that it would be depreciated over time, that their investment eventually would be recaptured unless their license were renewed, and the pending legislation almost guarantees surely that license will be renewed in perpetuity.

The Senator from Colorado thinks that is bad public policy, thinks it is a dramatic reversal of the philosophy of this Government that this country has operated under for 2 centuries, and certainly in the case of public waterways and public power generation for the last six and one-half decades.

The Senator from Colorado hopes that the Senate will maintain that philosophy by supporting his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMM). Who yields time?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, how much time remains on both sides?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado has 7 minutes, and the Senator from Idaho has 5 minutes.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, we are a little late in getting started on this for no fault of the Senator from Colorado or the Senator from Idaho. I ask unanimous consent that the time on this amendment be extended by 15 minutes to be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I appreciate what the Senator from Colorado says and the distinction that he makes between the Federal Government and the people, a debating distinction but more than a debating distinction. I accept that. But again I have to remind the Senator that the taxpayers and consumers are the same body of people in the aggregate.

That does not mean that every taxpayer and every consumer consumes in exactly the same proportion as they pay taxes.

Some pay more and some pay less, some consume more and some consume less. But the resources which we are talking about here are resources which have been developed by the application of capital, whether it was done by an investor-owned utility and the capital gained in that way; whether it was done by a publicly owned body and they floated bonds and gained capital in that way, or whether it was done as a result of the advancement of Federal funds to a Federal entity and money generated through taxpayers' contributions. There was capital invested.

That capital, once written off, no longer lies in the rate base of the utility and rates drop. The rates reflect the amount of unrecovered capital.

If, at the moment that that unrecovered capital is completely written out of the rate base, more capital is required. Somebody goes to the market to get more capital, whether it be an investor-owned utility, whether it be a public body, or whether it be acquisition by the Federal Government.

If that is so, then all this can do is raise the rate base to cover that additional capital.

Mr. President, that has to be the aggregate paid by the consumers and their rates must be greater than it otherwise would be because it has to, again, repay capital borrowed from capital markets in one way or another.

So the transfer of ownership, if it is a company, by any payment requirement, simply increases the consumer's bill, and if it is the Federal Government that provides the additional capital or a public body that produces the capital, it can only be done by increasing the capitalization.

So, in some way, somewhere, the capital markets are those who are favored, initially and most directly; second, that group of consumers who might find that this power is for them cheaper than their current source of power. That group of consumers would be favored. But the group of consumers who would otherwise have been served who would then have to seek higher cost power would themselves be paying the bill for the shift of benefit from one group to another.

One other thing before I yield the floor is simply to express my disagreement with both the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Nebraska that the 1920 Power Act says the preference applies to relicense. The 1920 act says no such thing. The 1920 act is silent in that regard.

There is an ambiguity or a hole or an area that is not just vague; it is uncovered. Because the law does not consider what happens in that event, we are trying to legislate to cover what is not now covered by the statute at all. This measure that we have is not a public power versus private power fight, because many of the existing licenses are public entities that themselves got a license through the route of a municipal or public power preference who might themselves be at the short end of this and find it bit away by some other public or preference entity. The Federal Government would take it away. They would not under the Senator's provision take it away but in the absence of some amendment to the statute can very well find their license removed from them and transferred to some other public entity.

We are not trying to serve just the one group, a private investor-owned utility group at the expense of publicly owned utility groups. We are trying to write a provision that serves the greatest number of consumers in the fairest possible way and the greatest number of entities that are already there in the fairest possible way with the least economic disruption to the existing patterns that exist throughout much of the United States.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I yield myself so much time as I may require.

Mr. President, as appreciative as the Senator from Colorado is for the lecture on economics by the Senator from Idaho, that is not the issue.

The issue is one of public policy and whether it is the intention of the Senate of the United States in 1986 to reverse 6½ decades of philosophy which said that power generated from the public waterways of this country belongs to the people of the United States, and that a legal preference under the law operates in favor of public operators of that power.

The Senator is generally correct in his statement that a vacuum exists in the law itself and can be variously interpreted. But it is the understanding of the Senator from Colorado that virtually unanimously when this issue has been addressed by the courts of the United States, including very recently, those courts have found, almost uniformly, that a public preference does in fact operate on relicensing and that was the intent of the Congress in passing the 1920 law.

If the Senator from Colorado is incorrect in that analysis of court decisions, I hope to hear otherwise.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. President, that the bill before us dramatically reverses public intent and congressional intent in 1920. It essentially says if you had a long-term but temporary license to operate a power-generating facility on a public waterway, that license could be transferred to a public entity at the discretion of the Federal Government at the end of the license period.

What this proposal presently before us says is that you have a presumption in your favor if you had that license, if you made investments, and it takes an extraordinary showing to upset your right, what the Senator from Colorado called a semipermanent right, to continue to operate that facility. That is the simple issue here.

Certainly there are economics involved, but not the kind the Senator from Idaho has suggested. We are not talking about raising consumer rates. We are not talking about changing who the consumers are. What we are talking about is continuing a philosophy spelled out in the law in 1920 that the power generated from publicly owned public waterways is power that belongs to the people of the United States and can be licensed to private entities at the discretion of the Federal Government working for the people of the United States. That is the issue.

I hope the Senator from Nebraska, who has since departed the Chamber, and others who care deeply about this question as the Senator from Colorado does, will support this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. McCLURE. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the question in this legislation is not whether the power belongs to the people of the United States. Of course it does. Of course it does. And certainly in the sense that the Congress can allocate that power, can distribute it, can put provisions for its license in this legislation. That is what this legislation is all about.

To say that the power is owned and subject to the power of this Congress is not to say, as the Senator's amendment would say, that public power authorities are necessarily better than investor-owned utilities.

The Senator has said or implied that there is some kind of moral superiority of the public power authorities over the investor-owned utilities.

I think that is decidedly not so, Mr. President. I do not claim moral superiority for either side. As a matter of fact, the publicly owned power authorities are not subject to regulation, whereas the investor-owned utilities are.

While I do not claim that as being a reason to be superior, it at least is a protection for the public that you have with investor-owned utilities which you do not have with cities. Indeed, there are some cities which use the power they receive from hydroelectric dams as a substitute tax, as a revenue source, on which to run their cities.

Now, Mr. President, public power authorities already have four times the amount of power from dams as the investor-owned utilities on a per capita basis. They have been treated more than fairly. There is no reason to take away the power presently licensed to the investor-owned utilities and give it to public power authorities unless they can make a case. This bill, S. 426, provides a perfect test, as perfect as we could devise, to determine who ought to have it. It ought to be based upon the public interest, Mr. President, not upon some arbitrary statement of who ought to get it. It ought to be based upon the public interest.

S. 426 has a very carefully orchestrated list of tests by which to determine where that public interest is. If the Senator can devise a better test of the public interest, I would like to hear it. But simply to ignore the public interest and say we are going to take it from the investor-owned utilities and give it to the power marketing authorities or to TVA is not to serve the public interest. Indeed, that may in many instances be going diametrically opposed to what the interest is. What our bill does, S. 426, is to, at the expiration of a license, give to the FERC a set of tests to determine the public interest and to mandate that they follow them. It is only in the event of a tie, only in the event a counterapplicant to the present licensee cannot prove a better case, that the present license holder, whether he be investor-owned or publicly owned, continues as in the status quo.

Mr. President, the Senator asks why do we want to change the present law. Because there is no adequate test under the present law. The present law simply says that you must develop, conserve, and utilize the water resources of the region, which is an important test and indeed a test that is brought forward in our bill. But it should not be the sole test. Relative economic impact upon consumers, reliability, efficiency, those kinds of measures ought also to be considered because they are always considered in electricity matters.

Mr. President, we submit that the better way to determine who gets the power is where is the public interest, and we submit that the tests we have in S. 420 are much better designed to do that than the present law and certainly much better than the Senator's amendment presently pending which would arbitarily take that power from those who have it and give it immediately to the Corps of Engineers or to TVA, to the power marketing authorities. The present law—and I want to emphasize this—provides that public power authorities have an automatic preference to the power from TVA, the Corps of Engineers or the power marketing authorities. In other words, you are taking it from those who have it and giving it automaticallly, without reference to the public interest, without reference to the economics, without reference to efficiency or reliability or any of those other tests, to the public power authorities, to those who do not now have it without having to prove merit, without having to pass muster under any test. Mr. President, that would wreak economic havoc, be unjust. It would raise rates across this country for tens of thousands of customers and therefore this amendment should be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ARMSTRONG). Who yields time?

Mr. HART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HART. How much time remains in support of the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado has 10 minutes remaining; the Senator from Idaho has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, let us try to get one notion straight here if we may.

The right to the power generated on public waterways does not belong to private investor-owned utilities. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado takes nothing away from them. They do not own the power. They have a temporary license to operate facilities to generate that power. This amendment puts the power back in the hands of the people it was contemplated to belong to in 1920, and those are the people of the United States.

Now, to say that a handful or even a large number of privately owned corporate interests are better qualified to define the public interest than public entities flies in the face of reason, logic, and fact. The Senator lists criteria. One wonders who drafted those criteria and by whom those criteria were approved. Were they entities responsive and responsible to the people of the country or local areas or not? Were they entities responsible to stockholders and corporate laws?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HART. I yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Is the Senator aware that those criteria were drafted by us, those of us sitting right here, without intervention? As a matter of fact, the investor-owned utilities opposed this test. They wanted a different approach altogether.

Mr. HART. Well, to the degree the Senator is asking a question, I will take his word for it. If the Senator says those criteria were not approved by or achieved the approval of those who have a license they want to protect, then I will take his word for it. But then certainly they would not be pushing as hard as they are the bill introduced by the managers. In any case, this is, as the Senator from Colorado said at the outset, a philosophical debate. It is an economic debate only secondarily. It is a philosophical debate about who owns the public resources of the country.

What is happening under the bill as introduced by the managers is a shifting of presumption as to who has what rights. What this bill would do, if enacted, is to fundamentally shift the notion of who is entitled to manage, own, and benefit from the power generated by public waterways. We should not make any mistake about it. It is designed to shift something that belongs to the people of the United States even more—as I said, semipermanently—into private hands. Now, private hands are good hands, but they have their own interests. Those interests are not always necessarily the interests of the people who own the resource. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado is to continue that long progressive tradition of protecting the public interest, the interest of the people who own these resources and who are entitled to benefit from them as public resources—not secondarily after shareholders are taken care of and after other capital interests but primarily.

If the presumption that those public interests can be met by a private entity is adhered to, then the private entity prevails. This is not to make public rights and interests that are now in private hands. It is to maintain a presumption that the interests and the property of the United States ought to continue to belong to the people of the United States.

Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Hearing none, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator for not objecting and I will not try to take advantage of this situation at all. But I think we ought to get one thing clearly on the record at this point before we get to a vote on this amendment. This is not a new issue—who owns the resource. It has been debated for many, many years in this country. The question to regulate or to license flowing water is quite a different thing than who owns the dam and the facilities that are involved quite a different thing.

Mr. President, section 4(e) of the Federal Power Act describes the legal basis for the Commission's licensing authority with respect to hydro projects. The language of this enabling provision demonstrates that Congress clearly recognized that the basic Federal interest in hydro projects is a purely regulatory interest based upon Congress' power under the commerce clause to regulate navigable streams except where public lands or Indian reservations are involved. The section states:

SEC. 4. The Commission is hereby authorized and empowered—

(e) To issue licenses * * * for the purpose of constructing, operating and maintaining dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines or other projects works necessary or convenient for the development and improvement of navigation and for the development, transmission and utilization of power across, along, from or in any of the streams or other bodies of water over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, or upon any part of the public lands and reservations of the United States * * *.

Likewise, in section 4(g), the Commission's authority to investigate possible encroachments upon its licensing authority and to issue and enforce remedial orders is based upon and restricted to the same regulatory interest, except as affecting public lands and reservations. Where public proprietary interests belonging to the Federal Government are involved in a hydro project, Congress provided in section 10(e) for appropriate charges to be assessed for their use. Other examples of the Congress' understanding of its role as regulator, but not owner, of the navigable waters throughout the Nation are apparent in section 9(b) regarding an applicant's demonstration of compliance with State property, water and utility laws, section 23(b) regarding the Commission's licensing authority over sites on nonnavigable waters and section 27 clarifying continuing primacy of State water law regarding rights in and uses of flowing waters. The Federal Power Act itself, therefore, evidences Congress' acknowledgement that the Federal Government has no proprietary interest whatsoever in hydroelectric projects not built on Federal lands or reservations or superimposed on existing Federal dams even though they utilize the flow of navigable waters. The enabling legislation makes clear that the Federal interest is strictly regulatory.

Notwithstanding the language of the act, proponents of the so-called public domain argument assert dogmatically that the admittedly dominant regulatory power of Congress over navigable waters somehow transforms the private assets involved in a licensed project into public assets allegedly due to be returned to public ownership at time of relicensing. Regardless of the unquestioned predominance of a proper exercise of the Federal regulatory power, the lands and facilities which comprise the affected hydroelectric projects—exclusive of Federal lands and reservations—remain the property of the respective States, their grantees or permittees and private owners.

This settled principle of law was recognized by Congress early in the development of Federal water power legislation. Senator John K. Shields of Tennessee,[1] eminent legal scholar, jurist and author of the seminal bill (S. 3331) leading to the Federal Water Power Act,[2] argued vociferously in the 2d session of the 64th Congress against amendments providing for a fee upon project licensees for the privilege of building a dam and using the flowing waters to generate power. Senator Shields made it clear that, despite its dominant regulatory power, the Federal Government lacked constitutional authority to impose a rental fee because the United States has no property interest in navigable waters.[3] The Senator and many of his colleagues in Congress[4] relied upon several leading U.S. Supreme Court decisions which I understand from counsel remain the law of the land today.

In Martin v. Lessee of Waddell, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 366 (1842), Chief Justice Taney spoke for the Court in an opinion resolving a dispute over ownership of certain New Jersey oyster beds.

[W]hen the revolution took place, the people of each state became themselves sovereign; and in that character, held the absolute right to all their navigable waters, and the soils under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the constitution to the general government. (41 U.S. (16 Pet.) at 410).

In a later case involving the navigable waters of Alabama, Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 212 (1845), the Court quoted with approval the foregoing language of Martin and further stated:

Then to Alabama belong the navigable waters, and soils under them, in controversy in this case, subject to the rights surrendered by the Constitution to the United States; and no compact that might be made between her and the United States could diminish or enlarge these rights. (44 U.S. (3 How.) at 229).

The Court concludes its decision in the Pollard case as follows:

By the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: First, The shores of navigable waters, and the soils under them, were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the states respectively. Secondly, The new states have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original states. Thirdly, The right of the United States to the public lands, and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof, conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the land in controversy in this case. (44 U.S. (3 How.) at 230).

Many other seasoned Supreme Court decisions reiterate this immutable principle of law. See, United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co., 229 U.S. 53, 60 (1913); Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U.S.

[1] Senator Shields expressed his legal position on this matter many times, but most notably in a speech given in 1916 while House and Senate conferees considered a measure which had passed the House and S. 3331, which had passed the Senate. 54 Cong. Rec. 1004 (1916).

[2] The act was referred to as the Federal Water Power Act until the Wheeler-Rayburn bill of 1935 added pts. II and III and redesignated the act as the Federal Power Act.

[3] Senator John K. Shields (1858–1934) was a Democrat from Tennessee. He was elected to the Senate in 1913 and reelected in 1918, serving until 1924. Senator Shields served as chancellor of the 12th Division of the State of Tennessee (1892–94), associate justice of the Tennessee Supreme Court (1902–10) and chief justice of the Tennessee Supreme Court. After his two-term service as a U.S. Senator, President Warren G. Harding desired to submit the Senator's name for appointment to the U.S. Supreme Court, but was dissuaded by Senator Shield's age and ill health. Most notably, as explained in the comments of Senator Shields, this principle is not diminished by the oft-cited Chandler-Dunbar decision. Clearly, the Court's decision in that case specified the undeniable predominance of the Government's navigational servitude over private property interests of riparian landowners when exercised for commerce clause purposes. Furthermore, the Court determined that ownership of the flowing waters in a navigable stream is "inconceivable." Most importantly, however, the Court decided that because the company admitted that any structures in the stream found to be an obstruction to the Government's navigational purposes could be ordered removed and because the Government had paid for all other private property interests except those associated with the disputed claim to the flowing waters, the Chandler-Dunbar Co. had no grounds for complaint. Thus, the Chandler-Dunbar decision demonstrates the relationship between the dominant Federal power over navigable waters and the coterminus private property rights which exist subject to that power.

Senator Shield's legal analysis was accepted by the Congress which adopted the Federal Water Power Act of 1920. Congress declined to impose rental charges for the use of the flowing navigable waters by licensees. More recent U.S. Supreme Court case law confirms the vitality of these earlier cases and the applicability of the legal principle accepted by Congress. In Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164 (1979), the Federal Government asserted a public right of access into a private marina development because the developers' dredging of the private lagoon created navigable waters subject to the Government's navigable servitude. The Court confirmed the broad regulatory power of the Government over navigable waters, stating that:

[T]here is no doubt that Congress may prescribe the rules of the road, define the conditions under which running lights shall be displayed, require the removal of obstructions to navigation, and exercise its authority for such other reason as may seem to it in the interest of furthering navigation or commerce. (444 U.S. at 174).

But the property subjected to that dominant power remains private property and does not become a public asset merely by reason of its servitude.

Although the Government is clearly correct in maintaining that the now dredged Kuapa Pond falls within the definition of "navigable waters" as this Court has used that term in delimiting the boundaries of Congress' regulatory authority under the Commerce Clause, this Court has never held that the navigational servitude creates a blanket exception to the Takings Clause whenever Congress exercises its Commerce Clause authority to promote navigation. Thus, while Kuapa Pond may be subject to regulation by the Corps of Engineers, acting under the authority delegated it by Congress in the Rivers and Harbors Appropriation Act, it does not follow that the pond is also subject to a public right of access. (444 U.S. at 172-3). (Citations omitted).

Thus, the regulatory power of Congress over navigable waters under the commerce clause, although unquestionably predominant over private property rights affected by its proper exercise, does not give rise to a proprietary or property interest in the riparian property subject to the commerce clause. Exclusive of Federal lands and reservations, the property interests comprising the various hydroelectric projects throughout the country remain private property subject to a dominant Federal navigational or regulatory power. Such projects are not public assets or a part of the public domain simply because they are subject to the Federal regulatory power.

This is especially apparent in the States east of the Mississippi River, such as Alabama, where licensed projects commonly were built with the use of privately owned lands and in river beds owned either by riparian landowners or the respective States. In these cases, the Federal Government's only cognizable interest is strictly regulatory. Likewise, this is the situation in other regions except where the projects were located on Federal reservations but, even then, the project works were constructed with funds provided by the licensee and the licensee is required by license provisions prescribed in accordance with section 9(e) of the act to pay annual charges for the use of the Government property used in the development and operation of the project. Thus, the project works of the existing licensee and the lands and flowage easements acquired by it are not "public resources," but rather private assets or resources devoted to public service. Except for the States' proprietary rights in the streambed, many of the projects which could be taken from existing licensees by application of a preference at relicensing are composed entirely of property interests assembled by developers with investment capital. Except for two projects where Alabama Power Co. has added generating facilities to dams constructed for the Federal Government by the Corps of Engineers—Bankhead and Holt projects—the company's projects have been built, at great risk to the investors, upon property acquired by the company after paying amounts reflecting fair market value at the time of the acquisition. All the improvements constructed on the site by Alabama Power were built without Federal funds. The impoundments, equipment, buildings, roads and transmission lines all were constructed, paid for and are owned by Alabama Power. All authorized taxing authorities levy ad valorem taxes against Alabama Power Co. as owner of such projects.

Congress' commerce clause power to regulate and improve navigation subjects all works that could impede navigation to a dominant servitude for such Federal purposes as may be related to the proper exercise of that power, but the servitude does not divest title from the owner of subjected property or create sua sponte a proprietary interest in the Federal Government. For example, if the Federal license for an existing project is taken from Alabama Power and issued to a municipality based upon a statutory preference, the property interests comprising that project will remain in Alabama Power until transferred by a properly executed deed or a condemnation order upon payment of the required compensation.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hesitate to interrupt the Senator, but before the time expired, I wanted to get on the record where this legislation came from.

Will the Senator agree with me that the approach of the investor-owned utilities, EEI and the other group, was to provide legislation that provided not only for preference for the present license holders but also to provide compensation in the event that FERC should order that? As I recall the compensation language, it was fair market value as determined by due process.

Mr. McCLURE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator will also recall that we drafted the tests, I believe, almost exactly and precisely as stated, with maybe a minor change or some changes not suggested by the EEI or the investor-owned utilities. So all these tests came from us, this legislation came from us, and not from the investor-owned utilities.

Mr. McCLURE. The Senator is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

The Senator from Colorado has 6 minutes remaining.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON] be added as a cosponsor of the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, let me assure my colleagues, the distinguished managers of the bill, that no bad faith was intended by the Senator from Colorado in terms of the drafting of criteria. The Senator from Colorado merely meant to say that those interests presently operating under private license strongly favor the pending bill, which contains those criteria. That is all.

On the issue of what the courts have said or currently are saying about the question of presumption, I should like to quote the court of appeals judge, Abner Mikva, who wrote, I think fairly recently, in a decision in October 1985, less than a year ago, last fall, on the question of presumption and the intent of the law. Judge Mikva wrote:

The legislative history—

I assume him here to mean the 1920 act—— removes any shadow of a doubt as to what Congress wanted to happen when relicensing time arrived. The muncipal preference applies to all relicensing, including those involving an incumbent licensee.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HART. I yield for a question.

Mr. McCLURE. Is the Senator aware that the opinion to which he refers was vacated under the very unusual circumstance of a panel en banc, which set aside that opinion?

Mr. HART. No; the Senator understands that the court of appeals en banc is undertaking to review that decision. Nevertheless, until that review occurs, the language still stands. I think it stands, supported by a long series of Federal court decisions over the years.

In sum, Mr. President, the issue, as the Senator from Colorado has said, is a basic, philosophical issue. It has to do with the fundamental notion of who owns the public resources, who has what rights to them, who has what interests in them.

The 1920 act clearly contemplated that where public entities were not available to undertake production and operation of power facilities on public waterways, licenses, long-term but temporary, still to expire at a date certain, could be granted to private licensees. The issue before Congress today is what happens when those licenses expire.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado says that the preference should operate in favor of the publicly owned facility when that entity is prepared to operate the facility in the public interest, or when a presumption in favor of that public entity can be overcome by a private licensee, then that license should be renewed.

I ask the Senators who care about preserving this public option to support the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the proposed Hart amendment to S. 426. I do so, primarily, because its impact upon consumers, the electric utility industry, financial institutions, and industrial companies would be devastating.

Mr. President, the proposed Hart amendment is discriminatory on its face. It would require the Federal Government to exercise its discretionary right under S. 14 of the Federal Power Act to take over federally licensed hydroelectric projects presently owned by utility companies at the expiration of the license, but the hydro projects owned by State, municipal or cooperative utilities would not be subject to Federal takeover.

The power from these taken projects would then be turned over to existing Federal power agencies such as the Southeastern Power Administration in the Southeast for marketing in accordance with the existing schemes for marketing Federal hydropower, which include, of course, a preference for States and municipalities. I would also extend to cooperatives the present municipal preference in hydroelectric project licensing. More than 48 percent of our Nation's hydroelectric power is owned by the Federal Government and marketed pursuant to that scheme of preferences. The proposed Hart amendment would mandate that all of this valuable resource be monopolized for the benefit of these privileged few.

Utility companies that would lose hydroelectric capacity and energy pursuant to that Hart amendment would have to replace that capacity and energy with fossil-fired or nuclear generation in order to continue to serve their customers. This would be terribly expensive to consumers. There are few remaining sites for susbstantial hydroelectric projects, and all other hydro projects would be marketed pursuant to preference.

This incredible task would require new plants, new transmission networks, new fuel stocks, lots of capital, and lots of lead time. The cost of such an upheaval on a national basis would be staggering.

The environmental impact of creating an unnecessary requirement for new plant construction would be considerable.

The highest and best use of the hydroelectric capacity as peaking and stabilizing capacity in integrated systems would be lost forever if the units were separated from the integrated systems and sold on a stand-alone basis. The capacity and energy available from the units on that basis would be far less valuable to consumers. Such a use of hydroelectric capacity is poor energy policy and a waste of a valuable resource.

In Alabama alone, the cost of the Hart amendment would be $2.8 billion in 1985 dollars for new investment only. This would mean a 24 percent rate increase for every one of the more than 1 million Alabama consumers served by the private utility. Those customers would then still face higher annual electric bills because of increased fuel, maintenance and operating costs.

The proposed Hart amendment would unjustifiably extend the concept of federally subsidized power at the expense of millions of innocent consumers who happen to be served by utility companies.

The Federal Government already owns and operates more than 48 percent of the hydropower available in America. All of that power is mandated pursuant to preferences for State, municipal, and cooperative utilities which, altogether serve approximately 24 percent of American electricity consumers.

On a per-residential-customer basis, State and municipal utilities already own and operate more than four times the hydro capacity and more than 5½ times the hydro energy than utility companies.

All told, State and municipal utilities have preferential access to more than 68 percent of America's available hydropower for the exclusive benefit of the 14 percent of American electricity consumers they serve.

This is above and beyond the other special benefits provided to municipalities which aid their efforts to provide low cost electric service, such as:

First, freedom from Federal, State, county and local income, property, gross receipts, franchise, payroll and severance taxes;

Second, taxpayer-subsidized capital costs . . . approximately 4 percent, compared to 11 percent for utility companies;

Third, freedom from regulation in many States;

Fourth, immunity from financial penalties for violations of the antitrust laws.

In summary, Mr. President, the proposed Hart amendment—in the nature of a substitute—is directly contrary to every major concept embodied in S. 426. S. 426 presumes existing licenses should keep the dams for service to their customers, which the Hart amendment requires a Federal takeover. S. 426 seeks to protect the 76 percent of American electric consumers served by utility companies from an unjustifiable loss of hydro projects they have paid for through their rates while the Hart amendment mandates their automatic takeover by the Federal Government without adequate compensation. S. 426 eliminates a further preference at the relicensing stage for taxpayer-subsidized utilities while the Hart amendment seeks to extend the existing scheme of Federal subsidization to other entities over all hydroelectric capacity in the Nation forever.

Finally, Mr. President, the underlying premise of the proposed Hart amendment, that is, that the projects built with private capital on private property is really a Federal resource because the operation of that project is subject to Federal licensing authority, is simply legally wrong. I urge its defeat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. HART. The Senator wants to see what the Senator from Idaho has in mind.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HART. I yield

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, there will be a unanimous-consent request that it be in order to order a quorum call prior to the rollcall. It will be the intention of the Senator from Idaho to move to table and ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to table.

Mr. HART. It would be the intention?

Mr. McCLURE. Yes.

Mr. HART. What is the purpose of the quorum call?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, the interposition of the quorum call will require unanimous consent, and I will ask that unanimous consent at the time the Senator from Colorado has yielded back the remainder of his time.

Mr. HART. My understanding is that the Senator can, by unanimous consent, seek a quorum call, without the Senator from Colorado yielding back his time.

Mr. McCLURE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Approximately 1 minute remains to the Senator from Colorado.

Who yields time?

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator from Colorado that under the consent agreement, the clock continues to run, and the vote will occur at approximately 3:18, under the previous order of the Senate.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. McCLURE. I move to table the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to order a quorum call prior to the rollcall.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I further ask unanimous consent that at the end of statements which I and the distinguished Senator from North Carolina will make that we go back automatically into a quorum call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, my colleagues know that while I support vigorous research on antiballistic missiles I have doubts about the pace and direction of the President's star wars initiative. In the last several days these concerns have turned to grave reservations, especially with respect to the vulnerability of a star wars defense system to attack by the Soviets.

On March 5, in an open hearing before the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee I asked Lt. Gen. James Abrahamson, Director of the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization, how we could defend star wars satellites from Soviet attack. He responded that there are quite a few ways to defend them but they are classified. In a classified hearing with General Abrahamson on April 9, I asked him the same question, how can we defend space-based assets? After listening to the classified answer I must tell you that I was not any more satisfied with the classified answer than I was with the unclassified answer.

Furthermore, Senators CHILES, PROXMIRE, and I released a staff study on March 17, 1986, entitled, "SDI: Progress and Challenges," which stated:

> What is the current overall assessment on survivability? At this point, it appears bleak. Scientists at the Sandia Laboratory who have been intensely studying this question have come to the conclusion that space-based, boost-phase defenses can never be made survivable, unless by treaty.

This report was prepared by our staffs who went to the national labs, including Sandia, and to other SDI facilities and interviewed scientists working on the program. In the past, SDI officials have talked of establishing "keep-out zones" to protect SDI satellites against Soviet antisatellite weapons and Soviet space mines. The United States would declare a certain area around a satellite—say, hundreds or thousands of kilometers—off limits. Anything entering the keep-out zones would be destroyed. "Rules of the road" would be established in space which would govern what would be threatening to U.S. assets and thus subject to attack.

Obviously, the Soviet Union, who even prohibits overflights over their territory of foreign satellites capable of direct television broadcasts, might have some objection to such "keep-out zones" and "rules of the road" over their territory. We certainly would if the tables were reversed. These matters would have to be negotiated by treaty, assuming that is possible. I would refer my colleagues to this unclassified staff report for a more detailed discussion of survivability issues. Suffice it to say that the staff report concludes that, "A closer look should be taken at whether * * * spaced-based assets can ever be made survivable."

The Pentagon responded to this staff report through an article in the April 7, 1986, issue of Aviation Week and Space Technology saying that the report's comments about satellite survivability:

> Represent only random comments by individuals with essentially no expertise in the design or construction of space systems. Moreover, the authors of the staff report have not talked to the managers of the SDI Survivability Program. This dearth of credible sources is characteristic of the staff report.

In fact, as the magazine article points out, the staff who authored this report talked to the SDI program manager for survivability and top scientists and researchers at the national labs who the SDI organization selected for the interviews with the congressional staff. They even talked to General Abrahamson himself.

More recently, the Pentagon has toned down their response to the congressional staff study and says that the staff "apparently drew heavily upon informal conversations they had during a congressional staff tour of SDI-related research facilities."

On April 4, 1986, Irwin Welber, president of Sandia National Laboratories, wrote a letter to Senator PROXMIRE clarifying its official position saying:

> Sandia National Laboratories has not reached the conclusion that spaced-based elements of a strategic defense system cannot be made survivable. No definitive conclusion—especially a negative one—is appropriate at this stage of the research program. Indeed, until we gain a better understanding of the elements of the system that will be based in space, and what their character should be, the only conclusion that we can draw is that survivability should be a major focus of our research.

Now why am I recounting all this to you? Because knowing the background of the recent controversy about the ability of star wars to defend itself from Soviet attack, you will appreciate the significance of an article just published in the April 18 edition of Science magazine by Michael M. May, who is the associate director at large at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory.

The article is entitled "Safeguarding Our Military Space Systems." I urge my colleagues to read the article in its entirety, but I would draw your attention to his statement that—

Space assets much more complex and expensive than the present ones must be safeguarded if there are to be effective space defenses, and they must be safeguarded against very severe threats. It is not clear to me when we will know whether this can be done. The sort of partial ASAT ban suggested above would not in the long term be compatible with an active R&D program aimed at testing the survivability of strategic defenses in space. We are therefore thrown back on whether and at what pace to proceed toward strategic defenses as the first question to settle * * *. However, we are not close to knowing whether an effective defense system can be built or what it would look like.

Mr. President, the star wars program is being hyped up and oversold. In the midst of this star wars snowjob on the Congress and the American people, our respected and knowledgeable scientists are trying to tell us something and we would do well to listen.

I am not suggesting that severe doubts about SDI survivability and other critical issues enumerated in our congressional staff study should lead us to abandon the program. To the contrary, I support robust ABM research on these issues. What I deplore are the statements by enthusiasts that the feasibility of star wars is now established and that it is just a matter of time and money before we can breathe a sigh of relief behind the so-called "peace-shield." Nothing could be further from the truth.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article entitled, "Safeguarding Our Military Space Systems," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAFEGUARDING OUR MILITARY SPACE SYSTEMS

(By Michael M. May)

(The vulnerability of military space systems depends on their orbits, functions, and other characteristics. The high-altitude satellites needed for warning and communications in particular could be vulnerable to prompt destruction by certain space-based systems and, in the future, possibly by ground-based high power lasers. A combination of passive countermeasures and arms control agreements could give these satellites some protection against such attack. Deployment of strategic defensive systems with the capability to reach far into space would invalidate this approach.)

The measures that can be taken to safeguard our military space systems or the functions carried out by these assets, the potential effectiveness of the measures, and the utility of arms control agreements vary according to the function to be safeguarded. Broad statements, arguing that space assets are few and fragile or that the deployment of antisatellite systems (ASAT's) is unverifiable, do not usefully summarize what can or cannot be done.

Military space systems consist of satellites, earth stations, and links between them. The characteristics that mainly affect the vulnerability of these systems, such as altitudes of orbits, nature of components, and the like are discussed in the first part of this article. Then various ways of attacking the systems along with steps that can be taken to counter the attack or make it less effective are described. Next, the adequacy of these steps in safeguarding some space system functions are evaluated, mainly to illustrate the kind of analysis that must be done in each case. Finally, the potential value of some arms control agreements in further safeguarding these functions is discussed.

VULNERABILITY OF MILITARY SPACE SYSTEMS

Space systems can be used for surveillance of either strategic assets or tactical situations, for warning, for communication, for weather information, for navigation, and for targeting. Figure 2 displays typical orbits for these various kinds of missions. The orbit is the main determinant of vulnerability. It determine the time and cost for an earth-launched ASAT to get to the satellite, as well as the power needed for a laser or particle beam to destroy a satellite. Warning and communication satellites are typically in very high orbits. Surveillance, weather, and targeting satellites, which need to see details on the surface of the earth, will typically be in lower orbits—how low depends on the scale of the details needed and on the resolving power of the optics. Radar surveillance and navigation satellites can be in intermediate orbits.

Several kinds of componentry might go into the various kinds of satellites: transponders used for communication, radar antennas, solar power panels, and internal electronics. Not all componentry would be on any one satellite, and there are other kinds. The ones shown in Fig. 3 are all necessary for some satellites. They illustrate the range of vulnerabilities that can be expected from most componentry.

Vulnerability can be due to material damage, blinding or jamming of sensors, or damage or false signals induced in the electronics. Let me take up material damage first. Some of the materials used on satellites that were designed without special attention to hardening can be quite fragile. Normal solar panels, for instance, will fail at relatively low levels of laser or nuclear irradiation. With special attention to the materials and design, however, the material problem can be solved to the point that a satellite can only be destroyed by either (i) a direct hit, (ii) a nuclear explosion sufficiently close that it can destroy only that satellite and no other,[1] or (iii) laser irradiation at levels than can be delivered only by sizable, costly facilities designed and tested for the purpose.

The blinding or jamming of sensors must be done by radar, infrared, or visible light sources according to the frequency band the sensor operates in. Such "in-band" jamming can be countered by rapidly changing the frequency at which the radar operates, by rapidly shuttering the optical elements of a camera, or by other measures. One particular countermeasure applies to infrared sensors. For launch warning purposes these sensors need only pick up, the infrared signal from the missile plume above the atmosphere. The plume emits over a whole range of frequencies. The frequency chosen for the sensor to react to, therefore, can be one that does not penerate the atmosphere. Jamming such a signal would require mounting the source on a rocket, greatly increasing the cost and difficulty.

Damage to electronics componentry can be induced by nuclear explosions above the atmosphere, by penetrating neutral particle beams from space platforms, or possibly by extremely powerful radar transmitters. There are effective countermeasures against damage by radar transmitters. Nuclear explosions can destroy a satellite, but, with proper system design, one nuclear explosion per satellite would be required. Space-based particle beams that can disable satellite electronics have not been designed. Counters to them are possible in principle at some cost in weight, and the particle beam satellite can itself be attacked.

Ground stations and links between the satellites and the ground are also needed for space systems. Ground stations usually are large buildings. The major options for lessening the vulnerability of ground stations are the same as the major options for lessening the vulnerability of strategic weapons systems: to defend them actively, to harden them by putting them underground, to hide them, or to make them mobile and proliferate them. The latter is probably the preferred approach for ground stations. Underground siting is difficult for facilities that must keep communications open most of the time with space, hiding is unreliable in the United States, and active defense would run afoul of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty requirements and may also be unreliable unless combined with some form of mobility and proliferation. Mobility can be, and is being, undertaken for several key systems with the use of airplanes, ships, and ground-mobile terminals.

The third element of space systems are the (electromagnetic) links between satellites and ground stations or among satellites. These links can be vulnerable to interference (including covert, deniable interference) unless measures are taken to protect them. The measures and countermeasures in this area are complex and classified and do not decisively favor either the offense or the defense. In general, it is difficult or impossible to deny with any confidence simple information, such as warning, even over a short period of time. Given a longer period of time, it is difficult to deny even complex information. If the information needed is both complex and time-urgent, however, as would be the case for a ballistic missile defense system, various means of interference, including nuclear means, could be very disruptive. Laser communication links are very robust against jamming and could offer a solution.

[1] What is said here and elsewhere in this article regarding nuclear explosions or lasers in space may not apply to nuclear-driven x-ray lasers.

ATTACKING AND PROTECTING MILITARY SPACE SYSTEMS

With this general survey of key componentry and vulnerabilities in mind, let me turn to the various methods of attacking and safeguarding space systems, concentrating on satellites since that is where the main technical questions are currently. Safeguarding ground stations and electronic links from attack is equally important, but the technological problems and potential solutions are probably more familiar.

Let me begin with nuclear explosives, which were the earliest ASAT's historically. Since there is no way to harden against a nuclear explosion that comes close enough to the satellite, the key improvement from the standpoint of survivability is to make sure that one nuclear explosion is needed to destroy each satellite. That is possible to do, except possibly against nuclear-driven x-ray lasers. Satellites are typically thousands of kilometers apart, whereas the lethal range of even a 1-megaton explosion against a satellite hardened to a feasible level of hardness is less than 100 km. (An unhardened civilian communication satellite could be damaged at distances of thousands of kilometers by a high-yield nuclear explosion in space.) Making satellites nuclear-hard thus serves to make the task of attacking space systems more complex and time consuming. Nuclear weapons, however, probably remain the cheapest way to attack a properly designed and hardened space system.

Conventional explosives and kinetic energy weapons, the latter of which are sophisticated guided bullets, can also be used against satellites. The guidance requirements are much more severe for high-explosive weapons than for nuclear weapons and even more severe for kinetic energy weapons that must hit the target.

Nuclear weapons, conventional weapons, and kinetic energy weapons could all be stationed in space. (Nuclear weapons in space are prohibited by the Outer Space Treaty.) Space-basing would greatly increase the cost of any ASAT system. On the other hand, space-basing an adequate number of weapons can decrease the time needed for ASAT's to put a target system composed of several satellites out of commission. This time element is particularly important in the case of warning and strategic communication satellite systems. ASAT system which can accomplish the destruction of these systems without giving any warning could be particularly dangerous.

Space-based ASAT systems that are to be effective on a prompt time scale against a hardened set of target satellites are likely to be noticeable, however, especially if the target satellites are placed into unique orbits. It may be difficult or impossible to determines without actual inspection what is inside a satellite. But maneuvering or emplacing a number of otherwise unidentified satellites close enough to the several target satellites to destroy them promptly is likely to give warning of hostile intent. Agreements that satellites will be kept a certain distance apart when in the particular orbits, or that they will submit to some sort of identification procedure if they come closer than a certain distance, would greatly increase the likelihood of warning. Such agreements, conventionally termed "rules of the road," will be discussed below.

Laser ASAT's, both ground-based and space-based, have the advantage that they deliver their lethal punch at the speed of light and the disadvantage that it is much more difficult and costly to package enough energy to do damage in laser beams than in explosives or bullets. For this discussion, assume that the sensors have been designed so that lasers cannot do permanent damage by in-band illumination at any greater range than they can damage other materials in the satellite. Materials can be damaged either by continuous irradiation above a certain level or by a large single pulse of energy. We will assume a damage threshold against both mechanisms within the present state of the art—that is, above that of unhardened satellites but below what advanced material research promises to do.

Under these conditions, powerful but presently or soon to be available laser systems (lasers with the necessary optics, pointing, tracking, and computer capability) could damage a satellite from 100 to 1000 km away. Satellites in relatively low orbits could be damaged by such systems based on the ground. The main problem is not the laser power but adaptive optics to compensate for the natural fluctuations in the atmosphere's optical properties. The lasers and optics could probably be hidden, but the pointing and tracking and other experiments needed to develop the full ASAT system would probably be detected.

A high-orbit satellite of the stated level of hardness, on the other hand, could not be damaged from the ground except by lasers with power and optics far beyond what is now available or what will be available operationally in the next 10 years. Not only are these lasers not available now or expected soon, but they would be extremely difficult to hide. They would probably be the size of a football field, with optical components and stable bases for them larger than most astronomical installations, with power supplies in the hundreds of megawatts at least, the whole installed in a region that should be free from cloud cover most of the time if the ASAT system is to be effective.

Research on advanced material and other techniques could give us satellites orders of magnitude harder than the present state of the art. To damage such future satellites even in comparatively low orbits would take very complex, noticeable laser facilities.

High-orbit satellites with state-of-the-art level of survivability could be damaged by space-based lasers deployed within 100 to 1000 km of the targeted satellites, but such space-based laser ASAT's could not sweep the sky clear of satellites in a short time unless they were deployed one-on-one. This would make the space-based laser ASAT system not only difficult or impossible to deploy covertly, but also probably much more expensive than the targeted system.

In addition to lasers that operate in the visible and infrared frequency range and can be based on the ground, x-ray lasers and particle beams, which cannot penetrate the whole atmosphere, could be based in space or launched into space at the time of the attack. The x-ray lasers would involve the use of nuclear explosions. Particle-beam accelerators would be high-cost items, for the same reason that optical and infrared lasers are, namely that expensive and heavy facilities would have to be orbited. Both x-ray lasers and particle beams are in the research stage.

SURVIVABILITY OF MILITARY SPACE SYSTEMS

How do these various threats to the space systems interact with the timely functioning of the systems and what can be done about it? The question of space survivability must be dealt with separately for each of the main types of space systems.

As a first example, let me consider warning and communication systems. They are stationed in high orbits, usually geosynchronous. They must function in minutes. Because of their central role in nuclear operations, interference with these systems in situations that do not threaten to become nuclear in any participant's judgment is perhaps unlikely. In situations involving nuclear threat or alert, on the other hand, these systems become salient potential targets.

Ground-launched, direct-ascent ASAT's would take hours to reach geosynchronous altitudes. During that time, there is a chance (how much of a chance depends on our detection capability and alertness) that they could be recognized and action could be taken. Such action could include evasive motion on the part of the targeted satellites (the reaction of ASAT's in turn could confirm whether or not there was an attack on the system), higher states of alert, and attaching more credibility to the other means of strategic warning. The plausibility of any particular would depend on the circumstances.

Although direct-ascent ASAT's against warning and communication systems might well be used in connection with a nuclear attack, space-based ASAT's and future, very powerful ground-based lasers that might be able to destroy the systems rapidly or without notice are of greater concern. As noted above, however, if we carry out the various measures now planned or in progress to make the warning and communication systems less vulnerable, to give them unique orbits, and to improve our ability to monitor what is going on in space in real time, we will probably be able to detect any ASAT system likely to be effective rapidly and will probably also know if an attack is in progress.

Low-altitude systems offer a more difficult safeguarding problem. The lower orbits make it easier for ground-based lasers and faster for direct-ascent ASAT's to destroy the satellites. We would probably know, from testing and other necessary activities, whether a threat existed and, with proper system design for survivability, the required ASAT system would have to be large and expensive. Thus, although sudden denial in a crisis of the information these satellites bring could not be ruled out, an attack could probably not be carried out in a covert or deniable way if we design the systems appropriately.

Different space systems have their own time lines, cost elements, and vulnerabilities. In most cases, perhaps all, easy or deniable interference with the systems can be prevented through the use of sophisticated techniques to protect communication links and by hardening satellites so that low to moderate power, ground-based lasers cannot damage them.

DISCUSSION

To reach some conclusion regarding the usefulness of various possible arms control arrangements in space,[2] we must have some notion of what eventualities we want to prepare against and at what level of priority. On the whole, there has been agreement that the essential warning and communication capabilities should be preserved at a very high priority even in the face of a nuclear attack. Much can be done to preserve these capabilities by unilateral measures. Stabilizing this situation seems a reasonable objective for arms control agreements in space, assuming there is not overriding rationale for deploying ASAT's in connection with or to deter conventional wars or crises, an assumption which seems warranted by history to date. Such an objective would lead us to focus first on space-based weapons and on ground-based laser systems sufficiently capable to damage hardened satellite systems, especially at high altitudes.

Verification is a major concern. There is no hope of arms control agreements being adequately verifiable unless we take the steps outlined above, as well as others, to enhance the survivability of the space functions as much as possible unilaterally, consistent with reasonable increases in systems cost. If we do not take these steps, small, not readily identifiable ground-based lasers, for instance, could have an ASAT capability. If we do take those steps, however, several agreements might enhance the security of at least the high-altitude space assets most relevant to nuclear stability in an adequately verifiable way. The following is a tentative and partial list.

(1) Develop rules of the road, that is, international agreements governing the use of space. These agreements might, for example, make it legal for any signatory nation to take some action regarding other nations' satellites coming closer than certain stated distances to specified satellites of its own. The stated distances and specified satellites would have to be worked out according to the orbits of the satellites to be protected and according to the requirements of civilian space users. Rules of the road that provide effective protection or warning may only be feasible in orbits that are not heavily used by civilian space users. The action to be permitted would also depend on the circumstances. It could range from requiring that entering legal satellites carry beacons to providing opportunities for inspection to acutal destruction of a trespassing satellite.[3] These rules of the road would not provide foolproof saftey against space mines and other space-based ASAT's. They would make the task of effective attack against certain space functions, which should already be a difficult matter if the systems carrying out these functions are suitably designed, more difficult yet and more uncertain.

(2) Ban the test and deployment of ground-based lasers in an ASAT mode. Bans on lasers in the appropriate power range coupled to sophisticated compensating optics to send the light through the atmosphere are probably very likely to be verifiable.

(3) Ban the test and deployment of projectile launchers, lasers, particle beams, and any other ASAT's in space. These would be in the main distinctive space installations that would require testing in space. The associated test program and deployment in numbers adequate to constitute a threat to a properly designed space system should both be verifiable.

[3] A. Wohlstetter and B. Chow. Wall Street Journal, 17 July 1985, p. 28 (eastern edition).

Such arms control measures would not make our satellites safe against nuclear attack by specially configured intercontinental ballistic missiles, for example. They could, however, augment unilateral measures in ensuring that warning and communication systems, especially, could survive for some crucial period of time in the event of a nuclear war or crisis. They could also help avoid deployments that seem to add little or nothing to our security and that might make the handling of lower level conflicts more difficult and more risky.

If extensive strategic defenses are deployed, the ASAT and counter-ASAT picture changes completely. This is particularly true if space-based weapons are developed and deployed. Under such circumstances, all space assets, whether needed for defense or offense, for warning or other purpose, would have to operate in a very hostile environment. They would have to be hardened beyond anything now contemplated, at commensurate cost, or alternatively be mobile, defended, or proliferated. Space hardware would replicate the characteristics of earthbound military hardware. We would have the space analog of tank corps and carrier battle groups. The recommendations herein do not apply to such an era. Arms control in such an era, if it were possible, would be closer to the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty—type of agreements, in which limits in the thousands or perhaps hundreds are agreed to.

The question of whether and when to proceed toward strategic defenses thus subsumes the question of safeguarding present space functions. Space assets much more complex and expensive than the present ones must be safeguarded if there are to be effective space defenses, and they must be safeguarded against very severe threats. It is not clear to me when we will know whether this can be done. The sort of partial ASAT ban suggested above would not in the long term be compatible with an active R&D program aimed at testing the survivability of strategic defenses in space. We are therefore thrown back on whether and at what pace to proceed toward strategic defenses as the first question to settle.

My view is that the right kind of strategic defenses could be helpful both to deterrence and to survival but that we are a long way from being able to tell whether that potential will be realized. Defenses could be helpful to deterrence, if coordinated with survivable offensive forces, by reducing both the real and the perceived differences between first and second strikes and by offering the possibility of defending against accidents and of stalemating limited attacks. They could also limit damage from a nuclear attack, if they are sufficiently survivable and sufficiently cost-effective so as not to lead to offsetting buildups.

However, we are not close to knowing whether an effective defense system can be built or what it would look like. We do not know for instance whether it should be based in space and to what extent, nor do we know what the component of the system should be. If space deployments are needed, a whole new regime of launch capabilities will have to come into being first. It thus seems unlikely that a strategic defense deployment of any value can begin within at least 10 years.

Thus the United States and the Soviet Union could agree to maintain the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty for some period of time, perhaps 10 years, possibly with exceptions to be negotiated for certain tests, without substantially harming the prospects for an effective defense. We could also complement the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty with ASAT agreements and rules of the road, those again to be good for the same period of time. Such measures could give us a chance to see what if anything new technologies might lead to in the way of a more satisfactory basis for peace.

CONCLUSION

Space systems are not all the same from the point of view of survivability. High-altitude systems, such as warning and communication systems, have the best prospects.

Similarly, ASAT systems are not all the same from either the standpoint of effectiveness or verification. In general, the more survivable the space system, the more costly and extensive the ASAT system needed to attack it effectively and the more verifiable a ban on such effective ASAT systems is likely to be. The exception is inorbit weapons, which might be handled with rules of the road.

Thus, from the point of view of safeguarding our space assets, especially our warning and communication assets which are most crucial for nuclear stability, there is a definite advantage to at least partial ASAT bans, if verifiable, and to appropriate rules of the road.

The deployment of strategic defense systems might change these conclusions. It might for one thing enormously increase the amount of resources that we would launch into space. However, that technology does not appear to warrant an early deployment decision for strategic defenses. As a result, it seems that proceeding with space arms control measures, in conjunction with unilateral survivability measures, is well warranted.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I extend to my distinguished colleague from North Carolina my apologies for taking so long with my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from North Carolina is now recognized.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, of course, I thank the Chair and I thank my friend from Louisiana, Mr. JOHNSTON.

THE PRESIDENT'S ACTION AGAINST LIBYA

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have never been prouder of President Reagan than I was last night when he informed the Nation that the United States had made a significant strike against the regime of Mu'ammar Qadhafi.

Clearly, the time had come when the United States was obliged to face up to the threat to international peace provoked by world terrorism. That threat was symbolized by the bomb placed in TWA 840. If the President had blinked, and nothing had happened, we would have seen a massive escalation of terrorism throughout the world.

It was necessary and proper for the United States to take decisive action—not in retaliation, not in vengeance, but to remove the existing threat. Qadhafi's capability to destroy innocent lives must be removed.

At the same time, Mr. President, our allies must recognize this fact, both in Western Europe and in the Arab world, that the time has come. Although the United States is the most obvious target of opportunity, all free nations are at risk. The European nations may have short range goals to continue their trade and investments in Libya; but in the long run their very existence may be threatened by the arbitrary terrorism of Libya's leader.

The Arab nations, too, must face the fact that Qadhafi is a threat to their stability and flexibility. For it is not just the Islamic fundamentalism that is the problem. Behind the surface turmoil lies the strong support and encouragement of the Soviet Union using the passions of the Middle East to undermine and weaken all non-Communist nations.

Unless both Europe and the Arab world realize that this is, at bottom, a confrontation between the Soviet Union and the free world, there will be no end to the destabilization of the Western World.

Frankly, I am deeply concerned that we as a nation, and the administration in particular, were being perceived as not having yet fully realized the incontrovertable fact that Libya, Iran, and Syria have declared war upon the United States by word and by deed. The President's powerful leadership has recognized that Libya is an important agent in world terrorism. But Qadhafi is just a front man. It is not just Libya that is the problem; Iran and Syria are far more fundamentally involved.

I am concerned that we are facing a clear threat to our Nation's security and to the security of our fellow citizens. Last June, in a Senate speech, I pointed out the intricate relationship between Libya, Iran, and Syria. I pointed out that on June 23, 1985, Libya and Iran signed a treaty of strategic and political alliance, just 9 days after the hijacking of TWA 847.

Yet I am sorry to see the perception that the administration was pursuing little more than a policy of rhetoric when it comes to Syria and Iran. It was all confined to Libya. Now Syria and Iran are pursuing a policy of war. There is no question about that, and rhetoric will never stop war.

Mr. President, no one wants war. Precisely because no one wants war, we must take those actions which will prevent a war from developing. Indeed, unless such action is taken, this Nation will be slowly dragged, more and more, into the war which we all want to avoid.

Mr. President, when, after the TWA 847 hijack crisis, I spoke in some detail in this Chamber on the subject of the international terrorism unleashed by Iran, Libya, and Syria, I noted that Iran was behind the TWA 847 attack. I also presented to the Senate extensive documentation gathered by my staff not only about that attack but also about the global network of terrorism that Khomeini has organized.

Since last June, Americans have been murdered by terrorists in the Achille Lauro attack, in the Rome and Vienna attacks, in the recent TWA 840 attack, and in the Berlin nightclub attack. Prior to this, hundreds of Americans have perished in attacks against our Embassies and against our military forces.

Therefore, Mr. President, I do hope that the administration will make a detailed presentation directly to the American people and to the press of the global infrastructure of terror that we are facing today. The public needs to know the facts and it is entitled to them.

I commend our distinguished colleague from Alabama [Mr. DENTON] for his determined and relentless efforts to expose international terrorism and educate not only our colleagues but also the American people. The hearings which he has held in the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, which he chairs, have been an invaluable service to our country.

In recent days, we have had to endure the spectacle of American officials being dispatched to Western Europe in order to seek cooperation with our supposed allies on the matter of international terrorism. This Senator can see no pressing need for our Nation to go hat in hand to the European governments, which have, so far, backed away from effectively defending their own people from international terrorism. We know all too well their excuses which put, under the guise of trade relations, the interests of their multinational corporations and their international financiers ahead of the security of the people of Western Europe.

And, today and last night, I felt obliged to ask: Do our friends in Europe not recall the enormous sacrifices of the American people during World War II? Where would they be today had it not been for the gallant men who gave their lives to rescue Europe from the clutches of Adolph Hitler? Is there no gratitude?

But, let me go back, Mr. President, and reiterate that the way to stop war is to take action against the facilities which give the capability of war.

When there is imminent danger that the peace will be endangered, or where there is a continuing breach of the peace where lives and property are threatened, it is necessary to stop the threat or the breach.

That is what the President had done in Libya. The American people would support not mere retaliatory air strikes. We have no need to "retaliate" against an enemy out of some supposed desire for vengeance. The only need to strike at Libya is to eliminate an immediate danger. That is what the President has done, and I commend him for it.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. Certainly.

Mr. McCLURE. I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from North Carolina for the statement he is making, and join with him in commending Senator DENTON for the hours and hours of dedicated effort he has put in through the subcommittee which he chairs to uncover the sources, the causes, and perhaps to point to some of the responses to international terrorism.

I think there are a great many people who have been waiting for us to take affirmative action and I suspect last night when it became apparent that this country was, under the leadership of President Reagan, going to respond very affirmatively and directly—there were two reactions. The most immediate one was "thank goodness, we are finally doing something;" and the second was "but I wonder where this leads us."

So I suspect most of the joy and support was tempered by a concern that it makes the situation better rather than worse. I join with the Senator in my own conviction that while this is a very difficult situation to know cause and effect, and to determine whether any specific action will make the situation better or worse, when you get down to really making a decision, and you have to choose between alternatives, this course of action was the best of the alternatives; that to do nothing is a worse alternative that surely would lead to a worsening of the situation.

I suppose that particular question will be debated endlessly, and the people will be analyzing it with meticulous care for months, if not for years, the course of events from this day forward as to whether or not it succeeded or failed.

But ultimately the President of the United States was confronted with an agonizing decision. No alternative was wholly satisfactory. I join with the Senator from North Carolina for commending the President for the courage to make hard decisions when hard decisions are called for when we far too often have seen in recent years a tendency to somehow duck that hard decision in the hope that the problem would somehow otherwise be dealt with.

I appreciate the Senator's comments.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, Senator McCLURE and I are mindful of the great leadership of Senator DENTON in this vital field. Unfortunately, for many, many months his activities have been almost ignored by the media, but I think that they cannot be ignored any longer.

But in any case, JERRY DENTON represents to me the finest spirit of America. I shall never forget the morning that the first contingent of prisoners of war came back home. Of course, JERRY DENTON was the first down the ramp, and his first words were "God Bless America." I recall on that occasion that he thanked the American people for letting him go and serve. Here is a man, I would say to my friend from Idaho, who had endured 7 years of hellish torment as a prisoner of war.

So I am certainly grateful to JERRY DENTON for all he has done and is doing, and I thank the Senator from Idaho for his remarks.

Mr. President, it is clear to this Senator that there is a very specific set of appropriate targets which is self-evident. The targets are the leadership and personnel of the terrorist organizations, their training facilities, their headquarters, their weapons caches, their supporters in foreign governments who sponsor international terrorism, and the infrastructure which these governments provide.

Mr. President, it is clear that such an infrastructure exists. In January 1985—6 months, before the TWA 847 hijacking—Libya, Iran, and Syria held a Foreign Ministers conference in Tehran to map out terrorist strategy for 1985 and beyond. In my statement here last June, I pointed to this as a clear indication of the nature of the war planning effort that these countries were engaged in. Terrorist attacks since last year have served to confirm this settled design and joint war effort.

Until yesterday, however, the United States had not acted effectively to counter this joint war effort. As a consequence, more and more Americans have perished at the hands of international terrorists and more will perish. We simply cannot escape the fact that Libya, Syria, and Iran are at war with our country. We cannot escape the urgent necessity to take whatever measures are necessary to defend ourselves.

Mr. President, there is only one form of response in this war. It is the direct use of lethal force in the degree necessary to destroy the intended target whether it be an individual terrorist in action, a terrorist headquarters building, a terrorist training center, a terrorist weapons cache, or any other part of the terrorist infrastructure operated by Iran, Libya, Syria and others.

Mr. President, this use of lethal force can be in the form of covert action or it can be in the form of overt military action for larger scale targets. The point is this. Lethal force must be used and used decisively in a timely manner.

The most appropriate and obvious targets for covert action are the leadership and operational personnel of the terrorist organizations who are at war with the United States. Wars are fought with the implements of war and not with lawsuits and political rhetoric.

THE TWA 840 ATTACK

Mr. President, the attack against TWA 840 resulted in the death of four Americans. Over this past weekend, millions of Americans witnessed TV clips of their funeral services and the funeral service of the serviceman murdered in the Berlin nightclub.

Mr. President, I have taken some trouble to investigate the background of these sad events by going to reliable sources outside of the intelligence community. I am not a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, and I have not asked to be made privy to classified information that might disclose sources and methods if it were revealed. Rather I have gone to my own sources which have proved exceedingly reliable in the past, and I present the following information in the belief that it will prove reliable in the future. I believe that the more information which is available for public discussion the better, and I invite any responsible criticisms or corrections which will help to foster understanding.

According to my responsible and well-informed sources in Lebanon and elsewhere in the Middle East, there is little doubt that May Elias Mansur, the woman who sat in seat 10F, where the bomb was planted, was responsible for implementing the attack.

Mr. President, Mansur is no normal housewife and businesswoman as she would have the Western public believe in her well-staged press opportunities. I believe that events will show that she is, in fact, a hardened terrorist who just killed four Americans.

These same sources give the following account of Mansur's terrorist past and present. In the early 1970's, she reportedly joined the Lebanese Action Party, a Communist party with a pro-Albanian line. She then became the companion to Abu Jihad who is the commander of Yassir Arafat's PLO military forces. She carried out several missions for the PLO, although in an apparently nonmilitary role.

In 1982–83, Mansur joined the Syrian Nationalist Party and was sent to London for several months.

In early 1984, my sources indicate that she joined the Abu Nidal terrorist organization. The Revolutionary Fatah is a breakaway group from Arafat's al-Fatah. She then traveled to Libya and stayed there until June 1985. She then returned to Lebanon via Tunisia and Cairo. After that, she regularly shuttled back and forth between Beirut and Cairo on special missions.

Finally, I believe that after many years of terrorist preparation, Mansur was entrusted by her superiors with the attack against TWA 840, a mission which was handled with deadly professionalism. According to some experts, had the aircraft not been in a low altitude descent pattern, it would have been completely torn to pieces by the force of the explosion and all aboard would likely have perished.

THE ABU NIDAL ORGANIZATION

Mr. President, the international terrorist known as Abu Nidal was an Iraqi and Syrian asset. In 1981, however, he was expelled from Iraq and began to operate out of Syria until 1984.

His organization, the Revolutionary Fatah, is based in Libya. It is said to have about 50 to 60 core members. Most of these terrorists are Palestinians but it is reported that there are also Turkish, Jordanian, Armenian, Lebanese, Bangladeshi, and Pakistani members. Many analysts, with reason, consider them to be the best professional terrorist organization in the world today. They are highly trained and highly capable professional killers.

According to recent information from the Middle East, there are indications that this group is planning to relocate to Lebanon. There, they intend to connect into the Khomeini Hisbollah terrorist network.

I would note that some sources in the Middle East believe that Abu Nidal himself is dead. According to these sources, he was flown from Damascas to East Germany in 1984 for cancer treatment. Near death, he supposedly requested to be flown to Bagdad to be with his family and to be buried there. It is said that he died in late 1984 and was buried in Bagdad at a funeral service attended by his family, supporters, and some press. In the confused network of Middle Eastern intrigue, no one has been able to establish with certainty the facts of this narration. Nevertheless, there are many experts who believe that this is the truth.

Since his reported death, these sources point to his former second-in-command, Abbas Saleh, known as Abu Ahmad, as the new leader of the organization. It is reported that he is frequently in Iran for consultations.

Since the Abu Nidal organization is hosted by Qadhafi, receives Qadhafi's direct aid and support, and operates on Qadhafi's behalf, the conclusion is inescapable that the TWA 840 attack was a Qadhafi operation.

QADHAFI SUPPORTS KHOMEINI'S HISBOLLAH

In Lebanon, Qadhafi had several terrorist formations which he supported. They were the Morabatoun and the Independent Nasserist Fighters. These pro-Qadhafi groups were crushed in 1985 by Nabi Birri and his Amal militia who are anti-Qadhafi and anti-Khomeini. The leader of the pro-Qadhafi terrorist formations, Ibrahim Gholailat, fled to Europe and now operates out of Paris.

My sources report that, after his Lebanese formations were crushed by the Birri forces, Qadhafi supported several smaller armed bands. Over the last year, however, he has formalized his cooperation with and support of the pro-Khomeini Hisbollah terrorist organizations based in Lebanon.

Last year, one of the Hisbollah Executive Committee members, Abdul Azziz Hakkim, visited Libya and obtained an agreement with Qadhafi for considerable financial support as well as military aid in the form of weapons and ammunition.

Qadhafi, through Hakkim, invited the Hisbollah to establish an office in Tripoli. Two key operatives were dispatched from Hisbollah's Lebanese organization to open this office. These agents are reported to be Hosseyn Sadr and Mehti al-Hashemi. Hosseyn Sadr, 38, is a member of the Islamic Revolutionary Council for the Liberation of Iraq and was related to Ayatollah Bagher Sadr who was executed by Iraq for subversive activity. Formerly a Shiite clergyman, Hosseyn Sadr became a trained terrorist. Mehti al-Hashemi, 40, was a teacher in eastern Lebanon. He is a close confidant of Hosseyn Mossavi the leader of the Islamic Amal terrorist organization. Al-Hashemi was a member of Khomeini's Iranian Revolutionary Guard command in the Bekaa Valley.

For joint Libyan-Iranian terrorist operations, Qadhafi's Abu Nidal organization representatives meet with the two Hisbollah representatives in Libya for planning and coordination. The Rome and Vienna attacks are examples of this type of joint Libyan-Iranian operation according to informed sources. As Admiral Martini of the Italian military intelligence service correctly observed, the terrorists involved in the Rome and Vienna operations were trained in Iran and, assisted by Syria, passed through Damascas on their way to West Europe. Logistical assistance was reportedly provided by Libya. For these types of operations, Libya provides not only false passports from Morocco or Tunisia, for example, but also makes available safehouses, weapons, explosives, and other assistance from Qadhafi's well-established terrorist infrastructure in Europe.

Mr. President, Senators should note that there are millions of aliens, many illegal, in Western Europe from Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, and other Arab countries. This massive population group provides ample cover for Middle Eastern terrorists and their operations as well as a recruiting ground for potential terrorists. Libya and Iran are known to fund substantial sums to labor organizations representing Arab workers in West Europe. Terrorists are recruited and then trained in Libya and Iran. They return to Europe to remain in place until they are activated for such operations as the Berlin nightclub attack. It is known that the West German Baader-Meinhof terrorist group as well as other European terrorist groups maintain close relations with Libya and Iran.

As for the Berlin attack, it is well known that the Libyan intelligence service, the Mukhabarat, is under the control of the East German intelligence service which itself is under the control of the KGB.

KHOMEINI'S HISBOLLAH IN LEBANON

Mr. President, Khomeini's terrorist force in Lebanon, the Hisbollah, is no longer the small single party that it started out as in 1981. Hisbollah has been transformed into a terrorist united front organization composed of both Shiite and Sunni terrorist organizations who retain their own separate identities but act jointly under an executive committee.

As I noted earlier, Mr. President, the Hisbollah has established an office in Tripoli, Libya, in order to better coordinate joint terrorist operations with Qadhafi.

After the TWA 847 attack last year, Hisbollah was reorganized and an executive committee was formed. The executive committee of Hisbollah contains 14 representatives from 5 terrorist organizations.

There are five representatives from the original Hisbollah organization. They are: Shaykh Ibrahim al-Amin; Shaykh Mohharram al-Arefi; Shaykh Sobhi Tofaili, the founder of Hisbollah in Lebanon; Shaykh Ahmed Zaki Toffane; and Shaykh Salaheddin Arghedan.

There are two representatives from Islamic Amal. They are: Hosseyn Mossavi, its founder, and Shaykh Abbas Mossavi.

There are two representatives from the Iraqi section of the Al-Dawa party. They are: Abdul Azziz Hakkim and Shayk Muhammad Hosseyn Nasseri.

There are two representatives from the Kuwaiti section of the Al-Dawa party. They are: Mehti al-Moussavi and Dr. Mahmoud al-Dashti.

There are two members of the Islamic Towhid Movement, a Sunni terrorist organization. They are: Shaykh Said Shabban and Eng. Abdullah Babati.

The chairman of the Hisbollah Executive Committee is the former Shaykh Muhammad Hosseyn Fadlallah. During February of this year, Fadlallah and a number of Lebanese terrorist leaders traveled to Iran for a 6 to 7 week visit. On February 11, Ayatollah Khomeini formally installed Fadlallah as an "Ayatollah." This was a highly unusual ceremony because it was the first time that Khomeini had conferred the title of "Ayatollah" on a foreigner.

Khomeini's Chargé d'Affaires in Beirut, Mahmoud Nourani, is reported to always participate in the meetings of the Hisbollah Executive Committee. His role is to convey plans for terrorist operations directly from Tehran. He also proposes terrorist operations on his own initiative as well as counsels the Hisbollah Executive Committee on terrorist operations and plans they develop themselves.

Until February of this year, Iranian funding of Lebanese terrorist organizations flowed either through the Iranian Beirut Embassy, the Shahid Foundation based in Iran, or the Iranian Revolutionary Guards stationed in the Bekaa Valley. Since February, however, the funds flow only through Nourani at the Embassy. The Hisbollah Executive Committee then apportions the money among its member terrorist organizations.

QADHAFI'S SUBVERSION IN THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

Mr. President, as chairman of the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee, I would draw Senators' attention to the fact that Qadhafi has developed a terrorist infrastructure in the Western Hemisphere, particularly in Central America and the Caribbean region. He has done this in order to not only destabilize the governments of countries friendly to the United States but also to have a base of operations for terrorist attacks against the United States itself.

Libya has financed the election campaigns of several extremist Presidential candidates in the eastern Caribbean. Libya has provided several hundred million dollars to the Communist regime in Nicaragua. Libya has established a presence in Surinam and has used Surinam as a transshipment point for the delivery of Soviet bloc war materiel to Communist Nicaragua.

Mr. President, last year, Iran purchased a large shipment of rice from Thailand. This rice was then transfered to Libya which in turn gave it to the Communist regime in Nicaragua as a gift. This same pattern has occurred with Argentine beef. I would also point out that it has been revealed by sources within Qadhafi's own palace that he is a heavy user of the drug cocaine which the Communist government of Nicaragua makes available to him.

For its part, Iran maintains at least two major bank accounts in Panama for its operations in the Western Hemisphere. Last year, Khomeini promised the Communist regime in Nicaragua some 200 busses which will undoubtedly be used as troop transports. Sources inside Iran report that Iranian President Khameni will visit Nicaragua sometime this year and that President Ortega plans to visit Iran this year.

Mr. President, as I stated at the outset of my remarks today, the time has long since come for decisive and effective action to combat the ever-growing international terrorist apparatus of Libya, Iran, and Syria. It is time for a serious national decision to employ the necessary means, particularly through covert action, to systematically eliminate the very real and present danger posed by international terrorism to our Nation's security and to the well-being of our fellow citizens.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ELECTRIC CONSUMERS PROTECTION ACT

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is absent due to illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 80, nays 18, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 66 Leg.]

NOT VOTING—2

Goldwater	Hawkins

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to table was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The bill is open to amendment by the Senator from Montana, and only the Senator from Montana.

The Chair announces that if the Senator from Montana does not offer an amendment at this time, there is no further debate. Is there further debate?

The question is on agreeing to the committee substitute.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, as we discussed this morning——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order unless the Senator offers an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, may I offer my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator wishes to offer an amendment, it is his right.

Mr. MELCHER. A parliamentary inquiry. Is it proper for me to discuss my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not before offering the amendment.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1784

(Purpose: To provide specific wheeling authority under sections 211 and 212 of PURPA)

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, earlier this morning we spoke at some length, at least 1½ hours, about an amendment I will be introducing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is out of order unless he sends an amendment to the desk.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I am sending an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No debate is allowed until the amendment is sent to the desk.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I am sending an amendment to the desk. I call the attention of a page and hopefully someone will come and take the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] proposes an amendment numbered 1784.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

S. 426 is hereby amended by adding the following new section :

"SEC. . WHEELING OF POWER.

(a) Section 211 of the Public Utilities Regulatory Policy Act of 1978 (16 U.S.C. section 824(j) is amended as follows—

(1) Strike out subsection (c)(1).

(2) Strike out subsection (c)(2)(B).

(3) Redesignate subsections (c)(2), (c)(3) and (c)(4) as subsections (c)(1), (c)(2) and (c)(3) respectively.

(b) Section 212(1) of the Public Utilities Regulatory Policy Act of 1978 (16 U.S.C. section 824(k)(1)) is amended as follows:

(1) Strike out 'electric utility,'.

(2) Insert ',or, in the case of any electric utility affect by the order, is not likely to unduly affect the cost of service provided to its customers,' after 'order'."

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, as I was stating earlier this morning we discussed the proposed amendment that is now at the desk and before us. We had discussed it on Friday when we were on the bill previous to that. I had described the amendment. I had circulated the amendment to committee staff of both sides prior to Friday and stated that if the amendment does not do as I purported it to accomplish, then, of course, I would like to know what its fallacies and faults were and make some corrections in order to make it an agreeable amendment.

There are none of us, I believe, here in the Senate who do not agree that we would like to give all utility companies the opportunity for transporting of electric power that they have to transmit it on lines that have the room or have the capability of transmitting it so as to provide for good business practices, and that is what we call wheeling.

Wheeling by one utility company that has the capacity for transmitting of power generated by another utility is widely done, and the question, of course, immediately occurs if it is widely done, do we need anything more in the law to augment what is already presently in the law.

The answer to that is, "Yes," there are occasions when the applicant company that generates some power and wants to get it wheeled by another utility is refused by the utility having the capacity to transmit that power.

So, this amendment seeks in a narrow way to make a correction in existing law.

I have earlier discussed the point that the Federal Power Act passed in 1935 did not correct the situation. The amendments to the Federal Power Act adopted in 1978, the PURPA Act, sought to do that.

Over the weekend, I asked for a critique on the amendment from the Edison Electric Institute. They were very gracious and very cooperative in providing me with that critique on Monday by noon, and they found fault with it.

I have gone over their critique and have recognized a legitimacy of their complaints, but it is coming down to the crunch where their complaints are not agreed to by attorneys on the other side.

I have described this, Mr. President, to the managers of the bill. We have had some opportunity to debate the questions of how to correct it and get something that we can agree on.

Let me outline, again, Mr. President, what I suggest should be the basis of agreement. The utility company, which owns the transmission lines where the wheeling is to be done is paid for the service by the second utility company. Now on this amendment which I now have offered and where fault has been found by Edison Electric Institute and by the managers of the bill, I would seek to modify the amendment. And let me tell you why.

The sections of the Federal Power Act, as I earlier mentioned, passed in 1935 and as amended by PURPA simply have not closed all the gaps. These are my objectives in the amendment which I hope we can finally adopt, whether it is in the form as it is now or whether it is modified.

These criteria are as follows: That the utility company with the transmission lines must have room, that is, unused capacity to carry additional electrical power.

Second, the utility company with unused capacity on its transmission lines cannot be forced to carry additional power if, in doing so, the circumstances would significantly burden the utility company's ratepayers. In other words, I seek in my amendment that the amendment would not have a significant cost or harmful cost effect on the consumers of a utility company required to carry electrical power generated by the other utility companies seeking the wheeling contract.

Third, the need by the applicant utility company asking for the wheeling contract must be able to demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission—FERC—that the wheeling contract is in the public interest.

And, last, the fourth point is, the wheeling contract must not violate State law.

Now, this is really an old issue. The Federal Power Act passed in 1945, of course, did not resolve the issue. Section 211 and section 212 of that act were amended by PURPA in 1978 and there were quite a few in Congress and in the electric utility industry that stated that those amendments would resolve the issue. That has not proven to be the case.

It is true that we have had a significant number of voluntarily negotiated wheeling service agreements. Over 1,380 such agreements have been entered into since 1976, and they are filed with FERC. So that is progress. But it is very apparent that wheeling contracts are in the public interest and that it is good business practice for both sides, the utility company that gets paid for transmitting electrical power and the second utility company that can have the power carried on unused capacity of an existing transmission line.

Now, this point should not be lost, Mr. President, by the wheeling contracts that have been entered into. There have been occasions when, just because of the wheeling contracts, there was not any need to build a new transmission line. New transmission lines, at their best, raise a point on the satisfaction of the environmental requirements and almost invariably raise the question of the esthetic value. And so to avoid any blight on the environment or any blight on the esthetics of the area, every time we can avoid the construction of a new transmission line, we are much further ahead, and there is a sigh of relief from almost all sides.

I want to compliment the Western Systems Coordinating Council, which includes a large part of our Big Sky Country of Montana, who have worked diligently and consistently to make sure that where wheeling contracts are practical and efficient and needed, all sides get together and agree on them. And so it is on that type of philosophy that I seek to have an amendment that will satisfy all those four criteria that move us forward with more opportunities for wheeling contracts to be entered into. We have the opportunity in this bill to do just that.

Now, the managers of the bill, very properly—and I fault them not at all for doing so—say, well, they do not understand exactly what is needed. If we have almost 1,400, and perhaps even more than 1,400 voluntary agreements, if we have all those agreements, surely the system works. Why do more? Why get into this?

They are not awared, they state, that there is a problem. Well, yes, indeed, there is a problem. The American Public Power Association, long known for its advocacy of more wheeling contracts, in July 1985, put together some of the problems as they saw them. In other words, they describe instances where they felt that a wheeling contract should have been granted. I read some of those this morning. I will not repeat those. But let me read you a couple more.

Kentucky Utilities has refused to wheel power from the Southeastern Power Administration to eight Kentucky cities since 1974. A 1980 SEPA complaint to FERC resulted in a decision that the Commission had no authority to order KU to wheel under the Public Utilities Regulatory Policy Act of 1978 (PURPA) because such wheeling would not "reasonably preserve existing competitive relationships," as PURPA requires. The Department of Justice began an antitrust action to compel KU to wheel the SEPA power in 1981.

I believe that case is probably in trial right now. This is an old report from the American Public Power Association. They projected that the case would be tried this spring.

The second one that I will cite this afternoon that they state demonstrates the need for some change is:

The giant American Electric Power Corp. forces other utilities, dependent on its monopoly ownership of transmission, to forgo short term and opportunity sales and purchases. AEP will not sell transmission service in less than 12-month time segments, and imposes unreasonable notice requirements. A utility which uses transmission for one day must pay for 12 months, and in some cases must make a formal request 60 days in advance for reservation of capacity for no less than one year. The upshot is that AEP acquires a competitive advantage over other generating utilities through its control of the transmission system. It is ensured access to markets closed to others.

A third one, and these are the only three that I will mention this afternoon.

Wisconsin Electric Co. has filed wheeling rates, but it interprets the terms of the tariff to define all transactions as firm, this pricing them at high, firm wheeling rates rather than lower interruptible rates. Wisconsin Public Power, Inc., a publicly owned power agency dependent on Wisconsin Electric transmission services, states that only about half of its transactions are in fact firm.

What does all that say? What do those three examples say?

Mr. President, what these little utilities are saying is, they would like to have a forum—the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, which is empowered by law to resolve these.

I have heard the argument, well, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has all the authority they need. That is not found to be true.

So the amendment would seek to correct that. The amendment is directed at wheeling contracts on the consideration of those contracts by FERC, one utility with the other utility, and one utility company with the other utility company.

We are not trying to reach out and correct everything. We are trying to have FERC be able to resolve some of the cases that come before it or would come before it if FERC had the authority to act on it in such a way that it made it practical to put the case before FERC. It is not creating something brandnew. It is creating the opportunity for FERC to do the right thing. That is all.

On that basis, I believe we can get an agreement for that purpose, not to disrupt what so many utilities have told me they fear some wheeling amendments might do. And that is, to enter into a situation where the ratepayer of the utility that would be wheeling the power under contract would lose money on it, thereby being a harmful effect on their ratepayers.

We do not want to do that. We should not do it. Or the other situation where the law would be changed to the extent that FERC would order a wheeling contract for a utility where they would have to sacrifice some of their own transmission. That we do not want to do.

I, above all, do not want to be instrumental in any amendment which would result in either of those cases.

But I do hear, I do sympathize with, and I do believe it is in the public interest, this lament. There must be a forum—that should be FERC—for the smaller utility companies to ask for relief from the terms and conditions set by a utility company that is abusing good business practice in the public interest by not accepting a wheeling contract when they have the capacity to do so, and when it shall not hurt their own ratepayers.

Mr. President, I think we can arrive at the language for such an amendment that would be helpful. At times it appears to be dismal to arrive at proper language and proper time, and be able to agree that, yes, indeed, that is what the language will do, and it is in the public interest. But, Mr. President, I think it is paramount that we continue that effort.

I am pleased that we had the amount of cooperation we have had so far. It has not resulted in good language yet that is acceptable. But I do want to pursue it for a day or two, and hope very desperately that we can make some progress on this point.

It is now a quarter of 5, 4:45, and perhaps I should yield the floor for purpose of a recess. I do want to discuss my amendment further.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to oppose the proposed wheeling amendment.

Although "wheeling" enjoys a simple definition, that is, the transmission of electricity between two noncontiguous utilities over the lines of a third utility while, ironically, it is a technical, complex issue.

It is my understanding that my good friend, Senator MELCHER, is troubled by the absence of a mechanism in S. 426 to assure services for utilities which are allegedly denied access to these services. It is also my understanding that he would like for the FERC to be empowered to order the transmission of "wheeling" of power by the big utilities, subject to just and reasonable terms and conditions. I would like to address each of these concerns.

First the proposed Melcher amendment assumes that wheeling services are not being encouraged and provided under the Federal Power Act, as amended by PURPA in 1978.

Sections 211 and 212 of the Federal Power Act, as amended by the Public Utilities Regulatory Policies Act [PURPA] were carefully crafted by Congress to provide encouragement for utilities to voluntarily engage in efficiency-enhancing wheeling transactions, while also providing important protections to all electric consumers with respect to both rates and reliability.

Dramatic increases in the provision of voluntary transmission services have resulted. Between 1976 and 1983, transmission delivered by private electric utility companies increased by 82 percent while total sales increased by only 16 percent. Nationwide, between 1976 and 1985, voluntarily negotiated wheeling service agreements on file at FERC increased by over 110 percent to 1,380 agreements. Agreements to wheel power to municipal and cooperative utilities increased during that period by 80 percent.

As an example of the high degree of voluntary wheeling provided on a regional basis, investor-owned utilities within the Western Systems Coordinating Council [WSCC] which includes a large portion of Montana, currently have 214 transmission service agreements on file with FERC. About half of them provide for transmission service to public or co-op customers.

The argument has been made that because there have been no wheeling orders issued pursuant to the PURPA wheeling amendments, that the statute is not working. However, Congress, in passing these, did not abandon the concept—inherent in the Federal Power Act—of encouraging voluntary wheeling among utilities. Rather, PURPA was intended to provide a means for FERC to issue wheeling orders only where parties are unable to reach voluntary agreement. At the same time, the PURPA amendments were intended to provide important consumer protections against the provision of inefficient, costly transmission services or those services which would adversely affect system reliability.

Without compelling evidence in more than a couple of isolated instances that the present voluntary approach is not working, the Senate should not act precipitously to change a system that has produced dramatic increases in transmission services in the last decade. The almost total absence of requests for wheeling orders under sections 211 and 212 of the Federal Power Act as amended by PURPA—only three have been requested—is a good indication that those desiring economic and efficient wheeling services are able to obtain the services they require through private business negotiations without the need for governmental interference and compulsion.

The 1978 act was adopted in the context of perceived energy shortages. The limited mandatory authority conferred by Congress upon the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission was thought to be necessary to conserve energy and improve the reliability of electric service. As stated previously, since the enactment of PURPA, significant increases in transmission or wheeling services have taken place. These increases have come about in a fashion consistent with the carefully crafted guidelines adopted by Congress in PURPA. No case has been made to tamper with these existing provisions or to reject congressional policies which have encouraged the best and most economical electric service in the world.

The second concern of my good friend, Senator MELCHER, is that Congress should grant FERC the power to order the transmission of "wheeling" of power by the large utilities.

PURPA has served well, not by forcing mandatory wheeling, but by encouraging voluntary wheeling agreements. As I said earlier, Mr. President, between 1976 and 1985 voluntary wheeling agreements on file with FERC increased 110 percent, to 1,380 filed agreements.

Senator MELCHER's concern is that no orders have been issued under section 211 of the Federal Power Act. This is so because most legitimate needs for wheeling have been accommodated. Again, it is my understanding that only three such section 211 orders have been applied for.

Wheeling is a very complicated issue. It requires more extensive study than a proposed floor amendment, which eliminates protection for consumers of the wheeling utility. The entire issue is presently under study in Docket RM 85-17 at FERC and by the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners [NARUS] and at the Office of Technology Assessment.

Congress has already encouraged voluntary wheeling to promote economic efficiency but should avoid support for mandatory wheeling that has the destructive effect of disrupting existing wholesale customer relationships and failing to take into account utilities' obligation to serve its own retail customers at the lowest possible cost.

For these reasons, I urge the defeat of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, this amendment does only three things. All three of them are very, very bad. None of the three things which it does resembles what the Senator says he wants to do. Indeed, the three things have no similarity to it.

This amendment, first of all, repeals the antipirating amendment of PURPA. Mr. President, we put the antipirating amendment in because it is not right to pirate somebody else's customers. It is not in the public interest. It is not fair. It is a charge and a cost to some customers in favor of those to be wheeled. And almost everybody that I know, except maybe those who want to pirate the power, agree with that.

Second, this amendment permits under the guise of FERC ordering wheeling to abrogate contracts; that is to say, if there is a valid existing contract in terms of furnishing power, and a schedule for that filed with the FERC under the Senator's amendment, you could come in and preempt that valid subsidizing contractual relationship. That is the second thing it does. That is what it is meant by the subsection (a)(2), the striking out of subsection (c)(2)(b). It is exactly what it means. It is all it means.

Third, Mr. President, it repeals that provisions of existing law which says you cannot get wheeling if it is going to result in a reasonably ascertainable uncompensated economic loss to an electric utility.

Mr. President, it is basic not only in our Constitution, but in all our laws that you cannot take something from someone else without compensating them. The Senator's amendment would repeal that provision of PURPA so carefully crafted and put in the law that says you cannot under the guise of wheeling make another utility suffer an uncompensated loss.

How in the world, Mr. President, the Senator disagrees with any of those three principles I do not know. They are in the law. They were put there intentionally. There has been not one word, not one whit, not one jot or tittle said on the floor here that I can understand to disagree with three principles. Yet that is all his amendment does, is to repeal those three principles.

Mr. President, we have stood ready for not hours, but for months to try to come to an agreement on the question of wheeling. We think the present law is proper. If it is not, please give us an amendment, and we will look at it. But we have not seen anything yet other than the present amendment which has been introduced, which is neither similar to that which has been described by the distinguished Senator from Montana, nor is it in the public interest.

Mr. President, I will yield at this point to my colleague from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, we have debated this issue at length. I do not know what we can do to accommodate the Senator from Montana. I do not question that he is sincere in his desire to find an answer. But I do not know what that answer is.

I share with the Senator from Louisiana the conviction that if indeed the Senator from Montana has an amendment, we will look at it.

We will try to see whether it is acceptable. The one that is before us is obviously not acceptable.

Mr. President, I move to table the amendment and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I understand the distinguished chairman, as manager of the bill, would like to put us into recess. I thought he was going to do that before the tabling motion or I would not have suggested the absence of a quorum. I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNITL 6 P.M.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess from the hour of 5 p.m. until the hour of 6 p.m. today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senate stands in recess until 6 p.m. this evening.

Thereupon, at 5 p.m., the Senate recessed until 6 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. McCLURE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I am sending a modification of my amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

The modification is as follows:

S. 426 is hereby amended by adding the following new section :

"SEC. . WHEELING OF POWER.

(a) Section 211 of the Public Utilities Regulatory Policy Act of 1978 (16 U.S.C. section 424(j)) is amended as follows—

(2) Strike out subsection (c)(2)(B).

(3) Redesignate subsections (c)(2), (c)(3) and (c)(4) as subsections (c)(1), (c)(2) and (c)(3) respectively.

(a) Section 212(1) of the Public Utilities Regulatory Policy Act of 1978 (16 U.S.C. section 424(k)(1)) is amended as follows—

(1) Strike out 'electric utility,'.

(2) Insert ', or, in the case of any electric utility affect by the order, is not likely to unduly affect the cost of service provided to its customers,' after 'order'."

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I think it would be in order——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senator from Montana that no further debate is in order on the amendment as modified. The question is on—

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

[Quorum No. 4 Leg.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the motion to table the amendment of the Senator from Montana. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Are we still in the quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are not.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum has just been established, without intervening business.

The clerk will call the roll on the motion to table.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I withdraw the amendment, and I ask for a little consideration to——

Mr. McCLURE. Regular order.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, may I be recognized?

Mr. McCLURE. Regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order unless the Senator offers an amendment.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I am going to put in a quorum call now, but prior to doing that, I would suggest that we could make more headway with a little more consideration of what we are doing here tonight in order to avoid holding everybody around here, wondering whether or not a vote is imminent. A vote is not imminent.

So, now, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no intervening business. A quorum call is not in order.

Mr. McCLURE. Regular order, Mr. President.

AMENDMENT NO. 1785

(Purpose: To provide specific wheeling authority under sections 211 and 212 of PURPA).

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I shall send up another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] proposes an amendment numbered 1785.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, has the clerk reported the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk is attempting to do that right now.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Chair.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

S. 426 is hereby amended by adding the following new section:

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

S. 426 is hereby amended by adding the following new section :

"SEC. . WHEELING OF POWER.

(a) Section 211 of the Public Utilities Regulatory Policy Act of 1978 (16 U.S.C. section 824(j)) is amended as follows—

(1) In

(2) Strike out subsection (c)(2)(B).

(3) Redesignate subsections (c)(2), (c)(3) and (c)(4) as subsections (c)(1), (c)(2) and (c)(3) respectively.

(b) Section 212(1) of the Public Utilities Regulatory Policy Act of 1978 (16 U.S.C. section 824(k)(1)) is amended as follows:

(1) Strike out 'electric utility,'.

(2) Insert ', or, in the case of any electric utility affect by the order, is not likely to unduly affect the cost of service provided to its customers,' after 'order'."

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, let me explain a couple of things, so that whatever Members are here or listening on the radios in their offices can understand.

When I was speaking at 4:45, prior to the briefing, we were informed that the majority leader would like to have us go into recess at 4:45, so I relinquished the floor. It was not my intention this evening, at least at that point, to get to a tabling motion and force a vote.

Unfortunately, when I relinquished the floor, the managers of the bill, operating under the belief that we were going to recess at 5 o'clock, took the floor and did what they were inclined to do, and which they were perfectly entitled to do, and that is to move to table the amendment, which requires a vote, unless I just want to let it go by.

We were not to the point of having an amendment that is in any way acceptable to either manager or to a great number of the membership of the Senate, simply because the amendment is at fault or the amendment is not properly understood by the managers of the bill.

It is not my desire to have some useless votes on any amendment that I offer on this wheeling provision. I would like to have a vote when we can get close to an agreement on one; and perhaps even when we get to an agreement, no vote will be necessary.

It can just be adopted by voice. But I do not want to let my colleagues believe that I am trying to set the stage to force a requirement for recorded votes on into the evening.

I would like to present something that makes some sense to the managers and makes some sense to my colleagues and apparently we are not at that point. We do have some modifications that go directly to the points that were raised.

A point was raised that the amendment would permit pirating. Counsel on one side says that is not true. But if that were true the language can certainly be changed to demonstrate to every one's satisfaction that it does not set up pirating nor does it permit pirating.

The second point that was raised had to do with striking subsection (C)(2)(b) that would override contracts. Then again lawyers on one side argue "No, it doesn't do that because I can override contracts in other provisions of the FERC requirements." Nevertheless, if that is a point that will be interpreted that way, I would like to modify the amendment so it is clear that it does not.

Finally, on the third point, the question of what the phrase "or in the case of any electric utility affected by the order is not unlikely to unduly affect the cost of services provided to its customers."

Adding that phrase causes some of the membership to believe that we are creating some very complicated situations that will work adversely to the private utility company that is providing the wheeling services.

That is not the intention nor do counsel on one side believe that it does that.

But on those three points, we think modifications can be made and in so doing, I want to have the consideration of the managers of the bill and their review and see whether they can agree to that, that the modifications are correct and go in the direction of satisfying their objection.

That is my intention and Mr. President, I want to get on with the drafting of those kind of modifications to satisfy the managers.

For that reason, now I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today in opposition to S. 426, the Electric Consumers Protection Act. This legislation has been portrayed as merely an effort to clarify ambiguous provisions of the Federal Power Act of 1920. It is, in fact, far more than that. It is not a bill to protect electric consumers. It is not a bill in the public interest. It is a bill that would destroy competition. And that, Mr. President, is not in the long-term best interest of either the American ratepayer nor the American taxpayer.

In the early part of this century, conservationists such as Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot realized that our Nation's public water resources had to be protected from monopoly control in the hands of giant private power corporations. Over the next 10 years, their concerns were refined by Congress in debates over comprehensive legislation to permit the private development of public water resources.

That legislation, the Federal Power Act of 1920, established two key provisions: Limited license terms, and the preference in licensing and relicensing provided for States and municipalities. Both of these provisions would be undermined by the passage of S. 426.

The bill does not eliminate the requirement for limited term licenses. However, it virtually assures that existing licenses will be able to retain control over licensed projects in perpetuity by giving preference in relicensing to existing licensees. This idea of control in perpetuity of a public resource was rejected by the Congress in 1920. It should likewise be rejected again.

The bill also eliminates the municipal preference in relicensing. The preference clause does not ensure automatic granting of a license to States or municipalities; rather, it operates as a "tie breaker" when all other factors are equal. It does not guarantee that a municipality will win in every competitive proceeding.

Municipal preference is extremely important in stimulating competition in relicensing. One has to understand that the strength of the competitors in relicensing is grossly unequal. Municipal utilities are, on the whole, relatively small, certainly smaller than most investor-owned utilities. The relicensing preference is therefore little more than an attempt to equalize the relative strengths of the potential competitors for new licenses at existing hydroelectric sites.

I might point out that while nearly 140 licenses have expired since 1970, only 11 competitive applications have been filed with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission for new licenses by public power systems. No licenses have yet changed hands. Yet benefits have accrued to the public as a result of the preference clause in the few competitive relicensing proceedings filed.

In some of these cases, the incumbent licensees filed applications for license renewals that indicated existing projects could not be improved. Public agencies then filed competing applications demonstrating how improvements might be made. These improvements included plans to increase the power production potential of the project, mitigate environmental consequences of the project, or add recreational facilities. The investor-owned utilities were then forced to amend their own initial proposals and offer similar improvements.

Clearly, the competitive relicensing process benefits the public. I should add that the General Accounting Office made precisely this same point in a report to Congressman Ottinger in May 1984.

Tennesseans are particularly concerned about this legislation. The Tennessee Valley Public Power Association, representing 160 municipal and electric cooperative distributors of Tennessee Valley Authority power, has urged me to oppose this legislation. Public preference was one of the underlying principles of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. In addition, Tennessee ratepayers benefit from the preference policy in terms of their access to federally generated power at certain Corps of Engineers dams. If enacted, S. 426 would be the first assault on the municipal preference principle. It could well invite attacks on this preference in Federal power marketing.

Mr. President, I find it curious that a bill entitled the Electric Consumers Protection Act should be opposed by both the Consumer Federation of America and the Consumer Energy Council of America. They don't believe it will benefit the consumer, either.

Mr. President, I oppose S. 426 because it eliminates the municipal preference clause in relicensing. I believe the elimination of this clause will significantly reduce competition in the relicensing process, which is not in the best interest of our country's consumers. I also oppose S. 426 because it could eventually undermine the Federal public power marketing preference. I urge my colleagues to oppose this legislation.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to S. 426, the hydro-relicensing legislation currently before the Senate. While I cannot support this particular bill, I very much support efforts to reform the process by which hydroelectric projects are licensed.

The Federal Power Act, which regulates licensing of hydroelectric plants, has largely remained unchanged since 1920. That law was enacted to govern the use by private and publicly held utilities of public waterways for the purpose of generating power.

In the 56 years since President Theodore Roosevelt signed the Federal Power Act, there have been hundreds of changes in the ways utilities do business and in the circumstances surrounding the use and vitality of our nation's waterways.

Amendments to the law are essential to ensure that utility customers pay the lowest rates possible for electricity and to guarantee that hydroelectric energy remains a viable and reliable source of power. Important environmental and wildlife concerns must be addressed as well.

Mr. President, I believe that all of these criteria are met in H.R. 44, legislation reported by the House Energy and Commerce Committee. While I commend members of the Senate Energy Committee for their diligent work to reform the hyrdoelectric relicensing process, I believe that the House language is preferable and would urge the conferees on this legislation to adopt it.

Most importantly, the House bill clarifies the standards which the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission [FERC] uses in evaluating license and relicensing applications. Currently, those standards are sufficiently confused and befuddled to have caused an enormous amount of litigation and a corresponding amount of uncertainty among utilities and ratepayers concerned about obtaining new licenses or renewing expiring ones. Because many of the 50-year licenses will soon expire, including 13 in my own State of Vermont, these standards must be updated and clearly defined.

H.R. 44 clarifies that protection of the environment and proper management of fish and wildlife resources must be given equal weight with other concerns in the evaluation of license and relicensing applications. The bill also strengthens the energy conservation criteria used in the licensing process in recognition of our national commitment to energy independence.

In addition, the House legislation prescribes a rigorous process for reevaluating applications for relicensing. Unlike the Senate bill, H.R. 44 requires a utility to continually prove that its project is the "best adapted" to energy and environmental concerns and provides ratepayers the lowest possible price for electricity. As the House Committee report states, this approach "ensures that an existing license will not be rubber stamped," but will be subject to careful examination, taking into consideration the management of fish and wildlife, the environment, in general, and the needs of electric power consumers.

Finally, the House bill strikes a compromise on the issue of public preference in relicensing—one of the most divisive factors in this complicated and important debate. Under current law, FERC must award a license for a hydroelectric facility to a publicly held utility if a privately held utility presents a proposal of identical merit. This public preference has served our Nation well, but also needs reform to ensure that fair competition for licenses may continue to provide ratepayers with electricity at the lowest price possible.

The House bill preserves the public preference—the preference for State and local government utilities—for original hydroelectric power licenses. The preference, however, is discontinued in the relicensing process.

H.R. 44 also provides an adequate system for compensating public and private utilities that lose a hydroelectric facility in the relicensing process. This important provision protects ratepayers who, through their monthly utility payments, have helped finance construction and improvement of hydroelectric dams.

Finally, Mr. President, I support H.R. 44 because it is good for Vermont and good for Vermonters. The legislation ensures critical reevaluation of the impact of hydroelectric facilities on our special State's most valuable commodity—the environment. The interest of outdoorsmen and fishermen are equally protected under this important measure. The House bill also ensures that Vermonters, who must already devote a tremendous amount of income to energy costs, will find electric energy readily available at competitive rates.

Mr. President, while proposed changes in hydro-relicensing legislation have divided investor-owned and publicly held utilities across this Nation, I am proud to report that the two major private utilities in Vermont, Green Mountain Power, and Central Vermont Public Service, join the State's publicly held utilities in supporting H.R. 44.

I ask unanimous consent that letters from these three organizations appear in the RECORD.

I applaud Green Mountain Power, CVPS, and Vermont Public Power for their diligent efforts to arrive at this important compromise and for the excellent guidance they provided me and my office. Specifically, I wish to express my gratitude to Governor Thomas Salmon and Steven Terry of Green Mountain Power, Thomas Hurcomb of CVPS and Paul Bradtmiller of Vermont Public Power. Their efforts truly attest to the commitment that all Vermonters share to the protection and improvement of our State.

There being no objection, the letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VERMONT PUBLIC POWER SUPPLY AUTHORITY,
Williston, VT, April 8, 1986.

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LEAHY: Thank you for your letter of February 12, 1986 regarding the hydro-licensing bill introduced by Senators Wallop and Johnston, S. 426, as it pertains to federal policy on promoting the most comprehensive and equitable use of our water resources. Information received subsequently regarding amendment to the House version of hydro-relicensing legislation, H.R. 44, confirms the concern of the Vermont Public Power Supply Authority (VPPSA) that the Wallop-Johnston bill as presently written would not serve the best interests of all electric consumers.

I have reviewed the Report of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce dated March 25, 1986, and have concluded that H.R. 44, as recently amended in Committee, contains superior provisions, of which the following are considered key:

(a) The distinction between the relicensing and preference in power marketing fits the mix of investor-owned and consumer-owned electric utilities in Vermont, and is consistent with the Vermont method of allocation of Preference Power.

(b) The restructured relicensing process to restrict preference to original licensing in order to make it fair and competitive is reasonable and more protective of the consumer.

(c) The special emphasis placed on environmental issues and energy conservation is consistent with our priorities in Vermont.

Accordingly, on behalf of the VPPSA Systems, and thereby municipal and cooperative electric ratepayers throughout Vermont, I urge that you support the provisions of H.R. 44 over those of S. 426, as hydro-relicensing legislation comes up for passage in the Congress.

Sincerely yours,
PAUL H. BRADTMILLER,
General Manager.

CENTRAL VERMONT PUBLIC SERVICE CORP.,
Rutland, VT, April 11, 1986.

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LEAHY: During the last few days I have met twice with Paul Bradtmiller the general manager of the Vermont Public Power Supply Authority to discuss and review in detail the two hydro relicensing bills presently before Congres, S. 426 and H.R. 44.

Mr. Bradtmiller and I have concluded that H.R. 44 will more adquately protect and preserve our customers' interests with particular emphasis on environmental and energy conservation issues.

I would request that you carefully review and support H.R. 44.

Sincerely yours,
THOMAS J. HURCOMB,
Vice President, External Affairs.

GREEN MOUNTAIN POWER CORP.,
Burlington, VT, April 14, 1986.

Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR PAT: I understand that the Senate will very soon be considering S. 426, the hydro-relicensing legislation.

I have reviewed the provisions of S. 426, and H.R. 44, the House-passed version of the federal hydro-relicensing bill. Green Mountain Power believes that H.R. 44 does a better job in protecting our customers' interest than will S. 426. GMP has discussed this legislation with representatives of Central Vermont Public Service Corporation, and the Vermont Public Power Supply Authority. We have all concluded that H.R. 44 best protects the interests of Vermont, and our respective customers.

I urge your careful review and support of H.R. 44.

Sincerly yours,
JOHN V. CLEARY, Jr.,
President and CEO.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of the bill, I rise to express my support for S. 426, "The Electric Consumers Protection Act." I want to commend Senator WALLOP for introducing the bill and the Senate Energy Committee for getting it to the Senate floor. The issue before us today is important to many of my constitutents in Alabama.

When the Federal Power Act was written in 1920, a preference was given to municipalities for the initial licensing of hydroelectric projects. The preference means that if a municipality and, for example, an investor-owned utility were both to submit equally well adapted project applications, a preference would be granted to the application of the municipality. That preference for initial licensing is not being challenged. The need for the legislation before us has arisen because the Federal Power Act has proven ambiguous about whether the preference shown municipalities for originial licensing is also available to them upon relicensing.

In 1968, the Federal Power Commission, the predecessor to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commissioin [FERC], represented to Congress that no such preference for municipalities existed at relicensing. In 1980, the FERC reversed the earlier opinion, saying that a preference would apply. In 1983, the Commission again reversed direction, holding that a preference was not required by the act. On October 22, 1985, a three judge panel of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the 1983 ruling by FERC, but on January 16, 1986, the circuit court, sitting en banc, vacated the panel's decision and is presently reconsidering that case. This action demonstrates the need for this bill.

S. 426 is designed to dispel once and for all any ambiguity contained in the Federal Power Act. The legislation makes clear that existing licensees, whether public or investor owned, shall retain their projects and protect their customers and their investors. If FERC determines that they will continue to operate the projects in the public interest and in accordance with the best adapted standard provided for in section 10(A) of the Federal Power Act.

In the initial licensing process, the municipal preference stated in section 7(A) of the Federal Power Act governs and operates, in effect, to preclude any competitive interplay among competing applicants. In contrast, the relicensing process under S. 426 will still allow for full consideration of any and all competing applications filed by applicants seeking to beat the existing licensee in a best adapted project contest, as well as of all competing and contrasting ideas and positions of invervening parties, State and Federal Government agencies and of course, the FERC staff.

In Alabama, Alabama Power Co. serves more than a million electric consumers, all of whom could adversely be affected by the interpretation of the Federal Power Act to give an unqualified municipal preference in relicensing proceedings. Alabama Power Co. currently owns and operates 14 hydroelectric projects on the Coosa, Tallapoosa and Warrior Rivers. The projects were designed and constructed to meet the energy needs of the citizens of Alabama. Hydroelectric power is, without question, the most inexpensive source of energy that can be provided to electric consumers. If Alabama Power Co. were to lose any of its existing hydroelectric projects, it would be necessary to replace the loss with alternative sources of energy. All of the alternatives are far more costly. Although the cost situation is of particular concern to the citizens of my State, there are other reasons why S. 426 should receive our support.

There is no sound policy reason to support the transfer of a project from an existing licensee to another simply because a license term has expired and a new license for an additional term is to be issued. If an existing licensee will, based upon all available information at the time of relicensing, continue to operate the project in the public interest, including making the improvements in structure or operation required to achieve the necessary environmental and other project values, it should be given the opportunity to do so. To transfer a license to another entity based on any ground other than a licensee's failure to perform in the public interest would be unfair. S. 426, which would eliminate the risk, is a fair and equitable answer to the ambiguity found in the Federal Power Act.

The issue of the compensation to be paid to an existing licensee that loses its license has been of great concern to those on both sides of this bill. S. 426, as originally introduced, provided for just compensation. The committee decided, however, to strike this provision.

The current bill requires the FERC to assess the negative impact of the loss of the project on the customers of each applicant. FERC is specifically directed to consider the difference between the compensation which would be due the existing licensee under the net investment plus severance damages standard of the Federal Power Act and the cost of replacement power for the existing licensee. Although the term "just compensation" was questioned, it represents the concept embodied in the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution that no private property shall be taken for public use without just compensation in accordance with the due process of law. While I acknowledge that the water resources to generate power for the facility is public property, the power facility itself was paid for by the utilities' customers.

I know that the committee has attempted to balance the need to adequately compensate the ratepayers that paid for the project and also encourage a degree of competition. I commend the members of the committee for their efforts to resolve this issue.

Mr. President, more than 75 percent of America's electricity consumers are served by regulated utilities. Due to the municipal preference at initial licensing stages, and other Federal laws and developments preferential to public power systems, the more than 75 percent of American consumers served by regulated utilities have rights to only 32 percent of the hydropower available in the Nation. The consumers of existing investor owned utility licensees should have the same opportunity to continue to enjoy the benefits of hydropower that are available to the consumers of existing public power licensees. I strongly urge passage of S. 426.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, the hydroelectric relicensing legislation (S. 426) we are considering could have a very damaging effect on the public preference provision. The Federal Power Act of 1920 established the method of developing hydroelectric power resources and the sale of that power. The act provided muncipalities and other public power entities, such as rural electric cooperatives, with a preference in competing for dam sites and power generated at federally operated dams. The legislation we are considering today will eliminate this preferential treatment when hydroelectric projects are relicensed.

It is critical that we make it clear that this modification in the preference power provision is not intended to affect the preference municipalities and rural electric cooperatives receive in the sale of hydroelectric power generated at Federal dams and sold by the Federal marketing authorities. This preference is crucial to the economic survival of rural electric cooperatives and small towns. These public power entities do not have the resources to compete with large investor-owned utilities or even large municipalities for hydroelectric power. The preference power provision must be maintained for these public power consumers.

Mr. President, I want to stress that this legislation will not affect the preference power provision in regard to the sale of power from Federal hydroelectric projects and Federal power marketing authorities. The legislative record must clearly show that we do not intend this bill to have any effect on the public preference provision for the sale of Federal hydroelectric power.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there will be no more rollcall votes this evening.

It will be my intention hopefully to complete action on the relicensing bill tomorrow. We will come in about 10 o'clock. There will be six special orders and then there will be a vote on the motion to proceed to the Hobbs Act, S. 1774, which would occur at about 11 o'clock tomorrow. If that motion is agreed to, then we would be on the Hobbs Act. If cloture is invoked, is that correct, we will be on the Hobbs Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If cloture is invoked it would be on the motion to proceed and then we would be on the motion to proceed.

Mr. DOLE. That is true. Then we would have 30 hours. Hopefully it may be that we can work out some agreement on that.

But it would be my guess that cloture would not be invoked on the motion to proceed and we would be back on this proposal under the same terms and conditions that we leave it this evening; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is correct.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 7 p.m. with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Chair.

RETALIATION BEGETS RETALIATION

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, 3 weeks ago, I rose on this floor to question the timing and usefulness of U.S. freedom of navigation exercises conducted in the Gulf of Sidra. Retaliation begets retaliation, I said, in an unending spiral of violence. As the Libyan people count their dead and assess the damage done by 33 American bombers, I rise again to question military action taken against Libya.

Colonel Qadhafi's 17-year reign in Libya has gone sour. Shortages of consumer goods have become more severe in recent months as Libyan oil revenues shrink. His once successful coalition between various tribal groups and the Libyan Armed Forces has fallen apart, and factionalized tensions are running high. Libya's moderate neighbors including Tunisia, Sudan, and Egypt no longer offer automatic support in the name of Arab unity. Libyan expert Lisa Anderson recently asserted in the Washington Post that Qadhafi is "* * * ripe for a coup, and my guess is that he'll be gone within a year."

The obvious response of a leader with domestic troubles is to turn his nation's attention to real or perceived external threats. Nationalism leads to national unity when an external threat is made clear. As United States bombs dropped on Libyan targets last night, that threat could not have been more clear. As Ms. Anderson pointed out even before last night's strike:

> Ironically [Qadhafi is] surviving now largely because of the escalating American campaign against him—which has rallied patriotic Libyans to support a regime they otherwise disliked.

Moral outrage and fear have risen dramatically in recent months as the United States watches terrorism go unpunished throughout the world community. Because our evidence so clearly points to Qadhafi's culpability in many of the recent bloody attacks, that outrage and fear can be translated into punishment. By putting Qadhafi on the defensive, the rationale goes, the United States shows that terrorism will not go unpunished. Just as we did 3 weeks ago in the Gulf of Sidra, the United States has proven a point.

Notice has been served, and today we are riding high but tomorrow, and next week, and next month, the consequences of our rash desire for retribution will have succeeded in rallying an otherwise factionalized nation behind its crazy leader.

The negative long-term consequences of last night's strike will not be limited to Libya, however. Only international resolve will quell terrorism, isolating its sponsors and denying their lifeblood.

In the past several years, Western resolve has been patiently yet persistently sought on three separate issues. In 1981, exhausting conversations took place between the United States and Western European leaders on how best to bring economic vitality to the alliance. When the United States realized that voices of dissent had been raised in Western Europe over the deployment of Pershing 2 and cruise missiles, leaders again thoroughly discussed the issues until a resolution was reached. Even as we talk, similar discussions are ongoing regarding the strategic defense initiative. Each of these issues has been deemed so important as to demand that we sit down at the negotiating table and not get up until resolve is reached.

Yet last night's attack received only the blessings of England. Western European hesitation to join United States sanctions against Libya has fueled our frustration. West Germany and Italy receive the majority of their oil from Libya, and 40,000 Western Europeans are now living in Libya. Terrorists though often targeting Americans, tends to strike on Western European soil.

Western European hesitation may be understandable. It is not, however, acceptable nor is it necessarily unalterable. Proof that Colonel Qadhafi was undeniably behind the recent West Berlin disco attack which killed 2 and injured more than 200 went a long way toward convincing Western Europeans that Libya's hands are bloody. A meeting of European Economic Community foreign ministers in the Hague yesterday produced the strongest condemnation of Libya yet heard in Western Europe.

Mr. President, we got up from the negotiating table far too quickly. The West Berlin disco bombing seemed a catalyst for mobilizing Western European public opinion against Qadhafi. The current oil glut lends itself to restructuring Western European oil supplies. Dialog and consensus building rarely make headlines. But working with the Western Europeans rather than imposing our plan on them might have achieved meaningful resolve rather than destabilizing factionalism.

The implications will be no more pleasant for our moderate Arab allies. Condemning terrorism and calling for peaceful conflict resolution, several Arab nations have put themselves and their political stability on the line. Egypt's President Mubarek faces mounting opposition from radical factions in his nation and threats from various groups outside Egypt. Tunisia has felt threatened since Tunisian workers were expelled from Libya last fall. Saudi Arabia watches anxiously as the Iran-Iraq war threatens to spill over into Saudi oil fields. By pursuing diplomatic policies which address forthrightly the Palestinian problem we could deprive Qadhafi of his anti-American lifeblood. We could undergird our moderate allies in the region. Instead, we have embarked on a course which will only strengthen Qadhafi's stature in militant circles of the Arab world and erode the ability of those who might be in a position to challenge him.

Mr. President, Gandhi once said that "means are the end in the making." If he was right—and it is my firm conviction that he was—one stark, irrefutable, bottomline fact emerges from last night's bombing. The vast moral gulf which once separated us from the terrorists was narrowed yesterday.

A terrorist deliberately seeks the innocent. We sought to destroy military targets in Libya last night. But when the smoke had cleared, we had inched one step closer to the terrorism we sought to punish and deter.

There may be an indisputable moral distinction between the bombs that went off in Berlin and the ones that exploded in Libya. Yet the only clear justification which filters through the barrage of briefings and explanations and commentary is that it felt good. It felt good and, dammit, the monster deserved it. Mr. President, I would bet that the monster is laughing sick laughter right now.

How can one bask in the emotional satisfaction of revenge against Mr. Qadhafi's warped lust for violence while witnessing on television the agony of bleeding children in a Tripoli hospital? Sure, that is the reaction Mr. Qadhafi wishes to evoke as he parades television crews through the hospitals and clinics. But that is not the point, because it does not diminish the human cost of this action.

We missed the target, Mr. President. That is the point. Not in the traditional military sense of hits and misses. We missed the target because the terrorist target is profounding ubiquitous—worldwide—infinite. We did not hit the target. We grazed the symbol. Because that is all Colonel Qadhafi is—a symbol in the form of a sick clown. Destroy Qadhafi himself and you do not destroy terrorism. Destroy Libya and you do not destroy terrorism. The cause he symbolizes will continue to slither like a snake in the midst of the innocent population. And no bomb is going to stop it.

Take another look at those bleeding children before you delight over the precision of the rockets my colleagues. Tell them you are not sure the policy will work, but it sure did feel good. There will be more victims. And there will be only one difference between the status quo which existed prior to initiating this policy and the status quo which follows it. Before only they had the blood of innocents on their hands. Now we both do. Before we had moral authority. Now we share the vacuum of immorality.

Have we ignited a prairie fire of violence and reprisal for which there is no end in sight? Fanaticism was not bombed out of existence Monday, nor will it cease to exist the next time we strike back.

Mr. President, Teddy Roosevelt once said that "A just war is * * * better for a man's soul than the most prosperous peace." If he was correct—and I do not think he was—then certainly "just revenge is better for a man's soul than an imperfect peace marred by terrorism." At least it would appear that way, judging from the reaction in the streets and in the Congress. This is our contemporary manifestation of the Roosevelt thesis. I hope that we all stop and think about that. And think about Gandhi's words—that the means are the end in the making. Because only in that light can we possibly draw ourselves away from more of this senseless violence, that old familiar friend who comes around every time our best instincts fail us.

In the words of a German philosopher:

> Whoever battles with monsters had better see that it does not turn him into a monster.
> And if you gaze long into an abyss, the abyss will gaze back into you.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I just got here for the final few pages of the Senator's speech. I simply want to commend my colleague from Oregon for standing up courageously, for saying some things that I fear are right.

There is no question about Mr. Qadhafi's direct relationship with the bombing that occurred in Berlin, but the question is whether we are wise and prudent in doing what we have done. And in addition to the very moral questions the Senator from Oregon has raised is this question: Have we elevated Qadhafi in Libya or weakened him? My fear is that we have elevated him rather than weakened him, and the same in the Arab world.

Prior to a few weeks ago, he was a pariah in the Arab world. I fear that is no longer the case.

The Senator from Oregon has, typical from MARK HATFIELD, shown great courage. I simply want to commend him for that courage and for raising the questions that we ought to be asking ourselves.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I thank my good friend and colleague from Illinois, Senator SIMON. I would only say to the Senator that these are not easy times for anyone, about whichever side of the issue one may feel strongly on this particular occasion. But I do feel we have to call to conscience in order to at least raise questions; whether we have answers and solutions, at least ask questions about the validity and the wisdom of policy, particularly in matters of war and peace. And it is out of a call of conviction and conscience that I rise to make these comments I rise not because of any pleasure, not because of any satisfaction or anything else that it provides me, because it does not.

And yet I would feel less than responsible to my conscience if I did not at least take this occasion to hopefully in a respectful way, in a contributing, and in a positive way, at least to question some of these policies that are escalating hour by hour and day by day.

I want to thank the Senator for his kind remarks.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, if I can add one other point to what the Senator made which concerns me. The Senator said it makes us feel good. I have the feeling that we are responding to feelings rather than the national interest, and that is a very easy thing to do. It is very easy 5 years from now to look back, and say what the answer is. But we are dealing with this thing right now, and what is right.

The Senator helped to prick our conscience on this.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator withhold?

Mr. HATFIELD. I withhold that request.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator, my chairman on the Appropriations Committee.

SENATOR DOLE RECEIVES "THE VICTORY OF THE HUMAN SPIRIT" AWARD

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on April 7, 1986, our esteemed colleague, majority leader DOLE, received the Victory of the Human Spirit Award during a special ceremony at the Kennedy Center, sponsored by the newly opened National Rehabilitation Hospital here in Washington, DC.

He and three other outstanding Americans, including Edward Kennedy, Jr., the son of the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts, were so honored for showing that while personal disabilities may impose certain physical limitations, they need not impose limitations upon one's spirit, ambitions, or the pursuit and conquest of goals.

As the majority whip pointed out yesterday, it was 41 years ago yesterday that, while serving this Nation during World War II, a young and healthy 2d Lt. ROBERT DOLE was severly wounded by enemy gunfire.

This injury ended young ROBERT DOLE's dream of a medical career, but it could not end his pursuit of a career in public service. Mr. DOLE went on to serve in the Kansas Legislature, as Russell County, KS, attorney, and in the U.S. House of Representatives, 1960–68. In 1968, he was elected to the U.S. Senate. From 1971–73, he served as chairman of the Republican National Committee. In 1976, he was the Republican Party candidate for Vice President. Now he is the majority leader of the U.S. Senate.

Having served in that position myself, I know the demands and pressures of the job. In the 15 months that Senator DOLE has held that position, as all of us know, he has shown that he can meet these challenges effectively and successfully.

I am pleased that the promoters of the ceremony chose to recognize and honor the distinguished majority leader for his ability to overcome adversity and for his accomplishments. I congratulate him on the receipt of the award, and say that it is well deserved. Like Presidents Franklin Roosevelt and John Kennedy, and a number of other successful American public servants, such as our own distinguished Senator INOUYE of Hawaii, the majority leader has shown that America is indeed a land where dreams can and do come true despite physical limitations, that people can and do triumph over adversity, and that Americans should be recognized and appreciated for their abilities and should not be limited by their disabilities.

I congratulate my friend. Again, I say I am happy to have seen him receive this distinguished award.

I yield the floor.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to on behalf of Senator DOLE express appreciation to the Democratic leader of the Senate for his commendatory remarks on the award given to the majority leader, Senator DOLE of Kansas.

We all share in that. I also think it is illustrative of part of the glue of our Senate which may sometimes confound the casual observer as to how we may debate issues and appear to have such strong convictions that must eventually erupt into personalities or ruptured relationships. From the casual observer standpoint, people are puzzled at times when the Democratic leader will arise on an occasion of this type and make a public record concerning the distinction of an award given to the majority leader, and how that happens in both directions in the Senate.

I call it the glue of the Senate. There are a lot of things that make up the glue.

I want to thank the Democratic leader for his gracious remarks. I know that the Senator from Kansas, our majority leader, will express his own personal appreciation as well. I just cannot let this occasion go by, now that I have this powerful role for the moment of being the representative of the majority leader, but to respond in such a way.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it is characteristic of the Senator from Oregon to speak in this fashion. I said a moment ago that he is the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and he is distinguished, but he is more than that. He is considerate of others on both sides of the aisle who have their duties to perform as members of the Appropriations Committee. He is always understanding and courteous. I salute him for that.

We are Senators, but, after all, we are human beings and we have to get along with one another. Not only do we have to, but it is easy to get along with people like you, Senator HATFIELD, if I may go outside the rules of the Senate for a moment and speak to the distinguished Senator from Oregon in the second person.

I thank the Senator for what he means to all of us and for the example that he sets for us. He is fair, he has the courage to speak his mind, and I am happy to consider him my friend.

He is not only a good Senator but, perhaps, even better, he is also a gentleman.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am very grateful to the Senator for his gracious remarks.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Democratic leader at this time if he is ready to handle some of the business that I have been assigned to raise before the body.

JOINT RESOLUTION HELD AT THE DESK—HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 582

Mr. HATFIELD. First of all, Mr. President, I will inquire as to holding at the desk House Joint Resolution 582.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no objection.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate receives from the House Joint Resolution 582, "Education Day," it be held at the desk pending further disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRINTING OF THE REPORT "DEVELOPMENTS IN AGING, 1985"

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Democratic leader if he is ready to consider Calendar Order No. 525, Senate Resolution 305.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection on this side of the aisle to proceeding with Calendar Order No. 525, Senate Resolution 305.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 305) relating to the printing of a report entitled "Developments in Aging, 1985."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to consider resolution.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 305) was agreed to, as follows:

S. RES. 305

Resolved, That there shall be printed for the use of the Special Committee on Aging the maximum number of copies of volume 1 of its annual report to the Senate, entitled "Developments in Aging: 1985", which may be printed at a cost not to exceed $1,200.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A REVISED EDITION OF THE SENATE ELECTION LAW GUIDEBOOK

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask the Democratic leader if he is ready to consider Calendar Order No. 529, Senate Resolution 356.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection on this side.

Mr. HATFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to consideration of Calendar 529, S. 356, authorizing the printing of a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate resolution (S. Res. 356) authorizing the printing of a revised edition of Senate document numbered 99-23, entitled "Senate Election Law Guidebook 1984" as a Senate document.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

AMENDMENT NO. 1786

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of Mr. MATHIAS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD], for Mr. MATHIAS, proposes an amendment numbered 1786.

In line 2, after the word "numbered" strike out "99" and insert in lieu thereof "98",

Amend the title so as to read: "Authorizing the printing of a revised edition of Senate document numbered 98-23, entitled "Senate Election Law Guidebook 1984" as a Senate document.".

Mr. HATFIELD. This is a technical change, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1786) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution (S. Res. 356) was agreed to, as follows:

S. RES. 356

Resolved, That there be printed a revised edition of Senate document numbered 98-23, entitled "Senate Election Law Guidebook 1984", as a Senate document, and that there be printed for the use of the committee additional copies of such document not to exceed the cost of $1,200.

Mr. HATFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. I ask the distinguished minority leader if he is prepared to consider Senate Resolution 383, a resolution marking the 10th anniversary of the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act's becoming law.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection on this side and we are prepared to consider the resolution.

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF MAGNUSON FISHERY CONSERVATION AND MANAGEMENT ACT

Mr. HATFIELD. I send the resolution to the desk and ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate resolution (S. Res. 383) marking the 10th Anniversary of the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act becoming law.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, today I am joining several of my distinguished colleagues in introducing a resolution marking the 10th anniversary of the enactment of the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act [MFCMA]. Sunday, April 13, marked the 10th anniversary of the Magnuson Act being the law of the land. In order to pay the proper tribute to former Senator Warren Magnuson, who led the effort to pass this important fishery conservation law, I am seeking prompt passage of this resolution.

Under Senator Magnuson's leadership, the United States was able to assert jurisdiction of our fishery resources out to 200 miles from our shores. These marine fisheries resources comprise the largest, most varied and valuable fisheries resource in the world. Over 20 percent of all marine fisheries are found in this zone. It includes one-fifth of all the traditionally marketed fish and shellfish in the ocean, and about 90 thousand miles of tidal shoreline offering numerous and varied recreational opportunities.

During the decade prior to final passage of the act, Senator Magnuson had long been concerned about the serious plight of the American fishing industry and the progressive deterioration of our fishery resources. It became clear to him that the regulatory powers of the United States over these fisheries were insufficient. In response, Senator Magnuson framed this historic legislation upon on two fundamental goals that are still the basis for the act today. First. the United States was to reduce and manage the foreign fishing fleets and give preference to the U.S. industry. The second goal was to create a national management program, centered at the regional level, for management and conservation of the resources for all fishermen and future generations.

With passage of the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act, the United States established exclusive management authority over most fishery resources within 200 miles of our Nation's shores. The act created a fishery conservation zone, or FCZ, extending seaward from the 3-mile territorial waters to a distance of 200 nautical miles. Eight Regional Fishery Management Councils were created to manage the fishery within the FCZ, in cooperation with the Department of Commerce. Foreign fishermen were permitted to harvest that portion of the fish resource which would not be harvested by vessels of American fishermen, but only if the foreign nation had entered into a strict agreement with the United States and had paid license fees established by the Department of Commerce.

Our fishing industry is worth nearly $10 billion per year to our economy. Since passage of the Magnuson Act, our commercial fishermen alone have almost quadrupled their catches. The important role this law has played in helping our domestic industry grow cannot be overstated.

On an occasion such as this, however, it is also appropriate to recognize our other colleagues who not only contributed to the development of the Magnuson Act, but who also are ensuring that it is properly implemented. The Senator from the State of Alaska, Mr. STEVENS, stands out in this regard. That distinguished Senator was an active floor manager of the act, has been a leader in promoting the interests of the American industry, and remains as important a force in shaping fisheries policy as anyone. He was additionally the Senator who offered the successful amendment naming the act—the Magnuson Act. He deserves a great deal of credit and our thanks for his role. Senators PACKWOOD, HATFIELD, HOLLINGS, KENNEDY, INOUYE, PELL, and WEICKER also were leaders 10 years ago in securing passage of this landmark legislation.

Mr. President, I believe it is fitting that we honor Warren Magnuson for all that he has done to help conserve our fishery resources and promote our domestic fishing industry. His role as chief architect and father of the act 10 years ago deserves our attention and tribute. The Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act is appropriately named.●

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my name be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 383) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution with its preamble is as follows:

S. RES. 383

Resolved,

Whereas Sunday, April 13, marked the 10th anniversary of the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act becoming the law of the United States of America (Public Law 94-265);

Whereas that Act extended U.S. jurisdiction to encompass over 3 million square miles of the world's most productive fishing grounds and 20 percent of the world's fishery resources;

Whereas that act instituted conservation and management for these stocks which has previously been heavily overfished and depleted by foreign fleets, and thus has permitted this Nation to manage our fisheries for the benefit of both present and future generations;

Whereas that Act provided unprecedented incentives and preferences for U.S. fishermen and processors, and since the Magnuson Act was passed, the U.S. fishing industry has almost quadrupled its catch;

Whereas Warren G. Magnuson, who honorably served Washington State in the U.S. Senate from 1944 to 1981 was the Nation's preeminent leader in securing passage of this landmark legislation and was honored for this effort by having the Act named after him: Now, it is hereby

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States recognizes and declares its highest respect and deepest gratitude to Warren Magnuson for his tireless and successful efforts to promote the conservation and management of our marine fisheries, and to provide our commercial and recreational fishing industry the ability to gain the full benefits of those vast and valuable resources.

Mr. HATFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, is the distinguished minority leader prepared to consider the Senate Concurrent Resolution 128?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection on this side.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my name be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMEMORATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF AUSTRALIA AND HONORING THE APRIL 1986 VISIT OF AUSTRALIAN PRIME MINISTER ROBERT HAWKE TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk the Senate concurrent resolution on behalf of Senator DOLE and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 128) to commemorate the bicentennial of Australia and to honor the April 1986 visit of Australian Prime Minister Robert Hawke to the United States.

The Senate concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution with its preamble is as follows:

S. CON. RES. 128

Whereas the United States and Australia enjoy a special and close relationship based on our shared history, cultural heritage, similar political values, and mutual respect for individual liberties;

Whereas our two nations enjoy thriving trade and business relationships and a broad range of people-to-people programs;

Whereas that close relationship has assured an alliance between our two nations in defense of freedom during four wars;

Whereas Australia and the United States are linked in a mutual defense treaty and readily accept the costs involved in preserving international peace;

Whereas Australia participated in the celebration of the bicentennial anniversary of American independence in 1976;

Whereas the Prime Minister of Australia, the Honorable Robert J.L. Hawke, will be visiting the United States in April 1986;

Whereas the Government and people of Australia have invited the Government and people of the United States to join in celebrating the forthcoming 1988 bicentennial of Australia; and

Whereas it is most fitting that this historic event be recognized in a manner which will commemorate Australian-American friendship and strengthen the many ties which link our two great nations together: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the United States Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress declares its deep and abiding respect and friendship for the people of Australia and salutes Australia in its preparations for the celebration of its bicentennial.

SEC. 2. It is the sense of the Congress that the United States Government should help Australia observe its bicentennial year with appropriate activities and ceremonies that would indicate the high regard and deep affection which the people of the United States hold toward the Government and people of Australia during their celebration.

Mr. HATFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I inquire of the Democratic leader if he is in a position to concur in the following nominations on the Executive Calendar: No. 742, Eric G. Bruggink and Calendar No. 754, Robert M. Gates.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not think there is any objection on either of those nominations to the Senate's taking action at this time. I suggest to the distinguished acting majority leader that a Senator is on his way to the floor to speak on the second of the two nominations that were indicated by the distinguished acting leader.

May I suggest to the distinguished Senator who is the acting leader that the Senate proceed to the first of the two nominations and then, if the Senator would put in a quorum call so that the Senator on this side may come to the floor and speak; then I think that second nomination can be acted upon promptly.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session in order to consider the nominations just identified.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be stated.

THE JUDICIARY

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Eric G. Bruggink, of Virginia, to be a judge of the U.S. Claims Court.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, in compliance with the request made by the Democratic leader, I move approval of this nomination separately from the second nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. HATFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was considered and confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to consider the nomination.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings on the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the period for routine morning business be extended for another 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Robert M. Gates, of Virginia, to be Deputy Director of Central Intelligence.

SUPPORT FOR GATES NOMINATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the nomination of Bob Gates to the key position of Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency. First, because Bob is a consumate pro, with two decades of experience and accomplishment in intelligence affairs; and second, because Bob is a native Kansan, whose proud parents still live in Wichita.

ROLE OF CIA DEPUTY DIRECTOR POSITION

Bob has been nominated to assume one of the most important and sensitive positions in our Government. As the principal Deputy to CIA Director Casey, and as the Agency's representative when Casey assumes his "hat" as overall Director of Central Intelligence, Bob will be deeply involved in all major intelligence matters—which is to say, in virtually all of the major international issues facing our country.

He will have an enormous input into the intelligence on which the President and other senior officials base their national security and foreign policy decisions. He will help shape the strategy and programs of intelligence collection, on which our national security is directly based. And one only need to look at the current situation involving terrorism to know how critical timely, accurate intelligence can be to our national interests and to the safety of our people. And Bob will also influence the nature and scope of special intelligence activities, including covert programs, which can be so vital to our ability to operate in the real world.

READY TO MEET THE CHALLENGE

No doubt about it, he faces an enormous challenge. But he is ready to tackle it, by virtue of his talent and his experience.

Bob joined the CIA in 1966, after winning a B.A. from William and Mary and an M.A. from Indiana. Subsequently, he obtained a Ph.D. from Georgetown, as a specialist in Soviet affairs and Russian history.

Within the Agency, he rose rapidly as one of its most perceptive and creative analysts. Four years ago, he was appointed Deputy Director of CIA for intelligence; that is, in overall charge of the Agency's analytic effort. In that position, he has made a major effort to focus and sharpen Agency analysis of all of the major issues we confront, including such current issues as terrorism. Concurrently, he has served as chairman of the National Intelligence Council, the interagency body coordinating governmentwide analysis of national security and foreign policy related issues.

Among his many honors, Bob has won the intelligence community's "Intelligence Medal of Merit" and, in 1978, the prestigious Arthur S. Fleming Award as one of America's 10 most outstanding civil servants.

Bob Gates is eminently qualified to be the CIA's Deputy Director. He's the right man for the job. He deserves our unanimous support, and I urge all Senators to vote for his nomination.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I have no objection to this nomination.

I note that we had the confirmation hearings last week. The Senate Intelligence Committee—those voting—voted unanimously to confirm the nomination of Dr. Gates as Deputy Director of the CIA. He was extremely forthcoming and open in the answers to questions of all the members.

For the press, it was a unique opportunity to actually see our committee. We had the doors open for the meeting. It was only the second time I can remember in almost 7 years that I have been on the committee that we had the doors open to cameras.

I recommend to my colleagues that they read the transcript of that hearing. It is an instance of an extremely professional member of our intelligence community giving his views on covert action, the role of intelligence in arms control and foreign policy, and so forth. It is a unique window in that area.

As I said, I have no objection, as vice chairman of the Intelligence Committee, and I urge the confirmation of the nomination of Dr. Gates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Robert M. Gates, of Virginia, to be Deputy Director of Central Intelligence?

The nomination was confirmed.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. LEAHY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2303. A bill to designate September 17 of every year as "Constitution Day" and to establish such day as a legal public holiday with certain limitations; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSTITUTION DAY

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on September 11, 1987, the United States will celebrate the 200th anniversary of the signing of the Constitution. The bicentennial celebration provides a rare opportunity for the American people to reflect upon those principles which have nobly governed the Nation and which serve as a beacon for free people throughout the world.

Truly the Constitution is a marvelous work. On the occasion of the Constitution's centennial celebration, former Prime Minister William Gladstone of England remarked: "I have always regarded that Constitution as the most remarkable work known to men in modern times to have been produced by the human intellect."

As we approach the 200th anniversary of our charter of liberty, it is appropriate to ask: "How familiar are Americans with the formation and principles of the Constitution?"

Richard B. Morris, professor of history emeritus at Columbia University answered this question when he appeared before the Senate Subcommittee on the Constitution during the 97th Congress. "Granted the Constitution's central place in American political life," he said, "it is hardly disputable that the public's understanding of the Constitution is at a low ebb, and that young people completing high school take with them an abysmal sum of ignorance about the constitutional system of this Nation. * * * We are not * * * effectively teaching the Constitution in our schools."

The bicentennial celebration offers the Nation an opportunity to correct this educational dilemma. Thomas Jefferson once wrote that: "If a nation expects to be ignorant and free, in a state of civilization, it expects what never was and never will be."

The future of the Constitution depends upon the level of understanding of the American people and their willingness to uphold it in the tradition of the framers. If we are to remain a free people, we need an informed electorate.

In addition to the bicentennial celebration, there is another way in which Americans of all ages can become more familiar with the Constitution, That is to set aside one day each year to reflect upon the Constitution. Therefore, I have introduced a bill to designate September 17 of each year as "Constitution Day" and to establish such day as a legal public holiday with a certain limitation. The limitation is that while "Constitution Day" would be a national holiday, Federal workers would not be exempt from work. In other words, September 17 of each year would be a unique national holiday because Federal offices would not be closed. However, public and private schools, along with the media, would be free to focus upon the importance of the Constitution and the contributions of the framers. Since Federal offices would not be closed on September 17, there would be no cost involved.

Just as we honor the drafting and signing of the Declaration of Independence on July 4 of each year, I believe it is fitting that we honor the Constitution and those who drafted it. After all, it is these charters which have provided this Nation with unparalleled freedom.

I urge my distinguished colleagues in the Senate and the House of Representatives to support this bill.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. ROCKEFELLER):

S. 2304. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to extend the period of time during which veterans readjustment appointments may to be made; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

EXTENSION OF VETERANS READJUSTMENT APPOINTMENT AUTHORITY

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am introducing today S. 2304, a bill to extend for 3 additional years the authority set forth in section 2014(b) of title 38, United States Code, for veterans readjustment appointments—VRA's. Joining with me as an original cosponsor of this measure are the Senators from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA], Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], Maine [Mr. MITCHELL], and West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER], all of whom also serve on the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

The VRA authority, which would otherwise expire on September 30, 1986, permits certain disabled Vietnam-era veterans and educationally disadvantaged Vietnam-era veterans to be given excepted appointments in the Federal civil service. The purpose of the VRA authority is to assist these veterans by making it possible for them to be hired noncompetively into the Federal civil service and to develop additional skills through a program combining education and training with the opportunity for a regular career appointment.

On March 26, 1970, President Nixon issued Executive Order No. 11521, which established a special civil service appointment authority for certain veterans and disabled veterans of the Vietnam era who were discharged after April 9, 1969. Under that original authority, the eligibility requirements specified that in order to be considered for an apppointment a veteran must be qualified for the position, must have completed no more than 14 years of education, must have served on active duty during the Vietnam era, and generally must have been separated from the service for 1 year or less. Veterans who met these eligibility requirements could be given a VRA for any position in the competitive service at or below the general schedules 5 [GS-5] level or its equivalent. A veteran who satisfactorily completed 2 years of substantially continuous service under a VRA and an education or training program was converted to career conditional employment and automatically acquired a competitive status for civil service purposes.

In 1973, I authored legislation, based on this model, that was enacted in Public Law 93-508. It codified the VRA authority as section 2014(b) of title 38, extended the eligibility period for certain veterans who enrolled in a program of education within 1 year after release from active duty, and provided for the continuation of the program through June 30, 1978.

In 1978, I authored provisions—based upon legislation submitted by the administration—to extend and expand the VRA program substantially. These provisions were enacted in section 6(b) of the Veterans' Programs Extension Act of 1978, Public Law 95-520, which extended the authority through September 30, 1981. These provisions also extended eligibility to all Vietnam-era veterans with no more than 14 years of education, not just those separated after April 9, 1969, and eliminated the maximum limitation on the number of years of education for Vietnam-era veterans with service-connected disabilities and those who were discharged or released because of a service-connected disability. In addition, that measure raised the grade-level limitation for VRA's from GS-5 to GS-7, expanded requirements for reporting on the use of this authority, and extended the program for 3 years through September 30, 1981.

In 1981, I authored in the Senate provisions, consistent with administration-supported proposals, enacted in Public Law 97-72, that further extended the authority through September 30, 1984, and in 1984 provisions, enacted in Public Law 98-543, that led to the extension of the authority through September 30, 1986. Additionally, based on administration-proposed legislation, Public Law 98-543 raised the grade-level limitation from GS-7 to GS-9 and provided veterans who receive VRA appointments with certain appeal rights to the Merit Systems Protection Board during the first year of employment.

Since the inception of this very successful program in 1970, VRA's have provided employment opportunities for over one-quarter of a million veterans. In fiscal year 1984, more than 20,000 appointments were made: in fiscal year 1985, more than 17,000. Overall, minority group veterans have received an average of 38 percent of the total appointments, service-connected disabled veterans, 10 percent, and women veterans, 9 percent.

The success of the VRA program is also evidenced by the high Government-wide retention rates of veterans who were intitially appointed under the VRA authority. Over 80 percent of veterans who have received VRA's have converted to career conditional employment status in the civil sevice system.

It should be stressed that the VRA program does not provide for the creation of additional Government jobs. All VRA positions are regular civil service positions that count against an agency's staffing ceilings. Federal agencies' participation in the program is influenced by such factors as the agency's interest in providing eligible veterans with VRA opportunities, budgetary considerations, and the types of positions available that attract the interest and are compatible with the qualifications of VRA eligibles.

Mr. President, the continued success and popularity of the program is without question. Indeed, at hearings held before the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs on March 20, there was unanimous support among the witnesses for extension of the program, including OPM Acting Associate Director for Workforce Effectiveness and Development Gerald Hinch, who noted the administration's support for enactment of legislation to extend the program for 3 additional years, just as the measure we are introducing today would do.

Mr. Hinch also noted that OPM has taken significant actions to encourage participation by Federal agencies in the VRA program. These include providing technical assistance and advice to Federal agencies, publicizing the program through Federal executive boards and the interagency advisory group, dispensing job information through OPM's network of Federal Job Information Centers, and participating in conferences and conventions of veterans' organizations. In addition, OPM works in cooperation with the VA, the Department of Labor, and the President's Committee on the Employment of the Handicapped to promote the program. Recently, OPM also successfully implemented a training course, "Veterans Employment Programs: A Workshop," a 2-day course designed for Government employers with the responsibility for veterans' employment programs. A major component of this course covers the policies and procedures of the VRA program and how agencies can use the VRA authority more effectively.

Mr. President, the VRA program has provided employment for tens of thousands of Vietnam-era veterans who would otherwise, because of a variety of factors, have not been able to obtain Federal employment. The extension of the basic authority would ensure that this consistently successful program continues to meet needs.

By Mr. KENNEDY:

S. 2305. A bill to amend title IV of the Public Health Service Act to require the Director of the National Cancer Institute to make grants and enter into contracts to support research on adoptive immunotherapy for cancer; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

CANCER RESEARCH ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I rise to introduce the Cancer Research Act of 1986. The bill I introduce today stands as a tangible hope for hundreds of cancer victims. A revolution has occurred in medical science, allowing understanding, treatment, even cure of disease on the molecular level where it occurs. Today, I introduce a measure seeking immediate support for a promising breakthrough in cancer therapy: Adoptive immunotherapy.

Adoptive immunotherapy. A cancer therapy developed by Dr. Stephen Rosenberg, Chief of Surgery at the National Cancer Institute, has been heralded by physicians, scientists, and lay leaders as one of the most significant cancer advances of our time. The process activated the body's own immune system to attack malignant cells, using a blood protein, Interleukin 2, genetically engineered in large amounts.

To date, 71 patients, all of them with extensive disease and with failures after other therapies, have been treated with this Interleukin 2 therapy. There have been highly encouraging response rates. The responses have been especially promising because they have occurred in some cancers which have been particularly difficult to treat. Kidney cancer, malignant melanoma, and colon cancer have responded at rates of 100 percent, 50 percent, and 30 percent respectively. These should not be confused with cures. But they are unusually encouraging responses.

The history of this struggle is a long, often frustrating one. In the 1970's, we turned money and muscle to the "war on cancer" expecting to conquer it as we had the Moon. The answers did not spring forth, and there was frustration in American homes. Today, fully three of four American families can expect at some point to face the diagnosis of cancer. Fortunately, the slow arduous process of research was not new to our scientists. It has been necessary to take years of small steps and to lay a foundation in basic medical science research. The scientists persisted in their work as we did in our support of them. The war continued against an oppressive, unrelenting foe. Thanks to breakthroughs like Dr. Rosenberg's work, the future for families who face cancer is less bleak than it once was.

Though six centers have been selected by the National Cancer Institute to receive a half million dollars for the treatment of 40 patients each, clearly this exciting new breakthrough deserves wider testing. Many questions must be answered. We must accelerate the development of this treatment into a therapy that could benefit millions of Americans.

When Dr. Rosenberg's cautious words on IL 2/LAK therapy appeared in the New England Journal of Medicine, the National Cancer Institute began receiving over 1,000 calls a day, the largest number in its history, from patients seeking placement in the program. Disease knows no prejudice. These calls were from your constituents and mine, people rich and poor, black and white, mothers and fathers, sons and daughters, Americans from all across the land. All were desperate for the treatment their tax dollars helped to discover. Their calls were answered but their pleas for help went unfulfilled. No funds nor mechanisms existed to extend the program.

The legislation I am introducing today will provide for 12 treatment and research sites. It will double the rate at which scientists can answer the many questions that need to be answered before this immunotherapy can surpass the experimental stage. Each center designated will receive a half million dollars.

The expansion of research on this therapy has been endorsed by the President's Cancer Panel. They asserted in their most recent report there would be an "almost immediate benefit from expanding the clinical trials of Steven Rosenberg's (sic)." They recommended $20 million to this end.

The proposal I introduce today is a modest one. It will cost only $6 million. But it will double the number of cancer centers which can begin work on this therapy and the number of patients who are hopeful of receiving benefits from it.

Mr. President, there are those who would scoff at an old man who digs in the soil to plant a sapling, wasting effort on a tree whose fruit he will not live to taste, whose shade he will never enjoy. And yet that old man continues to toil, for he has vision. He labors, not just for himself, but for his children, for their fruit, for their shade. The Congress has shown vision through tireless support for basic science research since the very inception of the National Institutes of Health. While many of us do not fully understand the intricacies of biological science, we suffer ourselves and through family and friends when those biological processes go awry. At times, we have yearned for more direct results, for more practical research. But we have held fast to our faith in scientists at the helm supported by public revenues. Small steps lead to large ones. Years of small steps and vision have contributed to the larger step we are on the verge of making today.

By Mr. D'AMATO:

S. 2306. A bill entitled the "Bank Secrecy Act Amendments of 1986"; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

BANK SECRECY ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am very pleased today to introduce the Bank Secrecy Act Amendments of 1986. These amendments correct many of the weaknesses in current law that criminal investigators and prosecutors working against criminal money launderers have long complained about. Congressman. J.J. PICKLE is introducing a companion measure in the House of Representatives today.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of this bill, together with a complete technical analysis, be printed in the RECORD immediately following these remarks.

I call my colleagues' attention to two especially important aspects of our legislation:

First. It closes the favorite loophole in present law used by launderers of drug money and other criminal profits. Because today's Bank Secrecy Act only requires that deposits of more than $10,000 be reported on IRS Currency Transaction Reports [CTR's], money launderers often make multiple deposits of under $10,000 each, within very brief periods of time, to avoid the act's reporting rules.

In other words, our bill closes the so-called structuring loophole. I call to my colleagues' attention the fact that the Government has lost all three major structuring cases on appeal in the last year: United States versus Anzalone, United States versus Denemark, and United States versus Varbel.

Second. For the first time, our bill allows property related to a violation of 31 U.S.C. 5313 to be seized and forfeited. This new provision targets the person who structures his deposits, or otherwise subverts or attempts to subvert the act's reporting requirements, in order to cause a financial institution not to file a CTR.

For example, a person makes a series of deposits in a single day of under $10,000 each, but the total of deposits exceeds $70,000. If the purpose of this activity is to cause a financial institution not to file a required report or if the deposits are structured so as to evade the reporting requirements of section 5313(a), the currency used, or the property traceable to such currency, would be subject to seizure and forfeiture.

The importance of this new section is that it permits forfeiture of money even if it cannot be directly traced to a drug sale or other crime. Major drug traffickers and others engaged in organized crime are, of course, notoriously effective in covering the trail leading from their crimes to their profits. Under our bill, the only tracing needed will be that currency be traced to the failure to file a CTR, or that property be clearly traced to such currency.

Because we are breaking new legal ground, we have decided to proceed cautiously. Forfeitures under our bill will be subject to a defense that the owner of property violated the reporting rules without willfulness or a reckless disregard of the act's reporting rules.

The forfeiture authority proposed in this bill is also much more limited than most forfeiture provisions already in existence. For example, under 26 U.S.C. 7302, any property used or intended for use in violation of the internal revenue laws may be forfeited.

Under the bill being introduced today, property may not be forfeited if first, the person violating the domestic currency transactions requirements is a domestic financial institution examined by a Federal bank supervisory agency or a financial institution regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission; second, the owner is a good faith purchaser for value who took without notice of the violation; or third, the violation was not willful.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support not only this bill, but also S. 571, which will be the subject of a full Banking Committee hearing the morning of May 1, and other legislation directed at the money laundering operations of organized crime.

Only when legislation such as this becomes law, and criminal money laundering becomes a much more frequent and vulnerable target of Federal law enforcement activity, will we have a serious chance of permanently crippling major drug trafficking and other criminal organizations in this country.

Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2306

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Bank Secrecy Act (31 U.S.C. 5311 et seq.) is amended as follows:

SECTION 1. Section 5313 of Title 31 of the United States Code is amended by adding to the end of subsection (a) a sentence which reads as follows:

"No person shall cause or attempt to cause a domestic financial institution to fail to file a report required by ths subsection, shall cause or attempt to cause a domestic financial institution to file a report required by this subsection that contains a material omission or misstatement of fact, or shall structure or assist in structuring a transaction for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements of this subsection."

SEC. 2. Section 5317 of Title 31 of the United States Code is amended by:

(a) Revising the first sentence of section 5317(c) of Title 31 of the United States Code to read as follows:

"(c) A monetary instrument being transported, or which has been transported, or any interest in any property, including any deposit in a financial institution, traceable to such instrument, may be seized and forfeited to the United States Government when a report on the instrument under section 5316 of this title has not been filed or contains a material omission or misstatement."

(b) Adding a new subsection (d) which reads as follows:

"(d) United States coin or currency (or other such monetary instrument as the Secretary may prescribe) or any interest in other property, including any deposit in a financial institution, traceable to such coin or currency involved in a transaction or attempted transaction in violation of section 5313(a) of this chapter may be seized and forfeited to the United States Government under the procedures of subchapter C of chapter 75 of Title 26 of the United States Code whenever a person (excluding a domestic financial institution examined by a federal bank supervisory agency or a financial institution regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission liable under subsection 5321(a) of this chapter) violates section 5313(a) of this chapter. No property or interest in property shall be forfeited under this subsection if it can be established that the owner is a bona fide purchaser for value who took without notice of the violation or if the violation or attempted violation of section 5313(a) was not willful."

SEC. 3. Section 5321 of Title 31 of the United States Code is amended by:

(a) Adding to subsection (a) a new paragraph (4) to read as follows: "(a)(4) The Secretary may impose a civil penalty on a person or persons (excluding a domestic financial institution examined by a federal bank supervisory agency or a financial institution regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission) willfully violating section 5313(a) of this chapter. A civil penalty under this paragraph may not be more than the amount of the United States coins and currency (or other monetary instruments the Secretary may prescribe) for which a report was required under section 5313(a) of this chapter. A civil penalty under this paragraph is reduced by an amount forfeited under section 5317(d) of this title."

(b) Deleting "or (2)" from subsection (b) and adding in lieu thereof ", (2) or (4)".

(c) Deleting "5317(b)" in subsection (c) and adding in lieu thereof "5317(c) or (d)" and by deleting "subsection (a)(2)."

SEC. 4. Section 7302 of Title 26 of the United States Code is amended by deleting "such property" in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "property under this section and under the forfeiture provisions of Title 31 of the United States Code enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service" and by adding "or under the provisions of Title 31 of the United States Code enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service" after "section" in the fourth sentence.

SEC. 5. Section 7321 of Title 26 of the United States Code is amended by adding "or under any provision of Title 31 of the United States Code enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service" immediately following "title".

SEC. 6. Section 7327 of Title 26 of the United States Code is amended by inserting immediately following "internal revenue laws", the following: "or under provisions enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service under Title 31 of the United States Code, to the extent not inconsistent with the provisions of Title 31."

SEC. 7. Section 7608(b) of Title 26 of the United States Code is amended by adding "or any provision of Title 31 of the United States Code enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service" immediately following "responsible" in paragraph (1) and immediately following "the internal revenue laws" in paragraph (2)(C).

EXPLANATIONS OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

The general purposes of the proposed amendments are (1) to subject a person who launders money to potential civil and criminal penalties for certain money laundering activity, i.e., causing a financial institution not to file a required report or to file an incorrect report and structuring or assisting in structuring a transaction to evade the reporting requirements, (2) to add an "attempt" provision, and (3) to create a program for forfeiting monetary instruments, or property interests traceable to those instruments, involved in violations of 31 U.S.C. § 5313 by persons other than financial institutions.

SECTION 1

Under present law, money launderers are successfully prosecuted in some judicial circuits for causing financial institutions not to file reports on multiple currency transactions totaling more than $10,000 or causing financial institutions to file incorrect reports. In such cases, defendants are charged with violations of 18 U.S.C. § 2 (aiding and abetting or causing another to commit an offense) and § 1001 (concealing from the government a material fact by a trick, scheme, or device). For example, in United States v. Tobon-Builes, 706 F.2d 1092 (11th Cir. 1983), the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a conviction under 18 U.S.C. § 1001 where the defendants had engaged in a money laundering scheme in which they had structured a series of currency transactions, each one less than $10,000 but totaling more than $10,000, to evade the reporting requirements. See also United States v. Massa, 740 F.2d 629, 645 (8th Cir. 1984), cert. denied sub nom Skinner v. United States, U.S. ——, 105 S.Ct. 2357 (1985); United States v. Sanchez Vazguez, 585 F.Supp. 990, 993 (N.D. Ga. 1984); United States v. Konefal, 566 F.Supp. 698 (N.D.N.Y. 1983) (prosecution for structuring upheld under Title 31). In contrast, the First Circuit Court of Appeals, in United States v. Anzalone, 766 F.2d 676 (1st Cir. 1985), the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Denemark, 779 F.2d 1559 (11th Cir. 1986), and the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Varbel, 780 F.2d 758 (9th Cir., 1986) have held that structuring currency transactions to avoid the reporting requirements did not violate 18 U.S.C. § 1001.

The proposed amendment to 31 U.S.C. § 5313(a) would codify Toubon-Builes and like cases and would negate the effect of Anzalone, Varbel and Denemark. The proposed amendment would expressly subject to potential liability a person who causes or attempts to cause a financial institution to fail to file a required report or who causes a financial institution to file a required report that contains material omissions or misstatements of fact. In addition, the proposed amendment would create the offense of structuring a transaction to evade the reporting requirements, without regard for whether an individual transaction is, itself, reportable under the Bank Secrecy Act. For example, a person who converts $18,000 in currency to cashier's checks by purchasing two $9,000 cashier's checks at two different banks or on two different days with the specific intent that the participating bank or banks not be required to file Currency Transaction Reports for those transactions, would be subject to potential civil and criminal liability and the currency (or such monetary instruments as the Secretary prescribed) or property traceable to the currency would be subject to seizure and forfeiture under the proposed amendment in section 2. A person conducting the same transactions for any other reasons or a person splitting up an amount of currency that would not be reportable if the full amount were involved in a single transaction, e.g., splitting $2000 in currency into four transactions of $500 each, would not be subject to liability under the proposed amendment.

The proposed amendment to 31 U.S.C. § 5313(a) would also add a much-needed attempt provision to the Bank Secrecy Act. Under current law, a financial institution is not required to report a currency transaction until 15 days after the transaction has taken place; therefore, a reporting violation does not occur until (1) 15 days have passed since the time of the transaction and (2) the financial institution has failed to file a report. This situation creates two problems for prosecutions of persons who have structured their transactions to avoid the reporting requirements of the Bank Secrecy Act. First, after 15 days the money launderers may have fled, and the investigative trail may be cold. Second, an individual who has attempted to avoid the reporting requirements may escape liability if the financial institution, despite the efforts of the money launderer, files a timely, correct report. The proposed attempt provision would cure these present flaws by: (1) authorizing an earlier seizure of individuals and funds, and (2) subjecting individuals who attempt to frustrate the reporting requirements of the Act to potential criminal liability at the time of their attempt and not 15 days later.

SECTION 2

31 U.S.C. § 5317 would be amended to add a new subsection (d), which would, for the first time, allow property related to a violation of section 5313, to be seized and forfeited. This new subsection would be directed primarily at a person who launders money or attempts to launder money in collusion with a financial institution, who intentionally subverts or who attempts to subvert the reporting requirements by causing or attempting to cause an "innocent" or otherwise unwitting financial institution to fail to file a report or to file a materially incomplete or inaccurate report, or a person who structures or assists in structuring a transaction for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements, where a report would, but for its artificial structure, be required under section 5313(a). For example, a person may engage in a pattern of cash deposits at a financial institution where each deposit involves less than $10,000 in currency and where the total of the deposits equals substantially more than $10,000. If the activity were performed in an attempt to cause the financial institution to fail to file a report required by section 5313(a), or if the activity is a transaction structured for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements of section 5313(a), the currency used or intended to be used, or the interest in the property traceable to such currency would be subject to seizure and forfeiture. The fact that the violation was not willful would be a defense to the forfeiture. Willfulness in a forfeiture case would be determined under the civil, reckless disregard standard in this, a civil, in rem forfeiture action.

This forfeiture provision is intended to reach interests in property which can be clearly traced to the currency that gave rise to the section 5313(a) violation. It would reach monies deposited in bank accounts or other types of financial accounts, e.g., checking accounts, money market accounts, and certificates of deposit, and would apply to real and personal property that had been purchased by a violator with a monetary instrument that gave rise to a section 5313(a) violation. However, the provision is not intended to apply to the property interests of innocent third parties. It would not apply to cash received by an innocent bank, in which the money launderer no longer had any property interest, that a money launderer had used in the purchase of a cashier's check, but it would apply to the cashier's check in the hands of the money launderer or in the hands of the person on whose behalf the money launderer was acting. The fact that a person was a bona fide purchaser for value without knowledge of the violation would be a defense to forfeiture.

The amendment is needed because current forfeiture authority is an inadequate tool against money laundering. For example, forfeiture authority under federal drug laws, 21 U.S.C. § 881, requires a finding of probable cause to believe that the money was used in connection with a violation of the drug laws. Laundered money is frequently connected to violations of drug laws; however, money laundering is also used for non-drug criminal activity and, even where the operation is part of a drug trafficking organization, the money laundering can be arranged so that it is difficult, if not impossible, to prove such a connection.

Section 5317(c) is amended to provide express authority to seize assets clearly traceable to a monetary instrument being transported or which has been transported in violation of section 5316. The violation of section 5316 need not be willful in order for an unreported monetary instrument to be subject to seizure and forfeiture. Customs law relating to seizure, forfeiture and disposition of property continue to apply, to the extent not inconsistent with the Bank Secrecy Act, to forfeitures under this subsection.

Current tax assessment and collection statutes, 26 U.S.C. §§ 6851 and 6861, are also an inadequate tool against money laundering. Tax assessment and collection under such statutes requires proof that a Title 26 tax deficiency is in jeopardy. This involves a computation of taxable income, which is a difficult computation with respect to illegal activity. Furthermore, since only the tax deficiency is collectable under such authority, much of the laundered money is unreachable.

Tax assessment and collection authority under 26 U.S.C. § 6867 is also an inadequate tool against money laundering. That authority permits a jeopardy/termination assessment against a person "in physical possession" of cash (or equivalent) who does not claim ownership or who claims that an unknown third person owns the money but permits seizure of only fifty percent of the cash, as income tax due. The balance is available to a person who comes forward to claim ownership. The launderer or actual owner of the money may be able to regain half of it.

In contrast, the proposed forfeiture authority is likely to be a very valuable tool against money laundering. As evidence of the usefulness of such forfeiture authority, one can look to current forfeiture authority under the Bank Secrecy Act. Under such authority, large amounts of currency, i.e., more than $10,000, that a money launderer moves into or out of the country may be seized and forfeited to the United States if he fails to report it. This forfeiture authority has been used often and effectively as an important weapon in Treasury's war against money launderers.

Numerous case examples demonstrate how effective the proposed forfeiture authority can be. Following are three situations involving reporting violations where the proposed forfeiture authority would have enhanced law enforcement capabilities. The fourth example is a non-willful violation where no forfeiture would occur.

Case No. 1: An investigation developed evidence that a group of suspected narcotic traffickers had willfully caused domestic financial institutions not to file required Currency Transaction Reports on transactions totaling more than $50 million. However, the investigation did not develop sufficient admissible evidence to connect the laundered money to violations of the drug laws. Therefore, the money was not forfeitable under the current forfeiture authority at 21 U.S.C. § 881. Under the proposed forfeiture authority, the entire $50 million, or assets traceable to it, would have been forfeitable. Note that such assets in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value would not have been forfeitable.

Case No. 2: A South Florida money laundering specialist laundered $57 million over 18 months through various Miami bank accounts. He deposited duffel bags and boxes filled with cash into accounts at Miami banks in collusion with certain bank officials; the banks filed no reports. The funds were transferred from the Miami accounts to other accounts and ultimately to Colombia. The admissible evidence in this case did not tie the $57 million to narcotics activity; therefore, the Government was unable to seize any of the funds under 21 U.S.C. § 881. Under the proposed forfeiture authority, the funds might have been seized prior to their leaving the United States. Furthermore, even if law enforcement officers had been unable to seize the money before it left the country, the proposed amendments would have authorized a civil penalty equal to the amount of the unreported currency.

Case No. 3: An individual represented to numerous financial institutions that he was conducting business as a bullion dealer and that he would be depositing large amounts of currency with those institutions. He opened business accounts, using his true name and the name of a bullion-dealer organization. He was not, in fact, a bullion dealer but was a money launderer. The bullion-dealer organization was strictly a shell corporation he used to launder money for his clients.

Over a 12-month period he deposited about $10 million in currency into 40 different accounts with 25 financial institutions in Florida and California. He drew checks on the accounts, payable to nominee names, which were then given to his clients. The check amounts were slightly less than the deposit amounts and the difference represented his money laundering commission.

The individual filed Federal tax returns, showing his occupation as a bullion dealer. Gross receipts on the tax returns approximated the amounts deposited into the bank accounts. Cost of the goods sold (expenses) shown on the returns approximated the amount of the checks drawn on the accounts. The profit on the returns resulted from the commissions.

Although the banks filed reports on the individual's transactions, the individual would have violated amended 31 U.S.C. §5313 (he did not violate 18 U.S.C. § 1001) because he made a material misstatement of fact, i.e., a false occupation and a false business name, which caused the bank to file a form containing a material misstatement of fact. Current statutes do not allow for seizure of any of the funds deposited in the bank accounts. The proposed amendment to 31 U.S.C. §§5313(a) and adding 5317(d) would subject these deposited funds to seizure and forfeiture.

Case No. 4: A person has saved money to purchase a home, and, according to the real estate broker, needed a $9,000 down payment. On the day of the closing, she went to her bank and withdrew $9,000 in currency. When she arrived at the closing, her broker revealed that he had made an error in his calculations and that she needed $11,000 not $9,000 for the down payment.

She returned to her bank and withdrew another $2,000 in currency. Because she withdrew the $11,000 in currency in two transactions, the bank filed no report, despite the requirement on the report form that multiple transactions within a 24-hour period be aggregated and treated as a single transaction. Her withdrawal of the $11,000 in currency in two transactions presumably caused the bank to fail to file a required Currency Transaction Report; however, she would not have been criminally liable and her interest in the house would not have been subject to forfeiture under the proposed amendments because she had not willfully caused the bank to fail to file a required report and her transactions were not structured for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements.

Finally, it should be noted that the forfeiture provision proposed at 31 U.S.C. § 5317(d) for use with respect to domestic currency transactions is more limited in scope than most forfeiture provisions including the one already existing at 26 U.S.C. § 7302 for use with respect to violations of the internal revenue laws. Under 26 U.S.C. § 7302 any property used or intended for use in violation of the internal revenue laws may be forfeited. Under the proposed legislation for domestic currency transactions, the basic types of property subject to forfeiture are very limited. Only coins, currency, and certain other monetary instruments and property traceable to such monetary instruments may be seized and forfeited. Further restrictions exclude property from forfeiture if (1) the person violating the domestic currency transactions requirements is a domestic financial institution examined by a federal bank supervisory agency or a financial institution regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission, (2) the owner is a bona fide purchaser for value who took without notice of the violation, and (3) if the violation or attempted violation was not willful.

SECTION 3

31 U.S.C § 5321 would be amended by adding a new subsection (a)(4) authorizing a civil penalty against a person who willfully violates section 5313(a). No amendment is necessary to 31 U.S.C. § 5322 for imposition of criminal penalties for violations of section 5313(a). Civil penalties can be imposed where a person had specific intent to violate the law or acted with reckless disregard for the law. This standard for willfulness is consistent with case law construing willfulness in civil penalty contexts and with Treasury's interpretation of willfulness under the Bank Secrecy Act.

The proposed civil penalty would complement the proposed forfeiture provision authorizing a civil penalty sufficient to fill the gap between the value of the property seized under proposed section 5317(d) and the value of the financial instruments involved in the unlawful transactions. This mirrors current treatment of forfeiture of monetary instruments seized under section 5317 and civil penalties imposed under section 5321(a)(2) (for violations of Bank Secrecy Act reporting requirements regarding transporting currency into or out of the United States).

SECTION A

The authority of the Internal Revenue Service to forfeit property is currently set forth in 26 U.S.C. § 7302 and is limited to property used or intended to be used in violating the internal revenue laws. IRS agents enforce and administer laws in Title 31 of the United States Code (the currency transaction reporting provisions) in addition to the internal revenue laws. The proposed amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 7302 would allow the IRS to use this provision to forfeit property under proposed 31 U.S.C. § 5317(d).

It should be clearly understood that the forfeiture authority under section 7302 of Title 26 and the procedures relating to the administration and disposition of forfeited property are entirely separate and distinct from the provisions for the seizure of property for the collection of taxes provided under subchapter D of chapter 64 of Title 26.

SECTION 5

Those with an interest in property seized for forfeiture by the Internal Revenue Service may file a petition for remission or mitigation. The Internal Revenue Service applies the customs laws relating to remission or mitigation (26 U.S.C. § 7327). The authority to remit forfeitures under the Bank Secrecy Act rests with the Secretary of the Treasury under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(c).

Petitions for remission or mitigation are expected to be rare. Seizures will only be made by trained law enforcement personnel. Seizures will normally be reviewed by legal counsel before they are made. The vast majority of seizures will be made under a search warrant obtained from a United States magistrate after a review of the circumstances to determine if there is probable cause.

It is anticipated that the procedures for remission or mitigation will be similar to the current IRS procedures for property subject to administrative forfeiture. A petition must be filed with the Internal Revenue Service District Director for the district in which the property was seized. The requirements and rules concerning the contents of such a petition under the internal revenue laws are set forth in the Internal Revenue Service's regulations at 26 C.F.R. §§ 403.35-403.45. A petition must be filed not later than three months after the sale or other disposition of the property. The petition must (1) contain a description of the property, (2) indicate the nature and amount of the petitioner's interest in the property, (3) show that the petitioner was not willfully negligent and did not intend that the property be used in violation of the law, (4) set forth documents supporting the claims made in the petition (such as contracts and bills of sale), (5) indicate that costs (such as those relating to seizure and storage) assessed as a condition of allowance of the petition will be paid by the claimant, and (6) state how the property came into the possession of the person whose act caused the seizure, and that the petitioner had no knowledge or reason to believe that the property would be used in violation of the law where the petitioner did not commit the act which caused the seizure of the property. The assessment of costs is discretionary with those allowing a petition and therefore may be waived.

In reviewing petitions, consideration is given to factors such as (1) whether the petitioner had a recognizable, good-faith interest in the property, (2) whether the petitioner played any part in or had knowledge of the violation or should have had knowledge of the violation, (3) the petitioner's criminal record, and (4) whether the petition was timely filed.

Finally, it should be noted that provision is made in the law and regulations for consideration of petitions for mitigation where a forfeiture would cause undue hardship. This authority may be exercised where the petitioner has not or cannot meet the conditions for remission but where other extenuating circumstances are present indicating that some relief should be granted to avoid extreme hardship. Basically, the contents and procedures for petitions for mitigation are the same as those for remission.

Normally, petitions for remission or mitigation of other types of IRS forfeitures have been granted in around two months. However, in certain instances where a petitioner's noninvolvement, innocence, and ownership is clear, property can be returned more quickly.

Additionally, seized property may be returned to its owner if it was seized in error or if there is insufficient evidence to support the forfeiture. This can be done in a few days whether or not a petition has been filed.

All remission and mitigation determinations relating to property over a certain dollar amount, e.g., $100,000, would be approved by the Assistant Secretary (Enforcement).

SECTIONS 6 AND 7

Current law limits IRS agents' seizure authority to "property subject to forfeiture under the internal revenue laws." The amended language is required to authorize IRS officers to seize property subject to forfeiture under Title 31. The changes coordinate with the change in section 7302.

S. 2307. A bill to provide authorization of appropriations for activities of the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

USTTA REAUTHORIZATION

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to authorize funds for the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration [USTTA], recognizing the unique and vital role this agency fills in maximizing the impact of travel and tourism as an export—a major and positive contribution to the U.S. balance of trade. As chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Business, Trade, and Tourism, I ask you to consider the following:

Travel and tourism is the first, second, or third largest employer in 41 States, and the second largest private employer in the Nation, providing 4.9 million jobs. In my own State of South Dakota, travel and tourism is the second largest employer, supporting nearly 15,000 jobs, or 6.1 percent of all jobs in the State.

All told, travel and tourism in this country account for $240 billion in annual revenues, making it the third largest service industry in the United States. In South Dakota, nearly $500 million is generated by travel and tourism annually.

Thirty of the fifty States earn more than $50 million from sales of tourism services to foreign visitors, 12 earned more than $100 million, 5 more than $1 billion, and 2 more than $2.6 billion, with a national total of nearly $15 billion from travel and tourism exports, South Dakota receives over $8.5 million from foreign visitors each year.

In the role of travel and tourism export developer, the USTTA wears many hats:

TRADE STRATEGY COORDINATOR

Working with States, cities, and the United States' 1 million travel-related businesses to make them more aware of the international market and how to enter it. Most recently this has involved uniting these components of the industry in joint marketing efforts that are able to compete effectively with major foreign tourism campaigns.

USTTA's new cooperative advertising program packages participants which provide complementary services or facilities, or which are located in a particular national region, targeting them to specific European or Pacific markets. To date, it is estimated that this effort has returned $18 for every dollar invested by the USTTA.

NATIONAL POLICY COORDINATOR

Working with other Federal and State agencies to ensure that there is a balance between travel and tourism interests, historical and cultural preservation, energy development and conservation, environmental concerns and natural resource utilization.

No other agency is in a position to oversee the decisions being made in these areas in order to ensure that future generations will be able to enjoy our rich natural heritage.

INTERNATIONAL NEGOTIATOR

Working with foreign governments to remove trade barriers and open doors for U.S. export development. Over the past several months, USTTA has successfully negotiated an agreement with Canada to remove a prohibitive sales tax on U.S. tourism literature entering that country.

More recently, USTTA has taken on the critically important role of coordinating the travel and trade industry's response to the serious problem of international terrorism. No other Federal agency is better suited to work with our travel and tourism industry and their counterparts worldwide to make travel safe and enjoyable for all people.

GOODWILL AMBASSADOR

Working to foster international understanding and world peace by encouraging citizens of other nations to come see our country and get to know us better as a people. USTTA's nine field offices around the globe seek both to identify marketing opportunities for U.S. tourism exporters and to educate travel-sellers abroad about the U.S. product.

In addition, USTTA works closely with the U.S. Information Service and Voice of America [USIA/VOA] which have large overseas audiences and do much to disseminate materials and promote travel to the United States.

Finally, the USTTA is working with public and community groups and the travel and tourism industry in this country to heighten awareness of the foreign visitor's need for specialized travel helps including language services, currency exchange facilities, universal symbol directional signs in public areas, et cetera.

EDUCATOR AND PLANNER

Working to collect, analyze, and distribute data which accurately measure the economic and social impacts of travel and tourism to and within the United States in order to help the public and private sectors plan for the future.

Competition for the world tourism market has intensified in recent years with developing countries anxious to earn foreign exchange and long-established nations looking to improve their economic circumstances. USTTA has been able to determine where untapped markets exist, and where growth is possible. This has been accomplished in part through their newly developed in flight survey, which is rapidly proving to be an invaluable tool for export market expansion.

The USTTA has continued to provide these unique and vital services to the U.S. travel and tourism industry, harvesting a bountiful return on an extremely modest investment. The legislation I propose to introduce would authorize funding for this important agency at levels of $13 million, $14 million, and $15 million for fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989 respectively—an investment of less than 3.5 cents per capita compared to an average of $3.64 per capita for national tourism organizations worldwide.

On Friday, April 18, 1986, at 9:30 a.m. in room 253 of the Russell Building, my Senate Subcommittee on Business, Trade, and Tourism will hold hearings on this legislation. At that time we will consider the value of a national government travel and tourism agency as a catalyst to State, local, and private cooperative efforts; the need for such an agency to represent U.S. interests abroad, and to work with other countries to address mutual concerns such as international terrorism; and the suggestion that State, local, and private organizations could deliver these and other services now provided by the USTTA as effectively and efficiently.

I believe this hearing will show that the USTTA is necessary, and that only that agency can articulate, demonstrate, and represent the various elements of U.S. travel and tourism, as a whole, to the rest of the world. The USTTA does for the people what they cannot do for themselves very effectively, and at minimal cost and great benefit to the American public. Therefore, I invite you to join me in supporting this legislation to reauthorize the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration.

By Mr. LAUTENBERG:

S. 2308. A bill to authorize the President of the United States to award congressional gold medals to Anatoly and Avital Shcharansky in recognition of their dedication to human rights, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bronze duplicates of those medals; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

GOLD MEDALS FOR THE SHCHARANSKYS

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, today I introduce a bill to award congressional gold medals to Anatoly "Natan" and Avital Shcharansky in recognition of their courageous dedication to human rights. A similar bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives by my colleague Representative BENJAMIN A. GILMAN.

Commissioning a congressional gold medal is Congress' way of expressing national appreciation for distinguished achievements. Each one is individually struck to honor particular individuals, institutions, or events. The congressional gold medal is not to be confused with the Medal of Honor, awarded for combat bravery alone.

Anatoly "Natan" and his wife Avital deserve this special honor because of their outstanding and unwavering commitment to human rights, and their truly magnificent strength of spirit. Anatoly Shcharansky, a Jewish computer programmer, was one of the founding members of the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group. The group was set up to monitor the Soviet Union's compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki accords. Those accords, signed in 1975 by the Soviet Union, included provisions that "everyone has a right to leave any country, including his own" and that "participating states will deal in a positive and humanitarian spirit with the applications of persons who wish to be reunited with their family."

Within months of joining the Helsinki Monitoring Group, Anatoly was arrested on charges of espionage as part of a Soviet campaign to taint the Jewish emigration movement with the charge of treason. He was 29. In 1978, he was sentenced to 3 years in prison and 10 years of hard labor for anti-Soviet agitation, treason, and espionage for the Central Intelligence Agency. Almost 9 years later, he was set free.

Anatoly "Natan" Shcharansky was not a spy. His real crime was his courageous activity on behalf of would-be Jewish immigrants. Using his wit and excellent command of English, he served as a spokesman and public relations person in Moscow for the Jewish emigration movement. Knowing full well that his activity would probably lead to prison, he nevertheless contacted Western correspondents, arranged press conferences, and translated statements to win publicity for the plight of Soviet Jews seeking to emigrate. He even advised Soviet Jews who had been turned down for exit visas on how to use the law and bureaucratic procedures to needle the authorities.

Once imprisoned, he did not lose hope or lose heart. Although he was in physical custody, his Soviet jailers never enslaved his spirit. He refused to inform on other prisoners or confess to crimes of which he was not guilty in order to receive better treatment in prison. Despite years of physical and psychological torture, including repeated stretches in solitary confinement, bouts of starvation, and periods of extreme cold, his spirit remained whole.

And on the day he was set free, his first thought was of those he left behind. He said:

On this happiest day of our lives, I am not going to forget those who I left in the camps in the prisons, who are still in exile or who still continue their struggle for their right to emigrate, for their human rights. And I hope that that enthusiasm, that energy, that joy which fills our hearts today, Avital's and mine, will help us to continue the struggle, for the freedom and the rights of our brothers in Russia.

Avital Shcharansky deserves a congressional gold medal for her tireless efforts to free her husband from the gulag, and to elevate his plight into a global concern for human rights. Avital and Anatoly were married in 1974. She left for Israel the day after the wedding, fully expecting her husband to join her there soon. When it became clear that her husband would not be released, Avital took up a vigil that spanned continents, lasted years, and was not relinquished until she was reunited with her husband 12 years after she had seen him last. Her unending crusade took her to many Western capitals, to presidents, prime ministers, and kings. Tirelessly, never faltering, she kept his name on government agendas, making sure no one forgot that Anatoly Shcharansky was not free. As Prime Mininster Peres said, Avital fought like a lioness."

Avital and Anatoly "Natan" Shcharansky have already proven their credentials in the fight for human rights. They have demonstrated tenacity, strength of spirit, and dedication worth far more than any gold medal we could give them. But a congressional gold medal is nonetheless an important way of recognizing their past contributions to the cause of human rights, and saying thank you in advance for those we know, we know they will make in the future. I urge my colleagues to pass this bill to give the Shcharansky's the recognition they deserve. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2308

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, section 1. findings.

The Congress finds that—

(1) Avital Shcharansky and Anatoly Shcharansky have displayed immense courage and commitment to the preservation of individual human rights, regarded as among the highest of ideals by the American people;

(2) Anatoly Shcharansky, a prominent founding member of the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group and active spokesman for the human rights denied to Soviet Jews, was unjustly arrested by the Soviet Union in 1977 and imprisoned for almost nine years on the false charges of espionage and treason;

(3) Anatoly Shcharansky, during his lengthy incarceration and isolation, was subjected to ongoing emotional and physical deprivation of the highest magnitude, yet continued to display raw courage and the noblest commitment to his rights as an individual, thereby setting an example for others whose individual freedoms are being denied;

(4) freedom is the ideal held most dear by the American people, and Anatoly Shcharansky has become a symbol of that love of freedom;

(5) Avital Shcharansky, while her husband was kept silent by Soviet prisons and labor camps, waged an indefatigable campaign around the world on behalf of her husband and others similarly treated;

(6) Avital Shcharansky's earnest persistance and dedication to the precepts of freedom of thought, word, and deed raised the consciousness of the world while she valiantly worked for her husband's release, thus elevating human rights to a global concern; and

(7) their reunion is evidence of the triumph of the human spirit against all adversities.

SEC. 2. CONGRESSIONAL GOLD MEDAL.

(a) AWARD.—The President of the United States is authorized and requested to present, on behalf of the Congress, gold medals to Anatoly and Avital Shcharansky in recognition of their supreme dedication and total commitment to the cause of individual human rights and freedoms.

(b) DESIGN AND CONSTRUCTION.—For purposes of the presentation referred to in subsection (a), the Secretary of the Treasury (hereafter in this act referred to as the "Secretary") shall cause to be struck two gold medals with suitable emblems, devices, and inscriptions, to be determined by the Secretary.

(c) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There is authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 3. DUPLICATE MEDALS.

(a) CONSTRUCTION AND SALE.—The Secretary may cause duplicates in bronze of the gold medals provided for in section 2 to be coined and sold under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, at a price sufficient to cover the cost of such duplicates and such gold medals, including labor, material, dies, use of machinery, and overhead expenses.

(b) REIMBURSEMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS.—Any appropriation made under section 2 shall be reimbursed out of the proceeds of the sales referred to in subsection (a).

SEC. 4. NATIONAL MEDALS.

The medals provided for in this Act shall be considered to be national medals for purposes of section 5111 of title 31, United States Code.

S. 2309. A bill authorizing appropriations to the Secretary of the Interior for services necessary to the nonperforming arts functions of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

JOHN F. KENNEDY CENTER FOR THE PERFORMING ARTS AUTHORIZATION

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, by request, I am introducing a bill to provide authorizations of appropriations to the Secretary of the Interior for services necessary to the nonperforming arts functions of the John F. Kennedy for the Performing Arts. The bill provides monetary authorizations for fiscal years 1987 and 1988 to enable the National Park Service to continue to provide services as directed in the John F. Kennedy Center Act.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the letter transmitting that legislation from Acting Assistant Secretary P. Daniel Smith be printed at this point in the RECORD, together with the text of the bill.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2309

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (e) of section 6 of the John F. Kennedy Center Act (72 Stat. 1698, 1699; 20 U.S.C. 76 h, 76 l) is amended by striking out the period in the last sentence and adding in lieu thereof", and not to exceed $4,771,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and such sums as are necessary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., March 28, 1986.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is enclosed a draft bill, "Authorizing appropriations to the Secretary of the Interior for services necessary to the nonperforming arts functions of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, and for other purposes."

We recommended that the draft bill be introduced, referred to the appropriate committee for consideration, and enacted.

Under subsection (e) of section 6 of the John F. Kennedy Center Act (72 Stat. 1698, 1699; 20 U.S.C. 76 h, 76 l), the Secretary of the Interior is required to provide all services necessary to the nonperforming arts functions of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, including informational, interpretation, janitorial, maintenance, and security services. However, the Congress has only appropriated funds to the National Park Service through September 30, 1986, for the nonperforming arts functions of the Kennedy Center.

The draft bill would amend the appropriation authorization in subsection (e) to authorize an appropriation of $4,771,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and such sums as are necessary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988. Such an authorization and appropriation would enable the National Park Service to continue to carry out its responsibilities for the nonperforming arts functions for the Kennedy Center as provided in the President's 1987 budget.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that this legislative proposal is in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

P. DANIEL SMITH,
Acting Assistant Secretary.●

S. 2310. A bill to make foreign nationals ineligible for certain agricultural program loans, payments, or benefits; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM INELIGIBILITY FOR FOREIGN NATIONALS

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to prohibit the payment of farm program benefits to foreign landowners or operators. Under current law, any farmland owner or operator is eligible for farm program benefits if they comply with the various requirements. My legislation would prohibit foreign owners and operators of farms from receiving benefits.

Currently, 8,760,300 acres of farmland is owned by foreign investors. This represents a relatively small percentage of total farmland, but if all of the land was placed in farm programs the payments to the foreign owners could total several million dollars. With the strict budget requirements farm programs face we cannot afford to subsidize these foreign investors.

The eligibility of foreign investors to receive farm program benefits also increases the incentive for them to purchase U.S. farmland. In recent years with farmland values declining, there has been a decline in foreign investment in farmland. But with farmland prices bottoming out the number of foreign investors purchasing U.S. farmland is bound to increase. Prohibiting these investors from receiving farm program payments on their land would make U.S. farmland less attractive to foreign investors.

Finally, the majority of the foreign owned farmland is held by corporations. These are not family farm corporations but huge multinational corporations who do not need farm program subsidies. For many years I have argued that farm program benefits should be directed to family farmers and restrictions placed on payments to huge corporations. This would achieve such a goal.

As I have outlined, this legislation has several advantages. It will reduce the cost of farm programs. It will reduce the incentive for foreign investors to purchase U.S. farmland. And it will prohibit payments from going to huge multinational corporations.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation and work for passage of it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2310

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM INELIGIBILITY FOR FOREIGN NATIONALS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as otherwise provided in this section and notwithstanding any other provision of law, following the date of enactment of this Act, any person who is not a citizen or national of the United States or an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence shall be ineligible for—

(1) as to any commodity produced on a farm that is owned or operated by such person—

(A) any type of price support or payment made available under the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1421 et seq.), the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act (15 U.S.C. 714 et seq.), or any other Act;

(B) a farm storage facility loan made under section 4(h) of the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act (15 U.S.C. 714B(h));

(C) crop insurance under the Federal Crop Insurance Act (7 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.);

(D) a disaster payment made under the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1421 et seq.); or

(E) a loan made, insured, or guaranteed under the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1921 et seq.) or any other provision of law administered by the Farmers Home Administration; or

(2) a payment made under sections 4 or 5 of the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act (15 U.S.C. 714b or 714c) for the storage of an agricultural commodity acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

(b) CORPORATIONS.—For the purpose of subsection (a), a corporation shall be considered a person that is ineligible for program loans, payments, or benefits if more than 50 percent of the beneficial ownership of the corporation is held by persons who are not citizens or nationals of the United States or aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence.

(c) EXEMPTION.—No person shall become ineligible under this section for program loans, payments, or benefits as the result of the production of a crop of an agricultural commodity planted before the date of enactment of this Act.●

By Mr. MITCHELL (for himself and Mr. COHEN):

S. 2311. A bill relating to certain foreign labor subsidies for which relief may be sought under the countervailing duty laws; to the Committee on Finance.

RELIEF UNDER COUNTERVAILING DUTY LAWS FOR CERTAIN FOREIGN LABOR SUBSIDIES

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I introduce today a bill that would clarify a gap in our trade laws that currently is working to the detriment of the New England fishing industry. Under current law, foreign unemployment assistance programs which benefit a particular sector, and which confer benefits far in excess of premiums, are not explicitly considered to be subsidies subject to countervailing duties.

The seriousness of this problem recently became clear in the current countervailing duty case against Canadian groundfish. The Canadian program is inaccurately termed "unemployment insurance". But there is no insurance risk involved. Payments are made every year to self-employed fishermen during their off-season. Furthermore, there is no employer to pay premiums, because benefits are restricted to self-employed fishermen. Finally, the program constitutes in effect a massive government transfer program to fishermen far exceeding the small amount of insurance premiums they pay.

Canadian fishermen receive $140 million annually under this program; of that amount, over 90 percent is directly from Federal Government revenue. Under normal Canadian unemployment insurance, the ratio of benefits received to premiums paid is slightly over 1 to 1. For the self employed fisherman, the ratio is an enormous 17 to 1.

These unemployment transfer payments should qualify as a bounty or grant under the definition of subsidy under current countervailing duty law. However, the definition of subsidy is apparantly not clear enough at present, for the Commerce Department recently decided not to recognize these grants as countervailable. Despite the fact that economically, they act exactly like direct subsidies to the Canadian fish industry, Commerce did not factor them into its estimate for a countervailing duty.

Clearly, not to have such practices considered countervailable contradicts the intent of our current trade law. Countervailing duty law is meant to protect efficient American industries against unfair foreign subsidies. American fishermen must operate without the benefit of enormous grants for the months that they are idle. If Canadian fishermen were also subject to the discipline of the free marketplace, they could not so effectively compete against their American counterparts. These unemployment payments allow inefficient Canadian fishermen, who otherwise could not remain in business, to stay in the marketplace.

Thus, in the interest of fair trade, it is necessary to broaden the definition of subsidy under our countervailing duty laws. This bill would do just that. To insure that such obvious direct subsidy programs are countervailable in the future, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. MURKOWSKI, and Mr. CRANSTON):

S.J. Res. 322. Joint resolution to designate December 7, 1986, as "National Pearl Harbor Remembrance Day" on the occasion of the anniversary of the attack on Pearl Harbor; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL PEARL HARBOR REMEMBRANCE DAY

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, today Senators MURKOWSKI, CRANSTON, and I are introducing a joint resolution to designate December 7, 1986, the 45th anniversary of the attack on Pearl Harbor, as "National Pearl Harbor Remembrance Day." I greatly appreciate the support of the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee in joining me in introducing this joint resolution.

The joint resolution also authorizes and requests the President to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe this solemn occasion with appropriate ceremonies and activities, and pledge our strong resolve to defend this Nation and its allies from all future aggression.

I would like to commend the New Jersey members of the Pearl Harbor Survivors Association, particularly Lee Goldfarb, the State chairman, and the approximately 10,000 members throughout the country, for their active interest and support in commemorating this 45th anniversary through a Presidential Proclamation of National Pearl Harbor Remembrance Day.

On December 7, 1941, "a date which will live in infamy," while talks between Japanese and American diplomats were going on in Washington, the United States was attacked by the imperial Japanese Navy and Air Force. Pearl Harbor was caught totally unprepared. The blow was deliberately planned for Sunday morning, when the ships of the Pacific Fleet were moored in perfect alignment, and their crews were ashore, having breakfast or relaxing on board. There was no advance warning.

About 360 Japanese planes attacked Pacific Fleet units at the naval base, and army aircraft at Hickam Field and other nearby military installations. The surprise attack, launched entirely without provocation, took, the lives of 2,403 Americans, and wounded 1,178. Some of those lost were civilians.

Fortunately, no aircraft carriers were tied up at the base during the attack. When the assault ended nearly 2 hours later, the Pacific Fleet had lost eight battleships, three light cruisers, three destroyers and four other vessels. The attack also destroyed about 170 U.S. planes. The Japanese had concentrated on ships and planes, leaving repair facilities, the submarine base, and fuel oil storage facilities relatively undamaged.

In short, the attack had dealt the Pacific Fleet, and Hawaii's air defense a devastating blow. In less than 2 hours, the Japanese had crippled the Pacific Fleet and undermined the American strategic position in the Pacific.

The unification of the country under the impact was swift. It was the first time in U.S. history that we had been attacked first, and it wiped away the last vestige of isolationist sentiment. The entire country stood behind the President and gave him wholehearted support. The attack united U.S. public opinion against Japan, and propelled the United States into World War II. On 4:10 p.m., Monday, December 8, 1941, the United States declared war on the Japanese empire.

As "Remember Pearl Harbor" became the American war cry throughout World War II, so today we must "Remember Pearl Habor." We must recall and pay tribute to those who died in that tragedy, and we must remember so that we will never be caught short or unprepared again.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the joint resolution appear in the RECORD following my remarks, along with a letter from the Pearl Harbor Survivors Association, Inc. in support of this joint resolution.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 322

Whereas on the morning of December 7, 1941, the Imperial Japanese Navy and Air Force launched an unprovoked surprise attack upon units of the Armed Forces of the United States stationed at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii;

Whereas over two thousand four hundred citizens of the United States were killed in action and one thousand one hundred and seventy-eight were wounded in this attack;

Whereas President Franklin Delano Roosevelt referred to the date of the attack as " a date that will live in infamy";

Whereas the attack on Pearl Harbor marked the entry of this Nation into World War II;

Whereas the people of the United States owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to all members of our Armed Forces who served at Pearl Harbor, in the Pacific Theater of World War II, and in all other theaters of action of that war; and

Whereas the veterans of World War II and all other people of the United States will commemorate December 7, 1986, in remembrance of this tragic attack on Pearl Harbor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That December 7, 1986, the anniversary of the attack on Pearl Harbor, is designated as "National Pearl Harbor Remembrance Day" and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States—

(1) to observe this solemn occasion with appropriate ceremonies and activities; and

(2) to pledge eternal vigilance and strong resolve to defend this Nation and its allies from all future aggression.

PEARL HARBOR SURVIVORS ASSOCIATION,

Senator FRANK LAUTENBERG,
Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LAUTENBERG: Enclosed is a copy of a letter written by Thomas J. Stockett which was sent to you on March 20, 1986. Mr. Stockett is the National President of the Pearl Harbor Survivors Association and in his letter to you he authorizes me to act on behalf of the Association.

I am also enclosing a copy of my letter to you outlining our request to you. I would like to repeat the last sentence to you knowing it has just as much meaning now as it did when I first wrote it March 7, 1986. "May I thank you in advance for your cooperation and please be assured of the gratitude of our entire organization."

With best regards,

LEE GOLDFARB,
New Jersey State Chairman,
Pearl Harbor Survivors Associations.

PEARL HARBOR SURVIVORS ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Woburn, MA, March 20, 1986.

DEAR SENATOR LAUTENBERG: I thank you for your interest in the declaration of Sunday, December 7, 1986 as Pearl Harbor Remembrance Day. Lee Goldfarb, New Jersey State Chairman of the Pearl Harbor Survivors Association, is serving as the prime mover in this case.

The 88,000 young Americans, living and dead, that served our Country on that Day of Infamy will deeply appreciate your support and effort necessary to bring this petition to a successful conclusion.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS J. STOCKETT,
National President.

PEARL HARBOR SURVIVORS ASSOCIATION,
East Hanover, NJ, March 7, 1986.

Senator FRANK LAUTENBERG,
Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LAUTENBERG: The Pearl Harbor Survivors Association are endeavoring to have December 7, 1986 declared as "National Pearl Harbor Remembrance Day" on the occasion of the anniversary of the attack on Pearl Harbor.

Congressman Courter of New Jersey has introduced legislation to that effect (Joint Resolution #524) in the House of Representatives and we would be honored and delighted if you would introduce similar legislation in the Senate.

This December 7th is the Forty Fifth anniversary of the attack and we are having our reunion in Hawaii. I personally as the New Jersey State Chairman would indeed be proud to announce at our convention the passage of the Resolution and both chief sponsors were from New Jersey.

May I thank you in advance for your cooperation and please be assured of the gratitude of our entire organization.

With best regards,

LEE GOLDFARB,
New Jersey State Chairman,
Pearl Harbor Survivors Association.●

By Mr. D'AMATO:

S.J. Res. 323. Joint resolution to designate May 21, 1986, as "National Andrei Sakharov Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ANDREI SAKHAROV DAY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a Senate joint resolution to make May 21, 1986, National Andrei Sakharov Day. As chairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, better known as the Helsinki Commission, I call to the attention of my colleagues the fact that May 21, 1986, will be Andrei Sakharov's 65th birthday. He will spend this birthday in exile in the closed city of Gorky, where he is under close KGB surveillance.

Few people are more qualified to speak about Andrei Sakharov than Anatoly B. Shcharansky. On Sunday, April 13, 1986, the New York Times published the transcript of a statement by Shcharansky to be delivered the following day to the parallel Helsinki Review Conference in Bern, Switzerland. His statement contained an eloquent passage on Sakharov's plight.

Shcharansky said:

I would like to attract your special attention to the Sakharov case. I do not need to remind you that Andrei Dmitrivich Sakharov is a hero, a model of an honorable man who continues the very best traditions of the Russian intelligentsia, fighting for the trampled rights—be they national, religious or political—of all the people of the Soviet Union.

Shcharansky continued:

Needless to say, his present situation is extremely difficult. He is cruelly and unjustly isolated from his family and friends, barred from scientific work and normal social activities. His state of health inspires growing fears. I consider it vitally important at this moment to raise our voices and call for the Soviet Government to stop its persecution of Andrei Sakharov—to grant this remarkable man the possibility to continue his noble activities in dignity and normal conditions.

Adopting this resolution to make May 21, 1986, National Andrei Sakharov Day adds our voices to the voice of Anatoly Shcharansky and the many supporters of the Helsinki process now gathered in Bern. Shcharansky pointed out that:

It is more necessary than ever now for international public opinion to press the Soviet Union on these matters. It is high time for Moscow to begin complying with the Helsinki agreement signed in 1975.

Your support for this resolution will help achieve those goals.

Sakharov is a hero, not just to dissidents within the Soviet Union, but to freedom-loving people everywhere. He is a Nobel Peace Prize winner who has led the fight for respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. His is a lonely voice calling for civilized behavior by a government which rests upon one of the bloodiest records in the history of the world.

Andrei Sakharov is the leading figure in the Soviet Union working for peace and human rights. He believes all Soviet citizens should enjoy the rights their government promised to them when it signed the Helsinki

Final Act in August 1975. He believes they have the right to live in peace, not just free from external attack, but also free from attack by their own government.

Instead of witnessing gradual improvement in Soviet behavior as they seek acceptance into the community of nations, we have seen repeated and continuing acts of barbarism. These acts are not isolated instances of misbehavior on the part of minor functionaries who have somehow escaped adequate supervision by their superiors. They are acts committed in a carefully organized, centrally directed effort designed to further the basic interests of the Soviet nomenklatura, the small band of totalitarians who rule the Soviet State.

Andrei Sakharov's own experiences illustrate this point too well. Let us examine the suffering he experienced as he attempted to obtain an exit visa for his wife, Elena Bonner, so she could travel to the west for treatment of her heart condition:

May 1, 1984, Dr. Sakharov begins a hunger strike to protest Soviet denial of Elena Bonner's request for an exit visa for medical treatment.

May 7, 1984, Dr. Sakharov is hospitalized and Soviet authorities order him force-fed.

May 11, 1984, as a result of forced feeding and rough treatment by Soviet authorities, Sakharov suffers a stroke. His condition is not treated.

August 10, 1984, Elena Bonner is sentenced to 5 years exile in Gorky for anti-Soviet slander.

August 1984, KGB-produced video tape given to West German News magazine. Purchased and shown by ABC on U.S. television, this video tape, spliced together from old footage and still photos, purportedly is current and is intended to show Sakharov in good health. This is a clear KGB use of disinformation to deceive Western public opinion.

September 8, 1984, Sakharov ends his hunger strike, despairing of success, suffering from the physical impact of forced feeding and the emotional impact of separation from his wife.

October 15, 1984, Sakharov writes to the President of the Soviet Academy of Science, appealing on behalf of his wife.

December 1984, as General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev arrives in London, the second KGB photographic effort is released in the West, again purporting to show Sakharov and Bonner in good health.

January 1985, Sakharov letter smuggled to the West, announcing that he will begin his next hunger strike in April.

April 16, 1985, Sakharov begins hunger strike.

April 21, 1985, Sakharov again hospitalized and Soviet authorities again order him force-fed.

May 16, 1985, associated press reports, on the basis of a smuggled note, that Sakharov has begun his hunger strike.

May 24, 1985, KGB produces fake telegram to Irina Kristi, who is about to emigrate to the United States, purporting to be from Elena Bonner. This forgery implied that Sakharov and Bonner are living together and conditions are improving.

May 25, 1985, Bonner's daughter, Tatiana, living in Newton, MA, receives postcard from Bonner, apparently dated April 21, 1985, saying in part, "so now April is passed * * * the snow has melted, and the Sun is shinning." When analyzed by experts, the actual date of the card is April 1, and verb tenses have been changed. Another KGB disinformation ploy.

June 1985, ABC obtains from the same West German News magazine two more KGB video tapes, of Sakharov in the Gorky Hospital. A Soviet doctor narrates the tape, denying any hunger strike by Sakharov, claiming he was in the hospital for treatment of different complaints.

July 11, 1985, Sakharov terminates hunger strike to rejoin Elena Bonner.

July 25, 1985, determining that her health remains in jeopardy, Sakharov resumes his hunger strike.

July 27, 1985, Sakharov is back in the hospital and Soviet authorities again direct that he be force-fed.

July 29, 1985, KGB releases another secret surveillance video tape of Sakharov and Bonner, this time attending a movie theater. In the background, a poster dated July 11, 1985, is visible. ABC and French television broadcast this tape.

October 21, 1985, Bonner is issued an exit visa and a passport. This is provided on the conditions that she agree not to speak to the press while she is in the West and that Sakharov publicly agree that the Soviet argument that he cannot be allowed to emigrate because of security concerns is valid.

December 2, 1985, Bonner arrives in Rome, Italy for treatment of an eye ailment.

December 8, 1985, Bonner joins her daughter and son-in-law in Newton, MA.

January 13, 1986, Bonner undergoes heart bypass surgery.

February 18, 1986, Bonner's VISA is extended for 3 months until, June 2, 1986, to allow her to convalesce here.

March 26, 1986, KGB produces another secret surveillance video tape, showing Sakharov pushing a car in the snow and doing other routine things. ABC shows the tape to Bonner, who breaks her commitment to the KGB not to speak to the press while she is in the West. She says the tape "is an indicator that Sakharov's condition is worsening, deteriorating."

April 3, 1986, Bonner attempts to tell Sakharov over the telephone that the KGB is secretly video taping him. The KGB jams this portion of the call.

This is the story of the most recent events in the ordeal Soviet authorities have forced this gentle and great man to undergo. Contrary to Soviet hopes, their disinformation campaign has raised his stature in the West. Sakharov's love for his wife, Elena Bonner, and his steadfast dedication to his principles are on full public display.

Just as his courage marks him as a heroic figure of giant stature, so the conduct of Soviet authorities from Mikhail Gorbachev to the KGB doctors who force-fed Sakharov and the KGB thugs who surveilled, video taped and forged marks them as totally immoral, unprincipled supporters and beneficiaries of a fundamentally corrupt and vicious system.

Accordingly, it is entirely timely and appropriate for the Congress to adopt this resolution making May 21, 1986, National Andrei Sakharov Day. Our action on this measure will keep the spotlight of public attention focused on Andrei Sakharov and upon Soviet authorities' actions toward him. It might even save his life.

His agreement to the Soviet contention that he cannot emigrate because of his knowledge of state secrets was clearly extorted from him. It deserves no respect whatsoever. Therefore, the provision of this resolution calling upon the President to "urge the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to permit Andrei Sakharov and Elena Bonner freely to choose their place of residence," is vitally important.

This resolution, given our united support, will certainly send a message to both President Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev. In light of the decision that Elena Bonner should not see the President, our action here should clearly call attention to the importance, in Sakharov's case, of public diplomacy and a resolute expression of our concern and support for him. It should also convince the President of the necessity of raising the issue of permitting Sakharov to emigrate with General Secretary Gorbachev when they next meet.

On the 21st of May, Sakharov will be 65 years old. When an American citizen reaches this age, he or she is either retired or is contemplating retirement. An American is usually planning to enjoy life without work in the company of friends, children, and grandchildren.

In the starkest contrast, Sakharov is in forced exile, alone and isolated. The only people who see him are government officials. His friends cannot visit him. His wife is here in the United States and Sakharov must have doubts about whether the Soviet authorities will allow her back into the Soviet Union when her recuperation period here ends.

Instead of facing the final years of his life surrounded by his family and friends, enjoying the honors and achievements which are the product of a remarkable life, he is hounded, spied upon, tortured both mentally and physically, and subjected to campaigns of vilification in the Soviet press. He cannot associate or communicate with anyone on professional matters. His mind has been cut off from the universe of scientific discourse.

I call upon my colleagues to join me in support of this resolution. Its timely passage is urgently necessary. With your support, we can join with our colleagues in the House, where my Helsinki Commission cochairman, the distinguished Representative from Maryland, STENY HOYER, has introduced the same resolution as House Joint Resolution 596. Clearly, a strong expression of congressional support for Dr. Sakharov is necessary now. I urge you to join me to make May 21st National Andrei Sakharov Day.●

(for himself, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. CHILES, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. DOLE, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. PELL, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S.J. Res. 324. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning May 18, 1986, as "National Digestive Diseases Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DIGESTIVE DISEASES AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am pleased today to introduce a joint resolution that will designate the week of May 18, 1986, through May 24, 1986, as "National Digestive Diseases Awareness Week," and request the President to issue a proclamation for this purpose. This will be the fourth consecutive year this designation has been made.

The digestive system, which includes the esophagus, stomach, intestine, gall bladder, liver, pancreas, and colon, can be affected by a wide range of acute and chronic diseases. For those who suffer from a disorder of the digestive tract, problems may range from mild discomfort to a severe and real threat to life itself. An estimated 20 million Americans suffer from chronic digestive diseases, with over 14 million cases of acute digestive disease disorders treated each year. Tragically, more than 200,000 deaths occur from these illnesses each year, as well as one-third of all malignancies, including the cancerous growth that was removed from the President's colon last year.

When measured in economic terms, digestive disorders are extremely costly to the American public, with direct personal health care expenditures for treatment at $17 billion per year. Combined with annual lost wages, taxes, disability, and other financial expenditures, total losses from digestive diseases are estimated at nearly $50 billion.

Despite these grim and saddening statistics, there has been valuable and exciting progress made recently by researchers through the National Institute of Arthritis, Diabetes, Digestive and Kidney Diseases. Many previously disabled and chronically ill Americans can now hope for relief from pain and suffering as a result of these Federal and other research efforts conducted elsewhere. Congress has recently funded the development of digestive disease research centers of excellence through the NIH to perform basic and clinical research into diseases of the digestive tract. Hopefully these efforts will lead to more answers by researchers on the debilitating effects of gastrointestinal disease.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this joint resolution—I hope each one of them will consponsor this resolution to heighten the awareness of the American public to the significance of digestive disease in this country. I applaud the Digestive Disease National Coalition for their efforts to bring about this level of awareness. I urge the swift consideration of this important measure.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 128—COMMEMORATING THE BICENTENNIAL OF AUSTRALIA

Mr. HATFIELD for Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. PELL, and Mr. BYRD) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered and agreed to.

S. CON. RES. 128

Whereas the United States and Australia enjoy a special and close relationship based on our shared history, cultural heritage, similar political values, and mutual respect for individual liberties;

Whereas our two nations enjoy thriving trade and business relationships and a broad range of people-to-people programs;

Whereas that close relationship has assured an alliance between our two nations in defense of freedom during four wars;

Whereas Australia and the United States are linked in a mutual defense treaty and readily accept the costs involved in preserving international peace;

Whereas Australia participated in the celebration of the bicentennial anniversary of American independence in 1976;

Whereas the Prime Minister of Australia, the Honorable Robert J. L. Hawke, will be visiting the United States in April 1986;

Whereas the Government and people of Australia have invited the Government and people of the United States to join in celebrating the forthcoming 1988 bicentennial of Australia; and

Whereas it is most fitting that this historic event be recognized in a manner which will commemorate Australian-American friendship and strengthen the many ties which link our two great nations together: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the United States Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress declares its deep and abiding respect and friendship for the people of Australia and salutes Australia in its preparations for the celebration of its bicentennial.

SEC. 2. It is the sense of the Congress that the United States Government should help Australia observe its bicentennial year with appropriate activities and ceremonies that would indicate the high regard and deep affection which the people of the United States hold toward the Government and people of Australia during their celebration.

SENATE RESOLUTION 383—MARKING THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MAGNUSON FISHERY CONSERVATION AND MANAGEMENT ACT BECOMING LAW

Mr. HATFIELD for Mr. GORTON (for himself, Mr. EVANS, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. PELL, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. FORD, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. HECHT, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. BYRD) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to.

S. Res. 383

Whereas, Sunday, April 13, marked the tenth anniversary of the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act becoming the law of the United States of America (Public Law 94-265);

Whereas, That Act extended United States jurisdiction to encompass over three million square miles of the world's most productive fishing grounds and twenty percent of the world's fishery resources;

Whereas, That Act instituted conservation and management for these stocks which has previously been heavily overfished and depleted by foreign fleets, and thus has permitted this nation to manage our fisheries for the benefit of both present and future generations;

Whereas, That Act provided unprecedented incentives and preferences for United States fishermen and processors, and since the Magnuson Act was passed, the United States fishing industry has almost quadrupled its catch;

Whereas, Warren G. Magnuson, who honorably served Washington State in the United States Senate from 1944 to 1981 was the nation's preeminent leader in securing passage of this landmark legislation and was honored for this effort by having the Act named after him; Now, It is Hereby

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States recognizes and declares its highest respect and deepest gratitude to Warren Magnuson for his tireless and successful efforts to promote the conservation and management of our marine fisheries, and to provide our commercial and recreational fishing industry the ability to gain the full benefits of those vast and valuable resources.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

ELECTRIC CONSUMERS PROTECTION ACT

HART (AND EXON) AMENDMENT NO. 1783

Mr. HART (for himself and Mr. EXON) proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 426) to amend the Federal Power Act to provide for more protection to electric consumers; as follows:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted, insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the Hydroelectric Power and Environmental Improvement Act of 1986.

SEC. 2. The Congress finds and declares that: This Act amends the Federal Power Act to provide mandatory takeover by the United States of hydroelectric power projects held by private, for-profit, entities when the license expires, to provide for the marketing of power from those projects and to commit future revenues from such projects to fish and wildlife enhancement and for other environmental purposes.

SEC. 3. Title I of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. Subsections 791a–823a) are amended in the following respects:

(a) In section 3 (16 U.S.C. Section 796(3)) by:

(1) inserting "or cooperatives" after the word "municipalities."; and

(2) adding a new subsection as follows: "(17) 'Cooperative' means any entity organized under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States which is entitled to preference in the sale of power and energy sold by the United States as provided in 16 U.S.C. §§ 831i, or 825s, or 43 U.S.C. § 485h(c)."

(b) In section 7 (16 U.S.C. § 800) by striking "States and municipalities" in subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "States, cooperatives and municipalities" and by striking subsection (c).

(c) In section 14 (16 U.S.C. § 807):

(1) In subsection (a), by striking "have the right" after the words "United States shall," striking "to" after the word "license," striking "to" after the word "thereafter," adding the words "held by a corporation as defined in section 3 hereof (16 U.S.C. 796)" after the word "license," and adding a comma and the words "shall have" after the first use of the word "or".

(2) By striking subsection (b).

(3) By adding a new subsection "(b)" as follows: "Takeover by the United States pursuant to the provisions of this section is mandatory unless, within two years from the date of the Commission's notice given under subsection (a) of this section, an Act of Congress declares that takeover of a project or projects by the United States shall not occur.".

(4) By adding a new subsection "(c)" as follows:

"(c) In the event the United States by reason of an Act of Congress does not take over a project or projects under subsection (b) of this Section (or if the project is not subject to takeover under that subsection), the Commission shall, after not less than two years from notice published in the Federal Register, accept applications for a new license and decide them in a relicensing proceeding pursuant to the provisions of section 15 (16 U.S.C. 808)."

SEC. 4. Upon the effective date of a take over by the United States of a project as provided in section 14(b) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. § 807(b)), operation of the project shall be assumed:

(a) By the Tennessee Valley Authority if located on or along the Tennessee River or any of its tributaries or in any geographic area in which the Authority is authorized to sell electric power;

(b) By the Bureau of Reclamation if located in the seventeen conterminous western states;

(c) By the United States Army Corps of Engineers if located outside the areas covered by (a) and (b). The recaptured project facilities shall constitute power generating facilities held by the designated operating entity.

SEC. 5. Upon assuming operation of a project, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Corps of Engineers or the Bureau of Reclamation, as the case may be, shall reassess the project and its operation for possible modification as needed to meet then current standards for fish and wildlife protection and enhancement and shall make such structural and operational modifications, including additions and betterments, as the agency determines is needed to provide equitable treatment for such fish and wildlife with the other purposes for which the project is operated. In the case of the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation such reassessment shall be in accordance with the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act (16 U.S.C. §§ 661–666c). In the case of the Authority such reassessment shall be in accordance with cooperative arrangements between the Authority, the United States Fish and Wildlife Service and the National Marine Fisheries Service conforming to the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act.

SEC. 6. (a) Wherever practicable and feasible, a project, the operation of which is assumed pursuant to section 4, shall be integrated with other federal hydroelectric projects.

(b) The electrical output attributable to a project the operation of which is assumed pursuant to section 4 which is surplus to the operating needs of the project itself shall, if operation is assumed by the Tennessee Valley Authority, be marketed by the Authority pursuant to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended (16 U.S.C. §§ 831–831d). In all other cases, such electrical output shall be marketed by the Secretary of Energy under section 302 of the Department of Energy Organization Act (41 U.S.C. § 7152) and pursuant to (1) 16 U.S.C. § 825s where the project is located in the marketing areas of the Southwestern, Southeastern or Alaska Power Administrations, or is located outside the marketing area of any existing Department of Energy power marketing administration; (2) the acts governing the marketing of power by the Bonneville Power Administration, where the project is located in the marketing area of that power marketing administration; or (3) section 9(c) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 where the project is located in the marketing area of the Western Area Power Administration.

(c) For purposes of determining the financial requirements of a project the operation of which is assumed under section 4, the costs of the project shall consist of expenses of operation and maintenance, costs or replacements, modifications and betterments, including costs resulting from the implementation of section 5, and payments, if any, arising out of section 7(a) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. § 807(a)).

(d) Rates for power marketed pursuant to subsection (b) of this section shall be determined as follows:

(1) Where the project is interconnected with other federal hydroelectric projects constructed by the United States, power from which is marketed by the same entity, the rates for each class of service shall be the rate charged by the marketing entity for that class of service from the interconnected system, determined without reference to the financial requirements specified in subsection (c).

(2) Where the project is isolated from other federal hydroelectric projects constructed by the United States, the rate for each class of service shall be the marketing entity's average rate for the class of service involved?

(3) Where the marketing entity is the Secretary of Energy but the project is located outside the geographic area of any power marketing administration, the rate for each class of service shall be the average rate charged for that class of service from all federal power developments: Provided, That in the event the Secretary of Energy (i) establishes a power marketing administration to market power from the project or extends the area of an existing power marketing administration to include the project and (ii) the project is interconnected with other federal hydroelectric projects constructed by the United States and from which power is marketed by the same power marketing administration, paragraph (1) shall govern the establishment of rates.

(4) If rates determined in accordance with paragraph (1), (2) or (3), whichever would be applicable, would not, for the project involved, return an amount sufficient to meet the financial requirements specified in subsection (c) plus any applicable interest, the rates shall be established at levels which will provide the necessary revenues.

SEC. 7. (a) There is hereby established in the Treasury of the United States, a trust fund entitled the "Environmental and Conservation Trust Fund" (hereinafter the "Fund"). All revenues received on account of projects the operation of which is assumed under section 4 which for any prior project are in excess of the financial requirements specified in section 6(c) shall be deposited in the Fund, as shall repayment of loans made pursuant to subsection (c) of this section.

(b) The Fund shall be administered by a Board consisting of the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (or their designees) and five members selected by the President by and with the consent of the Senate, from among persons who by experience or training possess special qualifications in the fields of conservation or environmental protection. The Secretary of the Interior (or the Secretary's designee) shall serve as chairman of the Board and shall provide office space and staff for the Board, as the Board determines to be necessary, from staff and resources of the Fish and Wildlife Service and the National Park Service. Members of the Board who are not federal officials shall, when engaged in official duties, receive compensation at the level provided for federal officials at the initial step provided for federal employees holding the grade of GS 18, together with per diem or other allowances fixed in accordance with law while in travel status on official business. Other federal agencies shall provide such assistance as may be agreed upon on a reimbursable basis except that no charge shall be made for furnishing data and records in the possession of any federal agency, which data and records shall be provided as requested by the Board. The Board shall constitute an "agency" under 5 U.S.C. § 552b, and its records shall be available as provided in 5 U.S.C. § 552. All expenses of the Board shall be met from the Fund, within appropriations therefor.

(c) The Board may, within the limits of appropriations from the Fund, make grants and loans to other federal agencies and to state and local public bodies for conservation and environmental purposes in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Board. The Board's proposed budget shall be included in the annual budget for the Department of the Interior and shall be transmitted to the Congress as adopted by the Board.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE CALL TO CONSCIENCE FOR SOVIET JEWRY

(By request of Mr. DOLE, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I want to take some time today to draw the attention of the Senate to an issue of paramount importance—the plight of the Jewish activists, refusniks and others whose only crime was to be born Jewish and to be proud of the achievements that are associated with that heritage. These people are not asking for anything special or extraordinary. They are simply asking for their internationally recognized rights to freedom of worship, and in some cases, freedom to emigrate. But what we here in the United States and the rest of the West view as ordinary and inalienable rights, are for the totalitarian society of the Soviet Union a grave threat.

The point is, however, threat or not, these rights are inalienable, and we have an obligation to provide moral and other support for those brave men and women who stand up to the Soviet juggernaut and take a stand for what they believe in. These men and women are our brothers and sisters—and they need our help.

There are a number of ways in which we can help. Perhaps the most important is that we not forget them. It is so easy for many of us to get wrapped up in the daily routine, and lose track of the really important things of life such as the lives and freedom of people who live imprisoned in the restrictive societies of the Soviet Union and other Communist countries.

It is for this reason that we need to take public and private steps to ensure that neither the American people, the United States Government, nor, most importantly, the Soviet Union forget the importance of these people to us.

I have been working for some time to achieve the emigration of several Jewish families in the Soviet Union, and I would like to share some of the details of a particular case with you. Last year, when I participated in the Call to Conscience, I brought to the Senate's attention the case of Yakov Mesh. Yakov is a 33-year-old tailor by trade. He has a wife, Marina, 26, and an 8-year-old son, Marat. Mr. President, Yakov Mesh is a free man today, living with his family here in the United States.

The Mesh family has been trying to leave the Soviet Union since 1977 when 20 of Yakov and Marina's relatives were allowed to emigrate. While Yakov was held back at the time, Soviet officials assured Yakov's mother, Rosa, that Yakov and his family would be allowed to join them shortly. But days turned into months and months turned into years and the Soviets were unrelenting in their refusal to consider issuing him and his family visas.

The reason the Soviets gave for not allowing him to emigrate is that he served in the Soviet military and there acquired a knowledge of military secrets. While it is true that Yakov did serve in the military, he was attached to the sports section as a boxer—hardly a position from which one would expect exposure to essential military secrets. I believe that the real reasons for not allowing the Meshes to emigrate probably had more to do with their pro-Jewish activities in the Soviet Union. They participated in activities such as hunger strikes, and organized seminars and meetings on Jewish culture, history and languages. Because of these activities the Meshes were repeatedly harassed, intimidated, detained and even arrested.

In 1984 Yakov was arrested and while in prison he was abused causing a deterioration in his health. Yakov was released from prison in December 1984.

On February 28, 1985, I went to the Soviet Embassy to discuss this case with Soviet authorities and was accompanied by Senator METZENBAUM. We forcefully made the case for Yakov and his family, and requested that he and his family be issued emigrant visas as soon as possible. We never received any type of response to our meeting at that time.

I know that many of my colleagues have worked on or are working on difficult cases such as Yakov's. In fact because of the tremendous decline in emigration visas granted to Soviet Jews in recent years, there are many heart-rendering cases like this. Yet we cannot give up. We must persevere, and take every possible step we can to provide these brave refusniks with moral support and encouragement because there is hope. We can, with the force of public expressions of concern, force the Soviet Union to allow refusniks to emigrate. Yakov Mesh and his family are free. The efforts that we make in bringing these cases to the attention of Soviet authorities can make a difference. I commend all of my colleagues who are participating in this year's Call to Conscience on Soviet Jewry because this effort is so important. I particularly want to thank Senator MITCHELL who is managing the Call to Conscience this year for allowing me the opportunity to address this important issue at this time.

JOSEPH H. KANTER JOGGING AND EXERCISE CENTER

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the Senate a new exercise facility under construction on the mall at Fourth Street and Independence Avenue SW., adjacent to the National Air and Space Museum at the Smithsonian Institution.

The facility, known as a Parcourse, has been donated by a long time fitness enthusiast, Joseph H. Kanter. A former resident of Washington, DC, Mr. Kanter has for over 40 years enjoyed the benefits of good physical condition that so many Americans are discovering today. Having jogged throughout his lifetime, Mr. Kanter will soon complete a cumulative total mileage equaling the circumference of the Earth.

Mr. Kanter, who now lives in Miami, FL, where he is the chairman of the Bank of Florida, has donated this facility for use by all government employees and all Americans. As one interested in the health of our citizens and a supporter of the "wellness" movement that is inspiring many Americans to lead healthier lifestyles, I applaud Joe Kanter's initiative and urge my colleagues to join in extending thanks to him for his generosity.●

THE HELSINKI ACCORDS AND VISITATION RIGHTS

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, in my almost 8 years in the Senate, I have placed a high priority on promoting and protecting the basic human rights of individuals both in this country and around the world. I have not hesitated to call attention—wherever appropriate—to barriers to either individuals or groups of individuals in the exercise of those basic human rights.

Certain of these basic human rights are guaranteed by our own Constitution and the constitutions of other sovereign nations. Other rights are guaranteed by international treaties and other agreements.

One such agreement is the Helsinki accords and one such right is the right of all individuals to contacts and regular meetings among family members.

The Helsinki accords, for example, commit signatories to favorably consider visa applications from individuals seeking to visit family members in the country in which they live.

Unfortunately, the Soviet Union has not complied with this important provision of the Helsinki accords. Former Soviet citizens who have emigrated to the United States are routinely denied permission to return to the U.S.S.R. for visits to family members. One such Soviet emigree now living in Minnesota has tried repeatedly over the last several years to gain permission to visit aging parents and other relatives in the Soviet Union, but has been denied the necessary visa without any reasonable explanation from Soviet officials.

Not only is this policy by Soviet officials a violation of the Helsinki accords, but it is a violation of basic laws of human decency and respect for the value of the family in society.

It is my understanding that members of the Congress and administration will be participating in a conference in Bern, Switzerland, over the next several months which will deal with human contact issues covered by the Helsinski accords. I am certainly hopeful that our delegation will raise this important issue of visitation rights to relatives in those discussions.

Because of the importance of this issue to Americans and to all people who care about basic human rights, I ask that the following op ed article which recently was published in the Minneapolis Star and Tribune be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

SOVIETS SHOULD FULFILL PLEDGE ON FAMILY VISITS

(Editor's note: On rare occasions, circumstances justify the withholding of a writer's name. This is such an occasion. The writer is a Soviet emigre who lives in the Twin Cities.)

In considering human-rights violations in the Soviet Union, the public, Congress and the media have focused on the Kremlin's refusal to allow Jewish refuseniks to emigrate and on its continuous disregard of the human rights of dissidents.

Also of concern, however, should be the Soviet failure to live up to the provision of the Helsinki accords on contacts and regular meetings among family members, which states:

"In order to promote further development of contacts on the basis of family ties the participating states will favorably consider applications for travel with the purpose of allowing persons to enter or leave their territory temporarily, and on a regular basis if desired, in order to visit members of their families. Applications for temporary visits to meet members of their families will be dealt with without distinction as to the country of origin or destination. . . . The preparation and issue of . . . documents and visas will be effected within reasonable time limits; cases of urgent necessity—such as serious illness or death—will be given priority treatment."

Despite this clear language the Soviet Union is denying visas to those seeking to visit their families in the Soviet Union. Many Soviet Jews who legally emigrated from the Soviet Union in '70s are now U.S. citizens. When they seek to return to the Soviet Union to visit their families, their visa applications are invariably denied.

It is understandable that every country controls its own visa policies and may have legitimate reasons to exclude certain individuals, just as the United States does. However, the Soviet Union is using its power to stop the reunification of families. This punishment of those who have emigrated and their families still living in the Soviet Union is a blatant abuse of basic human rights and must be protested.

The issue of visitation rights has not received sufficient attention. If the administration hears enough voices it will assign the issue a higher priority. To quote Secretary of State George Shultz, "Human rights cannot be relegated to the margins of international policies . . . The need for steady improvement of Soviet performance in the most important human-rights categories is as central to the Soviet-American dialogue as any other theme."

It is important that the Reagan administration and Congress speak out on family-visitation rights. The free flow of individuals and ideas can only improve relations between the United States and the Soviet Union.●

OPENING OF THE BERN HUMAN CONTACTS EXPERTS MEETING OF HELSINKI SIGNATORY STATES

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today marks the opening of the Human Contacts Experts Meeting of Helsinki Signatory States in Bern, Switzerland. The 6-week Bern meeting should be a clear focus of continuing congressional and U.S. public concerns about Soviet and Warsaw Pact policies maintaining barriers between the peoples of East and West in clear violation of their commitments as signatories of the Helsinki Final Act.

The official U.S. delegation to the multilateral conference, led by Ambassador Michael Novak, will address such issues as emigration, divided families, obstacles to family visits and binational marriage, impediments to travel for personal or professional reasons, and interference by East bloc governments with telephone and mail communications. I urge my colleagues in Congress to take an active interest in the Bern meeting and to express their strong support for Ambassador Novak's efforts to conduct a vigorous review of these important issues.

This morning, the New York Times published an article entitled, "Identify All Helsinki Violators," by Leonard R. Sussman, executive director of Freedom House. This article addresses further the importance of the Bern meeting. In particular, it highlights the need for media recognition of our efforts to achieve compliance with the Helsinki Final Act's humanitarian provisions. It deserves the thoughtful attention of everyone who is concerned about human rights. I commend this article to my colleagues' attention.

I ask that Mr. Sussman's article appear in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

Meanwhile, outside the official conference, concerned citizens groups also have organized events designed to train the spotlight of world opinion on the ongoing human contacts violations committed by Eastern governments.

Mr. President, I ask that a letter Cochairman HOYER and I addressed to the participants in the unofficial "Helsinki Review Conference" organized in Bern by nongovernmental representatives of United States, Canadian, and West European human rights advocacy organizations appear in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The documents follow:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 15, 1986]

IDENTIFY ALL HELSINKI VIOLATORS

(By Leonard R. Sussman)

President Reagan's statement last month attacking human rights violators on the right as well as the left drew great attention from the American press and public—and it was indeed newsworthy that a President known for chiding the Soviet Union began to chastise right-wing oppressors. But will the press remain interested when the camera focuses once again on the authenticated evils of the Soviet empire.

That test starts today and continues through May 26 as delegations from the 35 countries that signed the Helsinki accords in 1975 meet in Bern, Switzerland, to examine whether each signatory is fulfilling its pledge to improve "human contacts."

The meeting will focus on rather intimate human activities—family reunification, travel within and between countries, broadening contacts among citizens of different countries, marriage of people of two nationalities and cross-border contacts between religious groups, labor unions and other institutions.

It all sounds innocuous enough, but crossing borders—whether for simple travel or to reunite families—can still be a dangerous, even deadly business in Europe. Barbed wire and police dogs still deter any crossings from East Germany that have not been paid for by a Western government supplying ransoms for the reuniting of families. Just last year, Czechoslovak guards shot and killed Frantisek Faktor for crossing to Austria. Yugoslav border police killed another Czechoslovak citizen already on Austrian soil, and several others drowned while crossing between Yugoslavia and Austria.

Most prominent Polish human rights activists do not travel abroad for fear that they will not be allowed to return to Poland. And the second largest category of political "patients" in the psychiatric hospitals of the Soviet Union—dissidents made up the largest single group—is composed of people who have attempted unauthorized border crossings.

It wasn't suprising, then, that the Soviet Union and its allies strongly opposed the Bern meeting. They belatedly agreed only when the West insisted on maintaining "linkage" between these humanitarian questions and the security aspects of the Helsinki accords.

Bureaucratic procedures for expanding human contacts may not seem newsworthy, but change could reflect significant improvements in the closed societies of the Eastern bloc. Besides, even without significant change—and it is unlikely that this six-week conference will lead to major openings—the quite oppression in Soviet-bloc countries is always newsworthy, and providing publicity is the most important thing we can do for the victims in the gulags.

The human rights violations that receive most attention occur in countries with significant public connections to the United States. Yet the worst human rights abuses routinely occur in places where we have little or no connections—Iran, Iraq, Cambodia, Vietnam, Afghanistan, North Korea and Eastern Europe, among others. Because Washington has relatively little official business in these countries, there is little press coverage of violations there, and the public receives a distorted view of where the worst oppressors are headquartered.

Of course, the countries where we have the best connections are also the places where we can do most good, using our leverage—usually the promise of economic or military aid—to influence human rights practices. But we can have an effect even on countries where we have no leverage—by providing persuasive public and private expressions of unflagging American abhorrence of human rights abuses and of our determination to work by all effective means to eliminate them.

That abhorrence will be aired in detail by the American delegation at Bern—and it should be properly reported in the press these next six weeks. The Administration is making an important effort to balance its human rights policy, and it is time for the press to provide similar balance in covering the human rights story.

The Soviet Union has insisted that the Bern meetings be closed to journalists, but the American press and public have a responsibility to attend to the "naming of names" at the Helsinki review conference.

COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE,
CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, April 14, 1986.

To the Participants in the Helsinki Review Conference, Buregerhaus Bern, Neuengasse 20, CH 3011, Bern, Switzerland.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE CSCE PROCESS: As Chairman and Co-Chairman of the U.S. (Helsinki) Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the independent U.S. Government agency mandated by Congress to monitor and encourage compliance with the 1975 Helsinki Final Act, we send you our best wishes.

As a matter of principle in CSCE, the Commission has stressed the vitally important role that private individuals and nongovernmental representatives play in the Helsinki process. Since the Final Act's signing, concerned citizens from both the East and West have sought to give the Helsinki Final Act's words more than just symbolic meaning. From the West's perspective, private efforts do not counter the work of participating governments; they complement it.

In fact, individual citizens' activities, alone or in association with other persons, are the clearest expression of the true spirit of the Helsinki process. Your activities become even more important when contrasted with East Bloc states' treatment of their citizens who similarly have attempted to exercise their rights and play a legitimate and genuine role in the Helsinki process. Your freedom to speak and act casts in stark relief Soviet and East Bloc failures to live up to their Helsinki promises to respect human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The Bern Human Contacts Experts Meeting is coming at a time when the direction of East-West relations is a matter of intense popular interest and comment. In advance of the third major Helsinki Review Meeting, scheduled to begin in Vienna in November, it is only fitting that concerned citizens such as yourselves take early stock of the Helsinki process and consider means by which its effectiveness can be increased.

The Helsinki process remains an important instrument of diplomacy for the United States and for other Western democracies. The Final Act placed respect for fundamental human freedoms squarely within the East-West framework as a basic element of government-to-government relations. In East-West diplomacy, the Helsinki process has become the vehicle by which concerns in humanitarian, military, political, social, cultural and other fields routinely are conveyed. Also, the Helsinki umbrella has afforded to the smaller Eastern countries in particular much greater latitude in establishing relationships with Western nations independently of the Soviet Union. The multilateral Helsinki approach to problems can serve to increase Western leverage by compounding the political cost to the Eastern governments of human rights violations. Furthermore, Helsinki's European focus ensures that debate on key issues remains centered on an area where Western ideas fall on familiar and fertile soil.

Helsinki's unique follow-up provisions, calling for periodic review meetings such as those in Belgrade, Madrid and the upcoming Vienna Conference and the interim meeting such as the Bern experts meeting, constitute a continuing framework for the consideration of a broad range of East-West matters and keep the door open to the possibility of concrete progress when the international climate is propitious.

From the beginning, the West has acknowledged that full implementation of the Helsinki accords' provisions will be a long-term process. In the decade since the accords were signed, the West has chronicled some steps forward as well as a litany of Eastern human rights violations. In the human contracts field, for example, there have been some welcome easements in the emigration and travel policies and practices of some East Bloc countries and a net increase has been registered in East-West travel.

Yet, despite their Helsinki commitments, Eastern countries, continue to maintain policies stringently limiting and controlling the movement of their citizens. Physical barriers, such as the Berlin Wall, remain tangible reminders of the artifical division of Europe—and Europeans—by force. Legal, procedural and financial obstacles are imposed and methods of intimidation are applied by Eastern governments in order to dissuade would-be emigrants, finances and travellers, Helsinki monitors, human rights activitist, religious believers, unofficial peace groups members and free trade unionists have been prosecuted for their efforts to maintian independent contacts with Eastern and Western counterparts.

The U.S. Helsinki Commission has urged that all such problems be raised forthrightly at the Bern Human Contacts Experts Meeting. Your support of the CSCE process and participation at Bern assistant in drawing the international spotlight to these same problems and in so doing will help to ensure that the victims of repressive and restrictive governments are remembered and that their plight is brought to the attention of officials of the offending governments.

The U.S. Helsinki Commission closes its letter of greeting to you with a restatement of our conviction that the Helsinki process—painstakingly built only a few hundred miles away in Geneva—can, if developed over time in a determined, concerted and compassionate manner, lead to positive results. We should not lose sight of our ultimate aim, perhaps put most eloquently by physicist Yuri Orlov, founder of the Moscow Helsinki Group and a prisoner of conscience since 1977: "By our efforts, we increase the probability that in the end we shall be successful."

Joining you in these humanitarian efforts, the U.S. Helsinki Commission sends you our best regards.

Sincerely.

ALFONSE M. D'AMATO,
Chairman.

THE SETTING OF SOCIAL STANDARDS BY GOVERNMENT

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, two items of recommended reading recently crossed my desk. One is Paul Johnson's magisterial history of the 20th century, "Modern Times." It is massive, literate, sweeping in scope, emphatic in conclusions. The other is just the opposite. Richard B. Freeman's study for the National Bureau of Economic Research, a private think tank in Cambridge, MA, is slim, statistical, and tentative. It is micro-analysis, focusing on "the relation of church-going and other background factors to the socioeconomic performance of black male youths from inner-city poverty tracts."

Johnson's opus won international acclaim, while Freeman's working paper has received scant attention. Despite their differences, however, the two publications are intimately related; and in understanding that kinship we may get a better grip on some of the policy problems we face in government today.

When "Modern Times" appeared in 1983, it became an instant classic. For readers around the world, divided by every imaginable distinction, it deftly drew together the pieces of mankind's shattering experience to arrange them in a startling pattern. For Johnson did more than recount the horrors of the last nine decades. He gave them a logic.

He showed how the ghastly suffering of this century has been the natural consequence of moral relativism. Once mankind—or rather, a large part of its rulers and opinion makers—accepted the idea that one set of values is no better than any other, it became silly to quibble about a crime here, an atrocity there. Efficiency became as important as justice, ruthlessness as ethical as mercy. A human life could have no more value than a bureaucrat's whim or a commissar's production quota.

Granted, evil has always been with us. This side of the Garden of Eden, human history seems a record of our shortcomings. But the malignity of the 20th century has been fundamentally different: many have denied the distinction between good and evil. When all virtue is relative, so is all vice. The distinguished healer of minds, Dr. Karl Menninger, turning his attention to ailments of the spirit a few years ago, asked in the title of his thoughtful essay, "Whatever happened to sin?" That is, whatever happened to the concept, basic to western civilization, that rational individuals can discern right from wrong and that those two categories, far from being arbitrary, are non-negotiable expressions of values to which mankind is summoned by its Creator?

Readers of "Modern Times" know what happened. The very concept of values crumbled under the onslaught, not so much from modern science, as from those who wielded science to justify their own social and politicial agendas. Thus, scientific genetics could be used to advance ignorant racism. Scientific psychiatry could be used to justify personal misconduct or national lunacy. Scientific physics could be distorted into a denial of any standard of measurement, including those applicable to human behavior.

This denial of all norms was the intellectual prerequisite to establishing regimes like those of Nazis, Soviets, and their imitators past and present. Monstrous evil was made possible by the corruption of the individual mind. Once it became acceptable to eliminate one defective person for the common good, then there could be no effective objection to larger enterprises of like nature. The scores of millions killed—dying now—under Marxism can mean no more than the far fewer millions slaughtered under Hitler. Those in turn meant no more than the quarter million massacred in Nanking alone during a 2-month period of Japanese occupation, who all together meant no more than the hundreds of twins butchered by "Doctor" Mengele in his hideous experiments. Their deaths were no more important than that of a single mental patient gassed by physicians years before the Holocaust began. If the one did not matter, then neither did the multitude.

We like to think our society is immune to such amorality, but it may be only the difference between acorn and oak. Under the proper circumstances, the former develops into the latter. Those who have read "the fine print" in the Supreme Court's decision in Roe versus Wade, giving the state the option—not the obligation—of protecting life after birth will know what I mean. But that is a subject for another time.

For this time, instead, we can summarize the findings of Richard Freeman's study: There appears to be a correlation between church attendance by low-income black youngsters and their later prospects for escaping poverty and moving into the mainstream of American life. If that seems puny when compared to Paul Johnson's grand exposition, look more closely at what it is telling us. Young people who daily confront disadvantage and discouragement are much more likely to lead successful lives—not just economically successful, but in terms of overall personal development—if they participate in institutions or social processes that inculcate fixed values and demand an ethically normative code of conduct. On the other hand—and perhaps it is more important to put things this way—youngsters who grow up without a sense of spiritually ordered right and wrong are far less likely to break out of the ranks of what some call the underclass. Not only are they more apt to do wrong to society, through crimes, but they are also less able to do right by themselves, through development of their personal potential.

That sets in microcosm the immense lesson of "Modern Times": Ethical norms are a necessary part of all human interaction; without them, in the long run, we are doomed.

But of course, most Americans would say. No one denies that. Tragically, many do deny it; or to be more precise, they claim that, since all morality is relative anyway, moral standards must be private. Government must abstain from decisions that demand an ethical dimension. Public policy must not be used to impose one set of values upon all. In particular, those whose ethical concerns spring from religious commitment cannot intrude their private views into civic discourse. If they insist upon doing so, one public figure recently explained, "we've got to show them for the bigots they are. We've gotta wrap it around their necks!"

That extreme statement has a familiar ring to it. Wrapped in phrases plucked inappropriately from the U.S. Constitution, the same argument has appeared in editorials and speeches throughout the country. The application of moral values to public policy is suspect as the intrusion of religion into politics. Indeed, some groups have gone so far as to ask Federal judges to strike down congressional legislation because its sponsors were acting out of ethical motives related to their religious beliefs. Thus far, the courts have hesitated to take that step; but there is no assurance that some jurists may not attempt it in the future.

That is only part of the price we pay, as a society, for moral relativism in public life. It paralyzes government in the face of critical problems; for when ethical choices are not made consciously, they are made by default.

That brings us back to the Freeman study and others like it. We know that intact families are the best preventive medicine against a whole range of social pathologies. Two-parent households are much less inclined to delinquency, welfare dependence, substance abuse, problems in schooling, and so on. One would assume, therefore, that public policy would do all in its power to foster stable family life. That would be not only in the interest of the taxpayers and the community as a whole, but also to the direct benefit of those who need incentives to keep their households together.

But government does not do that. It avoids the appearance of moralism. It dares not to prefer certain family arrangements to others. Indeed, a series of decisions by the Supreme Court over the last two decades has called into question the ability of government to have such a preference, even if public officials wanted to do so. One of them is especially enlightening. In Moore versus City of East Cleveland (1977), the Court confronted a local zoning ordinance which restricted housing to intact families, thereby prohibiting communes and other tenuous living arrangements. This was not a cover for bigotry; East Cleveland was a predominantly black city under a black city commission and city manager. Their purpose in zoning their community for families was affirmative, not exclusionary. Hoping to preserve the strong family structure that had enabled them to reach the mainstream of American life, they were declaring that this particular norm is what works best for people trying to live decent lives, advance economically, and raise children who will be assets, rather than liabilities, to the community.

They did not have a chance in Washington. Relying explicitly upon such cases as Roe versus Wade, Justice Powell wrote in the majority decision:

> The Constitution prevents [the government] from standardizing its children—and its adults—by forcing all to live in certain narrowly defined family patterns.

The Constitution, of course, says nothing of the sort; but that has not prevented a majority on the Court from forbidding Congress and the States to allot public benefits, especially welfare, on the basis of family structure. This deprived the States of their traditional means of encouraging legitimate births over illegitimate ones, of encouraging marital commitment over cohabitation, of reinforcing the norms of social behavior rather than the aberrations that now threaten to overwhelm society. The people of East Cleveland have nothing to say about what are or are not acceptable living arrangements. The people of New Jersey cannot give preference, in receipt of welfare, to married—as opposed to cohabiting—couples, according to the Court in New Jersey Welfare Rights Organization versus Cahill. The Congress cannot direct food stamps only to households composed of individuals related by blood, marriage, or adoption, according to the Court in USDA versus Moreno.

In short, there are no grounds for the community to impose its values on others. Its notions about family structure or socially productive behavior are entirely relative. Intimidated by that argument, many public officials have, in effect, written off what some call "the underclass," the millions who have been left behind in America's ongoing progress. But we have done them no favor by not imposing our norms upon them. They have paid the price for the relativism of public policy. Their children continue to pay it.

Meanwhile, evidence accumulates that the setting of social standards by government, the official preference for certain kinds of living arrangements and behavior patterns, would be one of the best things we could do for those now trapped outside the American mainstream. Among disadvantaged minorities, intact families have attained incomes near the national average. Among the poor in city after city, youngsters are excelling in schools that are short on resources but rich in moral standards. In experiments with mandatory work programs, welfare dependency has fallen. Sure, the public benefits from these trends. But the persons involved have the greatest gain, not only financially but where it counts most: in their self-respect, their independence, their human fulfillment.

That is reason for great hope, but only if we are willing to translate these lessons into policies which affirm and enforce the norms upon which human advancement depends. That means those in government have a special responsibility. They have an obligation to apply the standards they avow to their official decisions. Otherwise, they are juggling two sets of ethical books, one for private lives and the other for public business. They must not be afraid to act upon the values they profess, to translate into legislation or administration the sense of right and wrong that distinguishes us from the totalitarians of these modern times.●

UNREST AND VIOLENCE IN SOUTH AFRICA

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to congratulate Bishop Tutu on his appointment as the Archbishiop of Capetown. He is the first black man to head the Anglican Church in South Africa. Bishop Tutu is a great man and a formidable spiritual leader of his people. I had the privilege of meeting him when he visited the United States and we discussed the situation in South Africa. Bishop Tutu has repeatedly warned that continued white intransigence would lead to further violence in South Africa. Sadly his predictions have come true. In the 24 hours preceding his election, for example, 14 black persons died and the bodies of another 36 were found in a tribal homeland north of Pretoria.

I am increasingly concerned about the reports of continued heightened violence in South Africa. For a time, the restrictions on the American press imposed under the state of emergency decree issued by the Government in South Africa resulted in less coverage by American media of the violence and unrest in South Africa. Now the State of Emergency has been lifted but the press is still restricted in instances from covering the unrest and violence. But that unrest and violence is still occurring on a massive scale. According to Amnesty International, extensive violations of human rights by the South African authorities have escalated further in the wake of widespread black protest against Apartheid.

Recently, Amnesty International USA published a report that documented that in 1984 238,000 people were arrested because of alleged violation of the pass laws. The State Department's country reports on human rights practices reported that almost 900 people were killed last year and more than 11,000 were detained by the police and security forces there.

We are at a crossroads in our policy toward South Africa. We cannot stand idly by and tacitly participate in the South African economy by accepting the President's assurances that the sanctions in his Executive order are sufficient. We must take additional measures to promote justice and freedom in South Africa. That is why I recently introduced a bill for further economic sanctions against South Africa and why I intend to support other similar measures as they come before Congress.

Two weeks ago, Archbishop Tutu risked a charge of treason by saying:

> I have no hope for change from this government unless they are forced. We face a catastrophe in the land, and only the action of the international community, by applying pressure, can save us. Our children are dying. Our land is burning and bleeding, and so I call on the international community to apply punitive sanctions against the government to help us establish a new South Africa—nonracial, democratic, participatory and just.

Today I congratulate Bishop Tutu on his election, and I say to him that we in the Senate hear his call and the call of millions of other South Africans. We can answer that call by bringing to the floor of this body more stringent sanctions legislation and voting that legislation into law.●

SESQUICENTENNIAL EDITION OF THE EDGEFIELD ADVERTISER

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I should like to recognize a great achievement by the Edgefield Advertiser, a weekly newspaper in Edgefield, SC. This newspaper is currently celebrating its sesquicentennial anniversary. In the 150 years in which this newspaper has been in operation, it has never missed an issue or changed its name. In fact, for the past 114 years, it has been owned by the same family.

The history of the Edgefield Advertiser is filled with colorful and historic stories. For example, it was the only newspaper to publish the letter of Colonel Travis, commander of the Alamo, to Gen. Sam Houston. This historic press coverage prompted the Governor of Texas and the mayor of San Antonio to send their congratulations to the Edgefield Advertiser in commemoration of its sesquicentennial.

The Edgefield Advertiser combines a strong sense of history with a dedication to excellence in reporting the events that currently impact on Edgefield and the surrounding area. I offer my most sincere congratulations on a job well done.●

NAUM AND INNA MEIMAN: SUPPORT IN CONGRESS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I just returned from a moving news conference to demonstrate solidarity with Naum and Inna Meiman with Senator HART, Congressman WIRTH, Congressman SIKORSKI, Lisa Paul, Olga Plam, Naum's daughter, and others.

All of us spoke about the profound effect that Naum and Inna had on us when we met them. As Lisa Paul, a young Minnesota woman who went on a 25-day hunger strike for the Meimans, said, "The Meimans have this incredible energy and vitality." To think of Inna suffering in pain in Moscow is a chilling thought. Naum is a 74-year-old man. He has not performed "sensitive" work in 30 years.

The Meimans are persecuted for expressing their desire to leave the Soviet Union. What good does it do the Soviets to keep the Meimans there?

I strongly urge the Soviets to allow the Meimans to emigrate to Israel.●

SCHIZOPHRENIA

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, schizophrenia strikes 1 percent of the American people. It is devastating disease. Of the hundreds of thousands of homeless Americans, from one-third to one-half are mentally ill, most of these afflicted with incurable schizophrenia. The costs of this disease to this Nation annually exceed $20 billion. We are now spending $27 million annually on research.

Science tells us it is a brain disease, that is does not come about from bad parents or "toxic" families. Nor is it necessarily character flaw in the afflicted person, as it was once believed. Because of psychotropic medication, schizophrenic citizens are no longer hospitalized for endless years. They are stabilized and returned to the community. Unfortunately, communities are poorly prepared to receive them and to provide the rehabilitation services that can and will help them achieve their potential for independence and self-care.

The care givers today are, in the majority of cases, the families. They need help in understanding the illness, in providing a therapeutic environment in the home, in financial support, and in respite from the day-in-day-out regime of care.

Mr. President, these remarks are to introduce an excellent four-part series on schizophrenia that appeared in the New York Times, March 16–19, 1986. I offer them because there is a lot of ignorance across this land about schizophrenia, as well as other serious mental illnesses such as major or manic depression. The Times series gives an up-to-date report of the state of scientific research on this disease. It details the emerging family movement that is achieving historic growth as a force in the Halls of Congress, our State capitals, city halls, and courthouse. It describes the treatment and rehabilitation needs of these mentally ill citizens. It describes the gaps in our mental health system.

I commend the editors of the New York Times for focusing on this important topic at a time when policymakers must face the consequences of mental illness in our society, particularly among the homeless whose numbers continue to grow.

I ask that the articles from the New York Times be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

SCHIZOPHRENIA PUZZLE: TOLL RISES AMID HOPE

(By Philip M. Boffey)

WASHINGTON.—Schizophrenia is emerging as the worst mental health problem facing the nation. Yet it has long been the most neglected.

Never before in American history have so many schizophrenics been seen on the streets of American cities, screaming aloud to voices only they can hear, proclaiming themselves God, warning passers-by that the Central Intelligence Agency has bugged their brains, or simply sitting, mute and withdrawn, sunk in an apathy so deep that no emotion crosses their faces.

But street people are only a part of the problem. Far more victims of this shattering disease are now in the homes of their families, in the nation's hospitals, in nursing homes, halfway houses or seedy hotels—either forgotten or given care that, health experts agree, has brought only limited relief of their suffering.

SIGNS OF NEW UNDERSTANDING

But there are now important signs of change.

Interviews and an extensive review of medical journals and scientific papers reveal that the nation is moving toward a new era in both understanding and treating schizophrenia. The new insights are paradoxical, the news, to some degree, both bad and good:

Not only are more people suffering from schizophrenia than ever, but medical and behavioral scientists believe that the disease itself is far more complicated and resistant to treatment than had been realized. Moreover, though much has been learned about its manifestations, the basic cause remains a mystery.

On the other hand, for the first time in decades, scientists are expressing cautious hope that progress can now be made toward unraveling the inner mysteries of schizophrenia and finding more effective treatments.

ENORMOUS COST TO SOCIETY

All told, two million to three million Americans, 1 percent of the population, either have the disorder or will develop it at some point in their lives, according to the National Institute of Mental Health.

The cost to society is enormous, with authoritative estimates ranging from $20 billion annually, as calculated by the N.I.M.H., to $48 billion reported by the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences. The estimates are of expenses incurred in providing treatment and social services, as well as the staggering amount of productivity lost as schizophrenics; lives are disrupted.

"While schizophrenia is by no means the most common mental illness," a 1984 report from the mental health institute asserted, "It is probably the most costly and devastating in terms of human suffering."

It has never been easy to determine who is schizophrenic; all the homeless people who wander the streets are by no means suffering from the disorder. But the N.I.M.H. studies were based on one of the most scientifically precise analyses ever conducted of schizophrenia.

Some 20,000 people were randomly selected by researchers at Yale, Johns Hopkins, Washington University of St. Louis, Duke and the University of California at Los Angeles, and carefully chosen diagnostic criteria were used to determine which could properly be judged to be suffering from the disorder. Information was collected from the late 1970's until late 1981; over the next three years it was analyzed and extrapolations were made to the general population.

Schizophrenia is the classic disease of madness, a disease that can produce symptoms and behavior so bizarre that people recoil from its victims in fear, revulsion or disbelief.

Schizophrenics often suffer from delusions, hallucinations or a wild disordering of thought processes, an inability to think straight. In periods when their more florid symptoms are absent, they may show no emotion at all, talking in a flat, monotonous voice, from a face without expression, showing almost no response at all to the people and events around them. Then again, at other times, the patient may show no signs of disorder.

The reasons for all this remain a mystery. Schizophrenia is still regarded as one of the most baffling of all—"possibily the most complex puzzle in biomedicine," according to Dr. Shervert H. Frazier, the director of the National Institute of Mental Health. Its cause is unknown, its progression unpredictable. Schizophrenia has no cure, although drugs can control its most bizarre manifestations. Nor is there any laboratory test capable of providing an undisputed diagnosis.

But rapid strides have been made in understanding some aspects of the disease, producing a small revolution in scientific comprehension and guarded hope for further advances. The new studies have shown that the outlook for schizophrenics is by no means as uniformly dismal as was widely believed just a few years ago. Roughly half of all schizophrenics eventually get better, spontaneously, over the course of decades, according to five recent studies.

Many other key concepts about the disease have changed dramatically as well. The old notion that families were to blame for causing the disease has given way to the notion that biological factors play a major causative role.

There is a recognition now, too, that drugs, introduced in the late 1950's, are not by themselves enough—that psychotherapies and drugs work best in tandem. And in long-term care, simple management of daily life is proving as important as drugs or psychotherapy. Most important, old beliefs have faded that the disturbing outward symptoms, the hallucinations and delusions, are the most important aspect of the disease. Less flamboyant "deficit" symptoms, like apathy and inertia, are now regarded by many experts as constituting the care of the disorder.

Scientists have thus realized, belatedly, that they were focusing much of their energies for the past three decades on the less important symptoms.

ANCIENT MADNESS OR A MODERN ILL?

Nobody really knows whether schizophrenia is an ancient disease that has always afflicted mankind, or an illness that was ushered in by modern civilization. The word "schizophrenia" was not even coined until 1911, and scholars still argue over whether symptoms of madness described in earlier literature represent essentially the same disorder that we now call schizophrenia.

Dr. E. Fuller Torrey, a Washington psychiatrist who has published some of the most provocative analyses of the origins of schizophrenia, believes that the illness was virtually unknown until about 1800, when it appeared suddenly all over the Western world, increased rapidly for about 100 years, then leveled off about 1920 and has maintained essentially the same prevalence rate ever since. He links the appearance and spread of schizophrenia to the rise of civilization. But Dr. Torrey acknowledges that his is a minority view.

The mainstream view was expressed in a paper by four scholars from N.I.M.H., published in a recent issue of Comprehensive Psychiatry. They found sketchy descriptions of delusions, auditory hallucinations and bizarre behavior in documents as far back as the third millenium B.C., in cuneiform tablets from ancient Mesopotamia. Although "the evidence is not conclusive," they said, it nevertheless suggests that "schizophrenia has existed throughout history."

Dr. Torrey, who has conducted some of the most thorough epidemiological reviews, believes that the highest schizophrenia rates in the world are found in northern Sweden, western Ireland and northern Yugoslavia. The United States falls somewhere in the middle, with rates roughly comparable to those in Japan, England, Germany and Denmark. And relatively low rates are found in southern Europe and in the developing world.

But such comparisons are fraught with uncertainty. Schizophrenia has been defined solely by its symptoms, and doctors in different countries have often used different definitions or methods of diagnosis. Whatever real differences may exist are not understood.

In a majority of countries surveyed, schizophrenia appears to be disproportionately high in the poorer classes. But it is not known whether the disease actually strikes the poor in greater numbers, or whether the afflicted poor are more visible or more often diagnosed with what may be a stigmatizing label. And schizophrenia often so disables its victims that they are unable to earn a living.

Schizophrenia is apparently not becoming more prevalent as a percentage of the population. Epidemiologists have long estimated that about 1 in every 100 Americans will develop schizophrenia at some point in their lifetime, and they believe that rate is holding stable. But as the nation's population increases, particularly in the age groups where schizophrenia is most common, the number of schizophrenics in the United States has climbed to an all-time high.

The mental, emotional and financial toll exacted by this bizarre disease is enormous. Schizophrenics occupy over half of the hospital beds for the mentally ill and retarded in the United States and fully one-fourth of all hospital beds in the nation, according to the Institute of Medicine.

Few other mental illnesses disrupt the whole course of their victim's lives so completely. Schizophrenia typically strikes men in their late teens or 20's, and women perhaps five years later, just at the point where the victims have finished the long, costly preparation for life and are embarking on adulthood. For reasons that are unclear, but could be related to hormones, the course of the disease is often less severe in women.

NEW THOUGHTS ON CAUSE AND RECOVERY

The old rule of thumb used to be that about a third of all schizophrenics would improve, about a third would stagnate and a third would deteriorate. Indeed, a recent diagnostic manual published by the American Psychiatric Association, known as DSM-III, says "a complete return to premorbid functioning is unusual—so rare, in fact, that some clinicians would question the diagnosis."

But recent studies have shown surprising and encouraging evidence that many cases of schizophrenia eventually cure themselves.

A recent long-term follow-up of 118 schizophrenics who were discharged from Vermont State Hospital 20 to 25 years found that half to two-thirds had since achieved "significant improvement or recovery." The improvements seemed to be spontaneous, for the most part coming well after treatment. Fully 45 percent had no psychiatric symptoms at all after two decades, and another 23 percent had lost all symptoms of schizophrenia while developing symptoms of other, more treatable, mental disorders. The results corroborated similar results from three European studies and another American study over the past decade indicating that half or more of the schizophrenics eventually recovered or significantly improved.

"It's not all downhill," says Dr. Frazier, the N.I.M.H. director. "Our data show that 50 per cent or more do improve."

"They get better but not necessarily well," says Dr. Howard Goldman, a special consultant to the institute. "It's a far better prognosis than we used to give people, that they would just get worse and worse and end up on the back wards of the state hospital as a vegetable."

Theories as to what causes schizophrenia have changed sharply over the years, although they remain just that—theories. Those tracing the cause of schizophrenia to family or childhood experiences, although once very popular in this country, have faded in recent years. The old concept that "schizophrenigenic mothers" caused the disease by their coldness and rejection of their children has largely been abandoned, as have notions that pathological family interaction was the chief cause.

But stress within the family is still believed to play some role. Studies in several countries have found that schizophrenics who returned after hospital treatment to live with families that criticized them a lot or got overinvolved in their lives suffered far more relapses than those who returned to families more tolerant and supportive.

Moreover, stress in general is still believed by some experts to play a role in triggering schizophrenia, perhaps by pushing a vulnerable individual over the edge.

But today, most scientists are focusing on possible biological or medical causes.

Genetic factors clearly play some role, according to a range of research done years ago and refined in more recent studies. The children of a schizophrenic parent, for example, have about a 10 percent chance of developing schizophrenia, and of two schizophrenic parents a 39 percent chance, far above the 1 percent chance in the general population. Most scientists believe that what is inherited is not the disease itself, but a vulnerability or predisposition to it. No one, however, has pinpointed a specific genetic defect responsible.

EMPHASIS SHIFTS TO OTHER SYMPTOMS

Technologies that enable scientists to probe deeper than ever into the structure and functioning of the brain have given an impetus to the search for biochemical and physiological abnormalities.

New brain scanning instruments have shown that the brains of some schizophrenics are actually different from the brains of people who do not have the disease. Schizophrenics often have an enlargement of cavities in the interior of the brain, or functional abnormalities like unusual electrical impulses, decreased blood flow or glucose utilization in key areas of the brain, and excess or lack of neurotransmitters, the cells of the brain that enable it to send and receive information.

Nobody knows what role these biological factors play in causing schizophrenia, and no common biological factor has yet been found. But the rapid rush of new findings is creating optimism that a biological explanation will eventually be developed.

One theory is that schizophrenia will be shown to be caused by a slow virus, exerting its effect years after it first invades the body. The evidence, however, is still sparse.

The new understanding of schizophrenia has placed a major emphasis on a range of less glaring symptoms that had previously received little attention. Among these are the blunting of the emotions, loss of curiosity, narrowing of ideas, poverty of speech, a diminution of social drive, and deep apathy or inertia. For several decades, the features most commonly emphasized by doctors, those now referred to as the positive ones, have been the bizarre manifestations like hallucinations, delusions and incoherent thoughts.

The positive symptoms are often accompanied by the less dramatic, but equally debilitating, negative symptoms. Sometimes they are closely linked, and both sets of symptoms come and go in tandem, according to William Carpenter, a psychiatrist at the University of Maryland who initially identified the importance of the negative symptoms.

But in many cases, the negative symptoms appear to be entirely independent of the positive symptoms, so that a patient can be "cured" of hallucinations and delusions but remain deeply impaired by apathy.

"Most treatment has focused on the positive symptoms in an effort to reduce the hallucinations and delusions and the more florid aspects of the illness," said Dr. Joseph Autry, director of policy analysis for N.I.M.H. "Now we need to address the deficits that may, in fact, be the core element of the disease."

"There is a concern that while the deficit, or negative, symptoms may be the most troubling, the bulk of attention in diagnosis and treatment has been directed toward the positive symptoms," Dr. Frazier said in a speech last November. "This stems, in part, from the fact that existing medications are more effective in treating positive symptoms."

DRUGS ARE A HELP, NOT THE ENTIRE ANSWER

A major breakthrough in treating schizophrenia came three decades ago with the discovery of the antipsychotic, or neuroleptic, drugs, found accidentally during a search for medication to alleviate anxiety among surgical patients.

The neuroleptic drugs revolutionized the treatment of schizophrenia and had an immense social impact. The drugs control the most disruptive symptoms of schizophrenia, and doctors, for the first time, felt safe in moving patients out of state hospitals and back into the community.

But the drugs do not work on all schizophrenics, and many patients suffer relapses while on treatment. Some 40 percent of all schizophrenics who are discharged from the hospital suffer relapses within two years, even with continued drug treatment, although the number soars to 80 percent if drugs are discontinued. The drugs do not prevent relapses, most experts say, but rather reduce their frequency.

Unfortunately, they can also do damage. Some 13 per cent of all schizophenics who have received antipsychotic drugs for many years develop a side effect, tardive dyskinesia, which can produce involuntary movements of the tongue mouth or limbs.

The initial drug discoveries have not been followed by any comparable advances over the past three decades. What new drugs there are operate in basically the same way and represent, at best, marginal improvements for some patients.

"The basic problem with drugs is that we don't know the cause of schizophrenia, and until we do it's difficult to design a proper treatment," says Dr. Richard Wyatt, head of the neuropsychiatry branch at the National Institute of Mental Health.

Most important of all, the drugs have almost no value in treating the negative symptoms. "I see nothing on the near horizon to treat the deficits with," says Dr. Wyatt. "It would be blind luck if we stumbled across something."

An early approach to psychotherapy with schizophrenics, which involved an intense encounter between therapist and patient, has fallen out of favor. At many private hospitals, though, psychoanalytic and other therapies are used, as well as a more general supportive treatment that tries to build on whatever strengths the patient may have in the midst of his illness. Such therapy is not available to the vast majority of schizophrenics who are being treated in public facilities.

"Almost everyone who does therapy with schizophrenics uses drugs to make the patient accessible to treatment," said Mortimer Ostow, a psychiatrist who wrote one of the first books on combining drug and psychotherapy approaches. "When the patient is too psychotic, with flamboyant symptoms, there is no point in trying therapy."

Current research is seeking ways to lower the dosages of drugs used. Helping patients better organize and order the tasks of day-to-day life has, in early studies, shown promise, allowing lower drug dosages by lessening symptoms exacerbated by stress.

STUDY OF DISEASE HAS BEEN NEGLECTED

Despite its destructive impact and enormous cost to society, schizophrenia has been widely neglected even among those in the position to help.

Psychiatrists in private practice seldom deal with these patients because they are hard to treat and are generally too poor to pay their own way or to carry substantial insurance.

Dr. Torrey scornfully accuses his fellow psychiatrists of ignoring schizophrenics and caring only for what he calls the "worried well"—"neurotic ladies and gentlemen" who spend hours explaining "how their feelings about mother had shaped their lives." Dr. John A. Talbott, a past president of the American Psychiatric Association, acknowledges that psychiatry is "one of the few specialties where the most skilled practitioners take care of the least impaired patients."

The very institutions that are designed to care for schizophrenics often throw up their hands in despair over the great numbers who need help and the lack to date of any really effective treatment to restore their health. Wave after wave of reform in the American mental health system has brought little benefit to schizophrenics. The state mental hospitals, which were created in the last century to provide the first humane treatment for the insane, did little for schizophrenics except lock them up, far from the eyes of other citizens who might be offended by their presence.

The community mental health centers that were supposed to replace state hospitals as the cornerstone of this generation's effort to "reform" mental health care have often neglected the schizophrenics and concentrated on easier patients.

"The history of the care of the mentally ill in this country is one of abuse and neglect," says Dr. Ellen Bassuk, associate professor of Psychiatry at the Harvard Medical School. "Whether that abuse and neglect occurred in the hospital or in the community is beside the point. There's been a lack of commitment to the care of these terribly ill individuals. That's the bottom line."

Research scientists have been reluctant to investigate schizophrenia, largely because it is so hard to understand, measure and treat.

A meeting of expert consultants who were called upon to address the problem at N.I.M.H. last July heard Dr. Frazier express "deep concern" about the difficulties in attracting scientists into the field. Various experts noted a sharp drop in the number of scientific articles on schizophrenia, a drop in applications for research support to a major private foundation, and a loss of interest among young scientists. A host of factors were blamed for the decline, including the lack of any comprehensive theory of the disease to guide research, the apparent intractability of the problem and the limited possibilities to actually help many patients.

But signs of a stronger Federal commitment to conquer schizophrenia are emerging. Dr. Frazier said that two years ago he felt that "inadequate attention" was being paid to schizophrenia in comparison to other mental illnesses and that people in the field had "lost heart," so he pushed for a stronger emphasis on studying the disease.

The N.I.M.H. recently selected schizophrenia as one of its five major targets, elevating it to a new level of importance. The agency's funds for research have been edging up slowly, from $18.4 million in the fiscal year 1985 to a projected $20.6 million this year, although critics feel these sums are paltry given the importance of the disease. And the agency has established a new schizophrenia research branch to coordinate and focus attention on the disorder. It is also considering a broad range of incentives to attract young scientists into the field.

No one believes that a cure for schizophrenia is near, but Federal officials are increasingly optimistic that major progress can be made. So is Dr. Torrey, who sees "a potential for significant breakthroughs" if research is increased. "Ten years ago we felt we didn't know where to begin," he said. "But given rapid advances since then, it looks very promising now. To not invest in schizophrenia research is very foolish."

SCHIZOPHRENIA: DISORDER HAS MANY FACES

The roots of schizophrenia remain a mystery. There is uncertainty as to the precise roles of biology and of environment, and many experts believe that the diagnosis of schizophrenia covers a group of disorders that will one day prove to have differing causes.

The diagnosis of schizophrenia requires that a person display a serious loss of contact with reality, such as bizarre delusions—for example, that one's thoughts are being broadcast on the radio—auditory hallucinations, or incoherent thoughts with no awareness of the incoherence. These symptoms typically accompany a marked deterioration of the person's ability to function.

When these active symptoms clear up, there are residual signs of schizophrenia that can linger for years. These include markedly peculiar behavior, like talking to oneself in public; social withdrawal and an inability to function as well as previously, and odd ways of speaking and thinking. Experts now say that long-term care is often needed for long-lasting and subtle deficiencies, such as apathy and lack of normal feelings.

There are, by Federal estimates, more than two million Americans who could now be diagnosed as schizophrenic, and over 600,000 of these are in active treatment in a given year. Another half million to a million schizophrenics are being cared for in a range of settings, with their families, in boarding houses or nursing homes, or on their own, many living in the streets.

There are several types of schizophrenia, depending on which symptoms predominate. A "disorganized" diagnosis is made when the person is often incoherent but has no systematic delusions. "Paranoid" is the diagnosis when the person has delusions of persecution or grandiosity. When there are no prominent psychotic symptoms but the person's behavior is deficient in many regards—withdrawn and eccentric, for example—the diagnosis is a "residual" type of schizophrenia.

Schizophrenia typically begins in late adolescence or early adulthood; it generally first emerges before the age of 45.

There are two general patterns of symptoms, one thought to have a good prognosis, the other poor. One pattern, sometimes called "reactive" schizophrenia, begins in early adulthood with a sudden, extreme psychosis that typically clears up within six months, leaving no further problems. In "process" schizophrenia there are signs of trouble early in life, with the first full psychotic symptoms emerging in adolescence and often continuing in episodes throughout life.

But there is no single, set course schizophrenia follows. It has been thought that about one-third of schizophrenics suffer a single acute episode and never have a further problem. Another third have longer lasting symptoms, which finally clear up entirely, or enough to allow a normal life. And the final third have symptoms all their lives, at times increasing in severity, although schizophrenia seems, generally, to lessen gradually over the years.

The common belief that schizophrenia involves a "split personality" is a misconception. Multiple personality is a psychiatric disorder that is clinically distinct from schizophrenia.

SCHIZOPHRENIA'S VICTIMS INCLUDE STRAINED FAMILIES

(By Eric Eckholm)

The greatest numbers of schizophrenics do not now live in hospitals or in the streets or jails, but rather with their families, representing a profound change in the way the nation cares for its most severely mentally ill.

The families, many health officials have only recently concluded, are forgotten victims of this baffling disorder that disables one of every hundred Americans at some point in their lives.

Parents and siblings of schizophrenics say they are racked by demands that would overtax a Mother Theresa. They describe themselves as bitter, despairing and wrung out.

FAMILIES BECOME THE DOCTORS

Between the excruciating turbulence at home and the limited services they receive from public agencies, families become "lost in a process that is hideously engulfing," as one woman with a schizophrenic niece described it.

"The families have become the doctors, the nurses and the social workers," said Dr. John Talbott, former president of the American Psychiatric Association. Close to a million families are struggling with these burdens of schizophrenia, whose victims can suffer a serious loss of contact with reality leading to delusions, incoherent thoughts, bizarre behavior or a profound withdrawal and apathy.

A generation ago, a person diagnosed as a chronic schizophrenic was apt to live and die in a state hosptial. Since the 1950's, however, with the discovery of antipsychotic drugs and changes in social attitudes, far fewer have been permanently kept in institutions. Instead, they tend to stay in the hospital only temporarily, during acute breakdowns, and then return home with little or no medical follow-up.

The dazed man huddled on the sidewalk, the babbling woman with an overstuffed shopping bag have come to symbolize the "deinstitutionalized" schizophrenic.

Yet in fact, some 65 percent of patients discharged from mental hospitals return to their families, usually their parents, according to the National Institute of Mental Health. An estimated 800,000 schizophrenics now live with their families and many more live nearby, depending on relatives for crucial support. But society has, for the most part, left these caretakers to fend for themselves.

An index of their suffering, borne silently until recently, is the explosive emergence around the country of activism on the part of families of the mentally disturbed: The National Alliance for the Mentally Ill is one of the nation's fastest-growing pressure groups.

The goals of this "family movement" are emotional support, public education and advocacy of neglected programs and research on severe mental diseases, schizophrenia foremost among them. It was formed in 1979 at a meeting attended by delegates from 80 local family groups. Now, just seven years later, it includes 550 groups from every state, with members drawn from 30,000 households. Throughout the second half of 1985 local groups were joining the alliance at a rate of 4 per week.

It is not only the families who will pay, activisits warn, if society does not help mental patients live more independently. Schizophrenia tends to strike people in their late teens or 20's, but now, as the first generation of nonhospitalized patients ages, more and more elderly parents find themselves caring for middle-aged schizophrenic children.

"I predict we'll see a new wave of people living in the streets as their parents pass away," said James W. Howe, the president of the burgeoning national alliance, with headquarters in Arlington, Va. "I'm not arguing they should be back in hospitals. There's an urgent-need for residences, job programs and other community services."

Mental illness can devastate a household financially as well as emotionally. Many patients are diagnosed as schizophrenic in their teens and then live 60 years, in and out of hospital and home, without ever working.

"It has ruined families economically," Dr. Talbott said. "People come to me saying, 'I've got $40,000 left and a 40-year-old schizophrenic child. What should I do?'

"I don't know what to tell them," he admitted.

Stung by the stigma of mental illness, the families of schizophrenics often turn inward, spending years in anguished isolation.

"A stigma is society's way of telling people they somehow have failed," said Phyllis Vine, a historian at Sarah Lawrence College whose experiences with a schizophrenic niece led her to write a book called "Families in Pain."

The truth is concealed from neighbors, even relatives. Outside friendships tend to wither as the family struggles against the strange specter in the home.

BURDENED FAMILIES 'FIND EACH OTHER'

Mr. Howe and his wife, Carol, of Garett Park, Md., say their experience was typical. For seven years after one son, then another, became mentally ill, they "wandered alone," as Mr. Howe described it. "We paid people $75 an hour to tell us it was our fault. We believed them and that kept us in the closet.

"We felt guilty, frustrated and angry," he continued. Then in 1978, five families with similar problems "found each other," he said. "That gave us exquisite relief—we learned we weren't alone, and that we could restore some sort of order to our lives."

Activists say that families have become more willing to declare themselves publicly as they learn about the changing scientific understanding of schizophrenia, about the decline in theories that blamed domineering mothers or family strains for what is now seen as a disease with biological origins.

"The old philosophy was that parents, especially mothers, caused their kids to become schizophrenic," said Dr. Talbott. "Now we see that when a kid is this crazy, he'll make the family begin to seem crazy." A growing number of doctors work with families, not so much to treat the "cause" of the child's disease as to help reduce conflict and discourage any family interactions that encourage the schizophrenic symptoms.

Life with a schizophrenic is "endlessly frustrating, a roller coaster," said Dr. Vine. "You can never presume tomorrow will be like today. You constantly steel yourself for the unknown, and you never know when the unknown will hit."

Parents tell of helplessly watching a child become tormented by delusions, become unable to respond normally or cope with daily challenges. But even a parent's love and patience, many admit, can be sorely tested by behavior that seems hostile or uncooperative.

To the frustration of those around them, more than half of all schizophrenics fail to take their prescribed antipsychotic drugs, which for many help normalize thoughts and stave off relapses. Some housemates may suspect the patient is taking advantage of his condition, asserting independence when convenient yet demanding care when needed.

"A parent has to watch a 30-year-old son say he's going out to drink with friends tonight, knowing he might come home psychotic," said Dr. Bert Pepper, the director of the Rockland County Mental Health Center in New York who is an expert on young, chronic mental cases. Quite often, mental disease is exacerbated by the patient's overuse of alcohol or illegal drugs.

LAWS ON COMMITMENT CAN BE A HINDRANCE

While acknowledging that former laws governing forcible hospital commitment were open to abuse, many family activists believe that necessary hospitalizations are now impeded. Even patient who request admission may be turned away by state hospitals if their mental state is deemed insufficiently serious.

When relatives know a patient is having a psychotic relapse but he refuses to acknowledge it, they may reluctantly seek to force him into a hospital. But today's state laws, which forbid involuntary commitment unless a judge is convinced that the patient poses a clear danger to himself or others, are too rigid, many parents assert. Parents describe the wrenching humiliation of appearing in an open courtroom to argue that their child needs temporary hospitalization, sometimes with a public lawyer arguing against them in the child's behalf.

While no statistics on divorce rates have been gathered, psychiatrists say that the stresses of coping with schizophrenic children have taken a heavy toll on marriages. Brothers and sisters, too, tend to suffer, often feeling neglected, angry and guilty. Like their parents, they often lose friends, whom they are embarrassed to bring home.

Often the mothers carry the heaviest loads. In a familiar syndrome, the mother accepts the child's condition as an illness while the father persists in seeing it as misbehavior requiring discipline. "It's not at all uncommon for the father to segregate himself from the problem," Mr. Howe said. "We see a lot of women attending support-group meetings whose husbands refuse to come, or have left them."

Some mothers or other relatives, afraid to leave an unstable patient alone, say they feel like jailers. Unable or unwilling to hire an outside caretaker, they become prisoners themselves.

While Social Security and other government programs help with subsistence and medical expenses, neither these nor private insurance tends to pay all the enormous costs of hospitalization and psychiatric care. Adding to the costs, sometimes a relative must stop working in order to care for the patient, chauffeur him to his appointments and keep watch at home.

At a recent conference, a father summarized his medical expenses over the nine years since his son was diagnosed as schizophrenic, during which the son had been hospitalized 10 times for a total of a 68 months. The medical bills totalled $721,500, of which insurance companies paid $541,000 and the family paid $180,000.

STRAINS ARE HARDEST FOR THE POOR

Once family members join a support group, a transition from "just sharing tales of woe," as one put it, to political advocacy is common.

"At first, I would stay home and cry, and hope he would get better next year," said Kathleen Giaimo of Queens, the mother of a schizophrenic son. "In 1979 I heard about another mother. I called her and we talked on the phone for four hours."

Then, Mrs. Giaimo said, she realized that her son's problem would not disappear and that the family alone could do little. "I got involved with a group to try to make the system change," she said, "because the system stinks."

Mrs. Giaimo became active in Friends and Advocates of the Mentally Ill, in which 500 New York City families now participate. Thirty such groups have sprung up in the state and the movement is "growing like crazy" as more families discover it, said Mrs. Giaimo, who is serving as president of the local association this year.

The strains on the family are all the worse among the poor, who for unclear reasons seem to suffer the highest incidence of schizophrenia.

"A schizophrenic creates even more wear and tear in poor families than in the middle class," said Dr. Neal Cohen of Gouverneur Hospital on Manhattan's Lower East Side. "The family structure is often more vulnerable and can more quickly break apart."

Dr. Cohen said that many young schizophrenics in the inner city start out living with their families, then drift away, often getting into trouble with the police. Sometimes parents give up in despair and break all ties. "We think of these youths as the pre-homeless population," he said.

"The urban poor are facing tremendous burdens anyway, survival issues like housing and income and safety," observed Dr. Donald Brown, the director of the Morrisania Neighborhood Family Care Center in an impoverished area of the Bronx. "We can't count on things we take for granted elsewhere, such as a parent's ability to cooperate with their child's treatment or even visit a clinic. A family member might be unable to come out for strong reasons; work, no baby sitter, fear of leaving the apartment at night."

The volatile mixture of mental illness and drug abuse may also be more common in the inner city, where drugs are readily available. "We're seeing more and more patients confused by marijuana and angel dust," Dr. Brown said of his clinic in the South Bronx. "It's getting hard to find a pure schizophrenic anymore."

SOME PSYCHIATRISTS STILL BLAME FAMILIES

On top of all the other burdens, families often also suffer at the hands of psychiatrists. Many doctors, they charge, have not kept pace with scientific research and still tend to blame the family somehow for causing the disease.

Some psychiatrists acknowledge the problem. "In the past, the families were looked at as noxious agents instead of people with a sick child," Dr. Pepper said. "Many of the parents have been scarred and humiliated by the mental health professionals, especially if their child became ill 15 or 20 years ago."

Local family groups share information about which doctors their members have found to be helpful and sympathetic and which ones they have not. Many groups are also campaigning against what they say are widespread misconceptions about mental illness. Especially pernicious is the image of schizophrenics as prone to violence, a myth sustained, family advocates contend, by frequent portrayals of wild "crazies" on television.

At the national level, advocates are pushing hard for an increase in research on the causes and treatment of mental disorders, now budgeted at about $200 million a year and declining. Of this, about $21 million is specifically allocated for research on schizophrenia.

"Given the costs to society of mental illness, it's unbelievable how little investment in research there is," said Richard T. Greer, the director of government relations for the national alliance. "And this at a time when the biomedical opportunities are so exciting."

Looking to the future, groups in several states are pioneering in the creation of trust funds and corporations that can take over from the parents when they die, providing private case-workers who can keep tabs on the patients and help them procure housing, medical care and other needs.

Meanwhile, a primary goal is to create more programs that can help patients live on their own or in residences where they receive counseling and companionship. For many reasons, a rising number of experts contend, care at home is often not preferable even when the family is willing and able to provide it. For one thing, the parent's home is a poor environment for developing independence, vital if the patient is to regain anything close to a normal life.

Also, the stress for family members is often simply overwhelming, with the result that several lives are ruined by one person's illness. Medical professionals complain of "burnout" from working with patients just 40 hours a week, activists observe. But a family keeping a schizophrenic at home is, in effect, on duty 168 hours a week, with no vacation.

And finally, the parents are deeply aware of their own aging. Many wonder, fearfully, how their ill child will get by 20, 30 and 40 years from now.

"This is what haunts the parents," Mr. Howe said. "What will happen when I'm no longer around? This may be the biggest driving force behind the activism for community services."

SCHIZOPHRENIA FOCUS SHIFTS TO DRAMATIC CHANGES IN BRAIN

(By Harold M. Schmeck Jr.)

The architecture and chemistry of the brains of schizophrenics can be actually different from those of normal people, new studies show. As a result, a revolution in psychiatry has occurred in which biology has become the main focus of the research on this most devastating and intractable disease of the mind.

Among the most dramatic differences revealed in the new research are computer generated images of the brain that light up in vital regions when a normal person tackles a mental problem. These regions stay ominously dim when the disordered mind of the schizophrenic takes the same test.

Physical brain abnormalities have long been suspected among schizophrenics but have only recently been pinned down by researchers using new tools for exploring the brain.

The brains of some schizophrenics have even been found to weigh less than normal and sometimes look as though the crucial fore part of the cerebral cortex, the "thinking" part of the brain, has atrophied. Abnormalities have been detected in the brain's chemistry as well as structure.

Just how these aberrations account for the hallucinations, the voices and the schizophrenic's chaotic attitude toward the world, however, are still a mystery. Penetrating that mystery, scientists hope, will lead to more effective diagnosis and treatment of the baffling disorder.

What looks like atrophy of the cortex and other physical abnormalities have been confirmed by more than 30 studies, said Dr. Richard J. Wyatt of the National Institute of Mental Health and St. Elizabeths Hospital in Washington. He estimated that these abnormalities may be present in 5 to 15 percent of schizophrenics.

"Whether it is atrophy or failure of the brain to develop fully is not clear," Dr. Wyatt said. It does seem clear that the abnormalities exist long before the patient begins to hear voices or to drift away from normal emotional involvement with family, friends or the world.

The new evidence indicates that the disease is far more than a consequence of adverse familial, social and other environmental experiences as many American psychiatrists long believed.

Some scientists still maintain that these biological changes may be results rather than a cause of the disease.

But many biological psychiatrists today speak bitterly of the pain the earlier view inflicted on the families of schizophrenics: adding guilt to the agony of watching a spouse or child turn into an irrational, angry or apathetic stranger.

Nevertheless, few experts doubt that there are powerful social and environmental influences. The role of the family is seen as particularly important after a patient is released from a mental institution.

Many experts believe the chief task of brain scientists, in schizophrenia today is to discover just how environment interacts with heredity and the physical and chemical state of the patient's brain to evoke catastrophe.

Heredity appears to be a factor in the disease. Children who were adopted and reared apart from a schizophrenic mother or father are significantly more likely to become schizophrenic themselves than are the natural children of normal parents.

The new tools of molecular biology are being enlisted more and more in efforts to find the genes and gene products that express this heredity. But what those factors are and how they lead some individuals into the wasteland of mental illness is still a mystery.

Schizophrenia involves two different sorts of symptoms that seem to be linked to different features of the biology of the brain.

The hallucinations, the rages, the patient's belief that his mind is being controlled by an external force like radio waves or a television set are what scientists call the "positive" symptoms of the disorder. Laughter or tears may occur in totally inappropriate situations, and some rare cases involve violence or even the compulsion to kill on orders from an imagined higher power. It is these symptoms that are often ameliorated by the antipsychotic drugs and are thought to be most directly related to aberrent brain chemistry.

The negative symptoms are the indifference, the withdrawal from the world. It is these symptoms that often create the street people who quietly drag all their possessions along with them in bags and sleep on grates. Even with drug treatment, patients who show this array of negative symptoms are often on a grim downhill course from which they never recover.

WATCHING THE BRAIN AT WORK

Some of the most dramatic new observations of the schizophrenic brain in action have been made by a group at St. Elizabeths headed by Dr. Daniel R. Weinberger. They have watched the living brains of normal people and schizophrenics in the process of coping with mental tasks.

Using sophisticated electronic imaging equipment they have seen appropriate parts of the brain light up in a computer-generated image as increased chemical activity indicates heightened work by brain cells.

Schizophrenics and others were tested while they were performing a psychological test that measured their ability to correlate different kinds of data including colors, shapes and numbers. This exercise, the Wisconsin Card Sort test, is not particularly taxing for a normal adult, but has long been known to be extremely difficult for schizophrenics.

In a normal person, the image of a portion of the brain called the prefrontal cortex can been seen to light up as it reacts to this analytic task. In sharp contrast, the brains of schizophrenics remained quiescent as though they were unable to meet the physiological demands.

The experiment shows a physiological defect not just in schizophrenic brain, but in that brain's prothought processes.

Some brain scientists view this link to the prefrontal cortex as particularly interesting for several reasons. This brain area is important in cognition—the processes of thought and higher mental function that are so terribly disrupted in schizophrenia. Furthermore it is the last region of the brain to attain complete development and does this only in adolescence and early adulthood.

VIRUS SUSPECTED BY SOME

Perhaps significantly, the Wisconsin Card Sort is difficult for children, in whom the brain region is not yet mature. Schizophrenia rarely develops before the age of 15, which suggests that something may have interfered with development of the prefrontal cortex.

The nature and timing of the "something" are complete mysteries. Some scientists have suggested that a virus infection in a pregnant woman may set the stage for this outcome years later in her child, or perhaps a self distructive immune reaction or some toxin produces damage before birth or in early childhood.

One tantalizing clue that may be relevant to virus involvement is that significantly more people who become schizophrenics are born in late winter and early spring than in any other season. These evidently fateful months are known for the prevalence of many virus infections. But to date, solid evidence of damage by any specific virus or possible autoimmune problems in schizophrenia is lacking.

"My own sense is that there is some legitimate excitement in the viral and autoimmune areas," said Dr. Frederick K. Goodwin, the direcor of intramural research at the mental health institute. "But scientists of both those fields have to be respectful of the false starts made in the past."

Dr. Weinberger's group studied brain cell activity through a method that allowed them to gauge blood flow and cell metabolism in specific regions of the cerebral cortex, using inhaled xenon gas as an indicator. The method is only one of several developed recently that psychiatrists and brain scientists are using to study the disease-impaired living brain.

Many studies based on computed axial tomography, CAT scans, have shown structural abnormalities in the brains of some schizophrenics. Most notable were abnormally large ventricles, the hollow fluid-filled spaces within the brain.

That and related evidence indicates that some schizophrenics have somewhat less brain tissue than normal people do. Careful studies indicate that the findings are intrinsic to the disease, not just effects of treatment or hospitalization. The evidence also suggests strongly that whatever causes the enlarged ventricles does so before the first symptoms of schizophrenia appear and does not change, for better or worse, thereafter. Usually, by the time the patient first comes to the attention of a psychiatrist, the brain damage has already been done.

Some scientists hypothesize that these structural abnormalities are linked to the withdrawal and apathy classified as negative symptoms of schizophrenia.

The CAT scan evidence has led to a renaissance in studies of the schizophrenic brain, Dr. Weinberger said. Even more important results are expected from newer and more sophisticated brain imaging methods.

As a group, patients whose brains showed these physicial abonormalities had poorer social adjustment before diagnosis. Later, they showed poorer response to drugs and to generally bleak outlook. But the findings were not sharp enough to be used in diagnosis of individual patients.

Such antipsychotic drugs as chlorpromazine have had profound impact on the treatment of schizophrenia and also on efforts to fathom the biochemistry of the disease. The drugs, a class called phenothiazines, interfer with the brain's production and use of an important brain chemical, dopamine. American scientists have used their understanding of those drugs to glean important clues concerning the involvement of aberrant brain chemistry in schizophrenia.

The evidence available today links the positive symptoms of schizophrenia with chemical rather than physical abnormalities, especally the brain's handling of dopamine, one of the chemicals that transmits signals in the brain.

That the phenothiazines interfere with the dopamine system suggested that perhaps excess dopamine was a factor in schizophrenia. The suspicion was strengthened by observing victims of Parkinson's disease, who lack sufficient dopamine activity. Parkinson's patients who take a dopamine promoter, L Dopa, to curb their shaking, halting movements and other physical symptoms also sometimes develop psychotic symptoms. Conversely, schizophrenics who are treated with drugs known to inhibit the dopamine system sometimes develop the stumbling gait and facial rigidity characteristic of Parkinsonism.

Other drugs, like amphetamine, that boost the normal brain's production of dopamine can produce symptoms like those of schizophrenia.

The resulting body of knowledge has produced the hypothesis that a key factor in schizophrenia is abnormal dopamine activity.

But the search for simple chemical solutions to the puzzle of schizophrenia has been frustratingly unsuccessful. Indeed, Dr. David Shore of the mental health institute likes to cite H. L. Mencken's idea that for any complex question there is almost always a simple answer—that is almost always wrong.

Scientists note that the true situation in schizophrenia may involve abnormality in the population of dopamine receptors on nerve cells in parts of the brain, possibly a shortage of a still-undiscovered dopamine inhibitor or some other possibility that has not yet occurred to anyone. The available evidence does not support any simple cause-and-effect link between the mental illness and excess dopamine. In fact studies show reduced dopamine in some brain tissues, leading some scientists to suspect there may be simultaneous excesses and deficiencies in different parts of the brain of the same patient.

While some form of the dopamine hypothesis may help explain the positive symptoms, specialists say, they do not yet seem to offer much enlightenment on the negative symptoms.

Furthermore, this baffling disorder is so far from uniform in its effects that many specialists prefer to call it a group of disorders rather than a single entity. One of the hopes of the new and highly sophisticated brain research, they say, is that the studies may help tease apart from the whole tangled skein some of the more homogeneous subgroups of the disease. This too could lead to important enlightenment and perhaps more effective medical intervention.

AUTOPSIES SUPPORT VIEW

Major recent autopsy studies have bolstered the view that enlarged brain ventricles are involved in schizophrenia, that parts of the cortex of the forward part of the brain appear thinner and short of the normal number of active nerve cells.

The evidence of malfunction of the prefrontal cortex seems powerful and offers researchers an important focus for future research.

Physical abnormalities in the brains of schizophrenics were long denied by many American psychiatrists. Today the evidence is on a much more solid footing.

"We have made some good progress," said Dr. Samuel Keith, chief of the mental health institute's center for study of schizophrenia. "It hasn't been easy progress because the brain is a complex and inaccessible organ.

He described the new brain imaging techniques as exciting new windows on that inaccessible organ, offering important hope for the future of schizophrenia research.

"I think we are at a critical juncture today in terms of schizophrenia research," he said.

I FEEL LIKE I AM TRAPPED INSIDE MY HEAD, BANGING DESPERATELY AGAINST ITS WALLS

(The following first-person account of the ordeal of schizophrenia was written by a woman who recently completed college despite repeated hospitalizations. Her identity is withheld to protect her privacy.)

Can I ever forget that I am schizophrenic? I am isolated and I am alone. I am never real. I play-act my life, touching and feeling only shadows. My heart and soul are touched, but the feelings remain locked away, festering inside me because they cannot find expression.

Can I ever forget that I am schizophrenic? Will I ever learn to live, to love unselfishly, to appropriate the beauties of life, to deny my hell and pain and darkness? Why is life like this? What have I done wrong? Have I created my own hell? If I did not create it, why was it inflicted upon me? What does it mean, all these weird feelings that shut me off from the rest of the world? Will they ever end?

Can I ever forget that I am schizophrenic? I am a ghost within myself, a spirit no one knows. Long ago when they locked us up forever, perhaps they were not so wrong. What good is physical freedom if the human feelings are trapped, unable to escape? I am in my own prison. I feel like I'm just stumbling around, grasping at straws hoping one will be the key to open my heart. It never comes, and I wonder if I'll ever give up.

It is hard to be schizophrenic. It means years of struggling and fighting to overcome a disease that defies submission. Many times I have felt that I was fighting my way up a dirt hill, and as I walked the ground crumbled beneath me, and I could make no movement. After nine years I can look back through a maze of pain and fear and see that I have moved and made progress: Many of the symptoms that crippled me for years have come under some control. The totally frustrating part of this illness is that it is always growing, always changing. There are always new symptoms, new fears to conquer. Sometimes I get tired, and it is the weariness more than the pain that brings tears to my eyes.

The most wearing aspects of schizophrenia is the fierce battle that goes on inside my head in which conflicts become irresolvable. I am so ambivalent that my mind can divide on a subject, and those two parts subdivide over and over until my mind feels like it is in pieces, and I am totally disorganized. At other times, I feel like I am trapped inside my head, banging against its walls, trying desperately to escape while my lips can utter only nonsense.

Some of the symptoms I experience now are different than when the illness first began but they are just as painful and just as powerful. At times my thinking about things around me becomes confused as is revealed by this entry in my journal:

I live in the shade and I try to capture its edge so I can contain it but it keeps growing. Then it's gone, but the sun is too hot, so hot it too becomes engulfed in shadows—sun shadows—the sots that bore through my head and make me spacey. There is no escape. The whole world is poison. I must hide.

Recently, my mind has played tricks on me, creating The People inside my head who sometimes come out to haunt me and torment me. They surround me in rooms, hide behind trees and under the snow outside. They taunt me and scream at me and devise plans to break my spirit. The voices come and go, but The People are always there, always real.

Life for most schizophrenics is a nightmare full of fears and doubts about oneself and about reality; they have a distorted view of that most profound question of how they relate to the world around them. Boundaries become unclear and other people are frightening and not to be trusted. Thus, the very thing which could bring relief—closeness to other people—is shunned as something horrible and dangerous. For this reason it is absolutely essential to have someone to depend on, to draw the schizophrenic out of his jungle of terrors and eventually more into the less frightening world of reality.

One of the hardest issues for me to deal with has been trust. My mind has created so many reasons to fear the real world and the people in it that trusting a new person or moving to a new level of trust with a familiar person presents a terrifying conflict that must be hammered out over and over until I can find a way to overcome my fears or in a few cases give up the battle, even if just for the time being. The intensity of this conflict makes it hard to build relationships. It's hard for the family to help. It's difficult for them to understand the nature of the disease.

Therapy with schizophrenics can go on for years before a level of trust is built up sufficiently for the patient to use his therapist as a bridge between the two worlds he is confronted with. For me, each new experience of trust adds a new dimension to my life and brings me that much closer to living in reality.

Living day to day is a challenge because it is just simply hard for schizophrenics to live in a world that is so troublesome to them. My fears are so intense that before I do most things I must pass through a "wall of terror" that stands between myself and my goal. Leaving the house, talking to someone, or taking a walk can create panic, simply because I do not feel like part of the world. It is a foreign place to me. Since my childhood I have felt like an outsider looking in.

Schizophrenia is not just an illness, it is a way of life, and it is a life constantly disrupted by symptoms. I have dealt with a totally delusional world in which I was God—The Creator and The Sufferer—and the trees held magical power while a great wall and glass dome cut me off from the rest of humanity. More recently, I have gone through excruciating periods of thought-interference and feeling that I did not exist, experiencing my body as a machine that I could see and feel but which I could not perceive as being in the world. The most frightening part for me is how quickly I can be taken as if by a force and projected into another "state" in which all my perceptions are altered and the world becomes a bizarre place. Sometimes there is confusion about which is the true reality—the objective world or the psychotic world:

Today I saw reality, felt it, lived in it for a while. It was exactly as though someone had thrown a switch and turned a black and white TV into color—like the Wizard of Oz. It was incredibly beautiful and extremely intense. I felt every color, heard every light, saw the world as everyone else sees it—as a vibrant, pulsating complex of what life is all about. I heard in my head very distinctly, "I am both The Creator and The Sufferer."

My mind is often tortured by the movement back and forth between two worlds, neither of which I clearly understand. The only real peace or sense of "feeling good" comes with the relief of these symptoms, even if just for a short time. In my experience, the best source of relief is other people who are sensitive enough to understand me and patient enough to help me through my times of unreality. I have done much work but I still seek reassurance that the real world is not as hostile as I had imagined and that I do indeed have a place in it. Perhaps acceptance in the real world can give me the strength to sever those painful ties to the world of my imagination that have for so long held me captive.

AID IN DAY-TO-DAY LIFE SEEN AS HOPE FOR SCHIZOPHRENICS

(By Daniel Goleman)

Innovative programs scattered around the country are now offering the first rays of hope in decades for millions of tormented victims of schizophrenia, which has become the nation's worst mental health problem.

"We've learned that if we have the will to provide decent care for schizophrenics, their condition could be sharply improved," said John Talbott, a former president of the American Psychiatric Association.

But other experts say the growing ability to cope with schizophrenia is not being matched by a broad, coordinated effort to apply it. That failure, they say, is enormously costly to the nation both in the money spent for excessive hospitalization and in the shattered, unrepaired lives that result.

Schizophrenia's victims can be completely disabled by unsettling delusions or an inability to think clearly; they may find themselves shouting back wildly at imaginary voices or sinking, emotionless, into deep apathy.

Most of the new approaches in treating the baffling disorder focus on practical help for patients and their families in managing everyday problems: diminishing the stress that sets off some of the most disruptive and painful behavior, as well as teaching skills needed to achieve friendships, jobs and success in negotiating a bureaucracy to obtain the government benefits that any sick or poor person is entitled to.

"The environment in which the person lives has become the key factor in treating schizophrenia," said Dr. Samuel J. Keith, who heads the schizophrenia branch of the National Institute of Mental Health.

The trend reflects the inability of scientists thus far to discover the root causes of the disorder as well as the failure of powerful drugs to ameliorate some of the most prevalent symptoms.

But the innovative approaches to the handling of schizophrenia are demonstrating dramatic improvements in patients' return to mental stability.

A recently completed 30-year study of hospitalized schizophrenics who had been given up as hopeless, but then were released in a program that closely manages and monitors their lives, has found that two-thirds of them are now living normal lives in the community, half of them without any signs of the disorder.

There are a range of treatments that, taken together, offer new hope:

Family management, the fastest growing of the new approaches, encourages the patient's family to keep stresses in the home minimal and teaches family members how to handle the day-to-day difficulties of living with a schizophrenic.

A full spectrum of community services—ranging from hiring neighbors to help look after schizophrenics to 24-hour crisis teams whose members will move in for days at a time with a schizophrenic in crisis—has proven capable of keeping all but a small minority of schizophrenics out of psychiatric hospitals while speeding their improvement. And when schizophrenics are helped to get the government funds due them, they need not live in shelters or on the streets.

Havens of several sorts offer new kinds of protected environments in which schizophrenics can rebuild their lives. In New York City, Fountain House finds sheltered jobs and apartments for schizophrenics leaving hospitals. In Boulder, Colo., a program sets up patients in households with two members of a treatment team.

PROMISE COMES AMID RESEARCH OPTIMISM

The promise of the new family and community programs is strengthened by recent research findings that portray a far more positive long-term prognosis for many schizophrenics than is commonly assumed, even by many of those who treat them.

Next month, for example, in an article in The Archives of General Psychiatry, a team of researchers at the University of Pittsburgh will publish results of a study showing that teaching the families of schizophrenics how to care for them can drastically improve the course of the illness.

It is not yet clear whether the new programs might not prove too expensive or unwieldy in some urban settings where social services, under the best of circumstances, are often mired in bureaucracy.

Some schizophrenics continue to be treated individually by psychotherapists, usually in combination with drugs, and with varying degrees of success. While there are some promising developments in psychotherapy, for the vast majority of schizophrenics the hope lies in the new approaches.

One of the factors behind it is a radical new understanding of schizophrenia itself: that the disorder goes far deeper than had been thought and that recovery does not end when the more obvious symptoms—the delusions and hallucinations—stop.

Effective treatment, it is now thought, requires an ongoing, dogged effort to help a person overcome the apathy and other problems created by the longlasting emotional and other deficits, and to rebuild crumbled social relationships.

One of the more inventive methods used, called "network therapy," constructs a support system for former hospital patients who otherwise would be isolated and alone.

"These are people who have been in and out of the hospital for the last 10 years and whose natural network of family and friends has gradually eroded," said Paul Wagner, a clinical social worker who directs the Mount Tom Institute in Holyoke, Mass., one of several agencies that provides such services.

"Network therapy begins with a series of meetings to which you invite absolutely everyone who knows the person and might help him," he said. "It might be a distant relative, some old friends, the grocer, maybe some neighbors. Everyone meets and you tell them the person's whole story. These stories are very tragic, very moving. By the end, just about everyone wants to help somehow.

"Each person does a small part," Mr. Wagner added. "One neighbor says he'll call more often, someone else volunteers to bring him to church. When you put it together, you have a treatment plan. Since we began network therapy in 1982, not a single person in the program has been readmitted to the hospital."

An important factor in this success, according to Mr. Wagner, is a crisis team available 24 hours a day. It not only makes house calls to help resolve crises, but also has access to families in the area who keep an extra bedroom available for the emergency team, where a person in crisis can stay and be treated for up to a month.

There is great interest among professionals in teaching families better ways to care for schizophrenic members, at least until they can live on their own. "There's hardly a place in the country where, in the last three years, they have not begun to use some form of family management," said Dr. Talbott. "It is an idea whose time has come."

Carol Anderson, a psychologist at the University of Pittsburgh who is one of the primary developers of the family management approach, said: "We emphasize that schizophrenia seems to be due to a biological vulnerability that is triggered by stress. Most families have some private theory about what caused it, often one that makes them feel guilty, like their child falling out of bed. They're relieved to learn that no one single life event causes schizophrenia."

GUIDES TO CREATING A HELPFUL ENVIRONMENT

The training, which Dr. Anderson describes in detail in "Schizophrenia in the Family" (Guilford Press), typically begins with a one-day session for families in which a member is being treated for schizophrenia. Families are told that because schizophrenics are easily overstimulated and distracted, they should avoid extremes of conflict and criticism on the one hand, or extreme enthusiasm on the other. They are also advised to create an attitude of "benign indifference" toward many of the symptoms of schizophrenia.

But families are also urged to set reasonable rules for the patient, so as "not to confuse the need for low stimulation with permissiveness." Even the most stable of families would be hard-pressed to deal with a member's insistence that the television screen be covered with aluminum foil to thwart eavesdropping.

Families are also urged to let patients withdraw for a time when they need to do so, for example, taking meals alone or staying in their rooms when company comes. At the same time it is crucial that burdened family members maintain friends and sources of pleasure outside the home.

Research done by Dr. Anderson shows a one-year relapse rate under 10 percent in patients treated using family management. For patients who receive only drug treatment the relapse rate was 50 percent. According to the researchers, similar patients who receive no treatment at all have a relapse rate of 60 to 80 percent in the first year after leaving the hospital.

"The main rationale for family management is to calm the emotional climate and offer the family support, not point fingers or try to change the family dynamics," said Christine McGill, a social worker. She is training the staffs of hospitals engaged in a major five-year, $5 million study of family management being conducted by the National Institute of Mental Health. The study, now in its first year, is under way at four hospitals, including the Payne-Whitney Clinic in New York City and the Long Island Jewish-Hillside Medical Center in Glen Oaks.

A major goal of that study is to determine the extent to which dosages of the drugs used to treat schizophrenics can be lowered as families become more adept at handling the patient. The drugs, called neuropleptics, can have serious side effects, such as loss of muscular coordination. The standard treatment is to maintain patients with chronic symptoms on the drugs for years, but many experts now believe that family management and similar support can allow symptoms of schizophrenia to be controlled with intermittent or much lower doses of the drugs, or even no drugs at all.

With the proliferation of family management, Dr. McGill cautions, often what is offered to families is simply a one-day training program. "They neglect the crucial part: the contact with families to help them through the large and small crises," she said. "You need to make a minimum two-year commitment to help a family after a member has had a schizophrenic episode."

PROGRAMS FOR THOSE OUTSIDE THE FAMILY

While the goal of family management is to help the person, finally, to become independent, not every family is willing or able to put up with the difficulties that having a schizophrenic at home entails. And, of course, many patients have no families to take them in. For such people other programs have evolved with principles and methods similar to family management.

One of the most innovative is a treatment arrangement that, in effect, creates a family for a schizophrenic while he is in treatment. This program, operated by Maitri Psychological Services of Boulder, Colo., creates a household in a rented apartment or house with a schizophrenic patient and two roommates, who are trained as part of an eight-member treatment team. Members of the team are with the patient as needed day and night.

Although each patient in the program is in psychotherapy three times a week, the emphasis is on the healing value of ordinary daily activities in the household.

"Our experience is that when highly disturbed people are in the intensive company of healthy people, they tend to become healthier," said Edward Podvoll, the psychiatist who directs Maitri.

One of the main deficit symptoms of schizophrenia is a wildly wandering attention. The Maitri treatment puts a special emphasis on the quality of attention that patient and companion bring to what they do.

"It is all done from the point of view of helping the patient engage in a mindful way in every activity, to help them recover their attention and concentration abilities."

Maitri and other private programs like it, however, are available only to a limited number of patients, and cost about as much as one of the better psychiatric hospitals. Maitri, for instance, ranges from $6,375 to $9,850 a month, and although some health insurance plans will pay for it, few patients or their families can afford such expense on their own.

For the several hundred thousand schizophrenics across the country who need continuing treatment, there is a longstanding Federal plan for a spectrum of community services. The plan, dating back to the 1970's, was to be a replacement for the "warehousing" of chronic patients in large state hospitals. But few states, it is now widely acknowledged, allotted sufficient funds for the community program.

One notable exception is a highly successful program that began as an experiment in Madison, Wis.

"We started by moving a large group of patients out of the state hospital into town, and moved the staff right along with them" into the community, said Leonard Stein, the psychiatrist who directed the project. "When we evaluated the needs of each patient we found that they had been coming back to the hospital because, for example, they got into trouble with a landlord and were evicted, or they didn't know how to get their social security benefits and got very upset."

Compared to patients who were treated in the hospital as a part of the usual follow-up treatment, the patients in this program had one-tenth the rate of relapse, had far fewer symptoms of schizophrenia, and were generally more satisfied with their lives. Moreover, the cost per patient in the community program was about $15,000 a year, while a full year in the hospital would cost $70,000.

Despite the success of the Wisconsin experiment, very few states have allocated the funds that would set up similar programs. One of the rare exceptions is a community-based program in western Massachusetts, created as the result of a legal action taken in behalf of patients at the state hospital in Northampton. In 1972 the hospital had 1,400 patients; now it has just over 200, a very small number for a region with 800,000 residents.

The network therapy at the Mount Tom Institute is part of the Massachusetts program. Among the other unusual services offered there is "respite care," where a family who is caring for a schizophrenic member can, when a particularly difficult crisis occurs, have the patient stay in a supervised house for a few days, or have a mental health worker come and stay with the family to help them out. In addition, specially trained families are available who will take in schizophrenic patients from other families for anywhere from a week to two months.

Such services are part of a concerted effort to keep patients living in the community, even when they are having psychotic episodes. "The state hospital is the last resort, not the first resort," said Steven J. Schwartz, the lawyer whose suit created the system.

The key to the Massachusetts program is case management, the assignment of around 30 patients to a service coordinator whose task it is to see that they get whatever help they need. This means, for example, that if someone is too confused or apathetic to find an apartment, the service coordinator will do it with him, and help him move in. And if an ex-patient needs looking after in his apartment, the service coordinator might hire neighbors to keep an eye on him.

There are public funds already allotted to which schizophrenics are entitled, but are often too confused or naive to get on their own. "To get the money, you're got to know exactly which funds you're entitled to, where to apply, how to answer the question," said Mr. Wagner. "One of the main jobs of the service coordinators is to go along with their clients to all these places and help them through each step."

The potential sources include insurance plans and veterans' benefits, Medicare and Medicaid, and Social Security for the mentally disabled. In addition, in Holyoke there are funds available to help pay for heating oil, a food bank that provides the poverty-stricken with groceries until they can get food stamps or other funds, and a program that pays the security deposit on an apartment—often one of the crushing financial obstacles for those who have been existing on the streets.

NEW YORK PROGRAM IS OFTEN COPIED

Finding a group of friends and a job is seen by many mental health experts as key steps for those who have suffered from schizophrenia for many years. The most copied program that focuses on these needs is Fountain House in New York City.

"We start with the assumption that schizophrenia is a condition that isolates people and destroys their confidence," said Jim Schmidt, the director. "We give them a place to go where they are welcomed, even celebrated. They are not here to be treated or trained; it's a clubhouse."

Dozens of businesses have entry-level jobs reserved for Fountain House. Members try these jobs part-time, at first accompanied by someone from the staff who will do the job if the member fails at it. If the member succeeds, in six months he moves on to another job, until he is finally able to get a full-time job on his own.

There are now nearly 200 programs nationwide based on the Fountain House approach to getting former patients employed again. But while many communities have one or another part of the services offered in western Massachusetts or by Fountain House, programs with the entire range are few and far between.

"People are only just becoming aware that community treatment can be successful, if done right," Dr. Stein said. "There is no real alternative to a community program; the old hospitals are enormously expensive. And this works."●

JAPANESE BARRIERS TO U.S. TOBACCO PRODUCTS

● Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, when the U.S. Commerce Department released its trade deficit figures for 1985 those figures clearly indicated that the U.S. trade deficit had continued its unchecked growth for yet another year. Of even greater concern is our trade imbalance with Japan which soared to a record level of almost $50 billion, nearly one third of this country's total trade deficit.

I was encouraged last year when the President announced that the administration would self-initiate a number of section 301 trade investigations into certain unfair Japanese trade practices. While success has been reported in negotiations concerning leather and pharmaceutical products, little progress has been made in eliminating Japanese barriers to imported cigarettes. U.S. Trade Representative Clayton Yeutter has written to me to say that recommendations in this case will be submitted to the President by this fall, though he hopes the issue can be resolved in the interim. I am concerned that the effort is losing momentum.

Mr. President, right now imported cigarettes have only a 2.3-percent share of a Japanese market worth $20 billion a year. We all heralded the supposed liberalization of the Japanese tobacco market on April 1, 1985, when the virtual monopoly of the Government-owned tobacco company, Japan Tobacco Inc., or JTI, ended. Foreign companies were no longer required to distribute cigarettes through JTI, also their biggest competitor. Nonetheless, substantial barriers remain that allowed imported tobacco products less than a one-third of 1 percent increase in market share over the past year. U.S. manufacturers' efforts to gain a greater share have been blocked by unfair tariff and taxation policies which place imports at a price level well in excess of the price of comparable domestic brands. United States cigarette companies are prohibited from manufacturing in Japan, an opportunity available to Japanese manufacturers in this country. Importers are forced to notify the Japanese Government, the majority shareholder of JTI, in advance of any price alterations. Importers also must employ the same distribution network that has traditionally serviced their main competitor, JTI, and is in fact a subsidiary of that organization. The president of Philip Morris Inc.'s Japan subsidiary has likened the system to Pepsi Cola being distributed by Coca Cola. Now Japanese cigarette manufacturers are engaged in a campaign of trademark piracy. I joined several of my colleagues in writing last month to Ambassador Yeutter and Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige protesting this latest unethical action by the Japanese.

Conservative estimates of the potential for cigarette exports to Japan are impressive. Each percentage point of market share in Japan is worth an estimated $48 million. Without restrictions, United States products could easily obtain a 10-percent share of the Japanese cigarette market; this translates into potential United States exports worth almost half a billion dollars.

We have delivered our warning messages to the Japanese and they are responding. Japanese officials often reason that United States products are inferior. If Japanese officials really believe that our products are inferior and would not be purchased by Japanese consumers, why not remove all barriers? In actuality, the U.S. cigarette industry produces a high quality, reasonably priced, popular product that is well marketed around the world. Once again, all we are asking for is the opportunity to compete on an equal footing. I support the administration's self-initiation of a section 301 investigation into Japanese practices surrounding tobacco trade, but was disappointed that the agenda of last weekend's meeting between the President and Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone did not allow for discussion of this issue. I encourage the President to address the situation directly with Prime Minister Nakasone at the earliest opportunity.●

KOREAN TRADE RESOLUTION

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, on March 19, I introduced Senate Resolution 369 which, if approved, would express the sense of the Senate that until substantial progress is made in the liberalization of its import restrictions, the Republic of Korea should be removed as a beneficiary country under the U.S. Generalized System of Preferences.

Today, I am pleased to add as cosponsors to this resolution Senators ABDNOR, FORD, GORE, HEINZ, HOLLINGS, SYMMS, THURMOND, TRIBLE, and WILSON.

Mr. President, Korea has been a close friend and ally of the United States for many years. Our friendship has been based on a mutual sense of trust and respect. I fear, however, that our differences of opinion in the forum of international trade have the potential of weakening our alliance. When U.S. farmers, businessmen, and manufacturers encounter a wall of unfair trade practices, who can blame them for becoming frustrated—who can blame them for losing their patience?

By concentrating on the Republic of Korea, therefore, Senate Resolution 369 focuses on an international friendship of particular importance. With this resolution we are saying that our exports to Korea are being treated unfairly and we are willing to take action to emphasize our concern. Further, it should be clear that Korea, while not our only ally with which we have disagreements in the area of trade, has erected trade barriers and maintained policies which are uniquely discriminatory.

But, Mr. President, this resolution should not signal any change in our resolve to be a constructive partner in Korea's growth and development. Our relationship with Korea, both in terms of foreign policy and trade, will require increased attention in the months and years ahead. The United States has always, when possible, been there when Korea has needed us. I am absolutely convinced that if we ignore our trade disagreements now, we invite larger and more complicated problems in the future.

Mr. President, the April 5 edition of the National Journal published an article by Bruce Stokes entitled "Korea: Relations Worsen." I believe that it is one of the most objective recent articles written on the issue of our trade deficit with Korea, and I ask that it appear in the RECORD.

The article follows:

KOREA: RELATIONS WORSEN

(By Bruce Stokes)

SEOUL, SOUTH KOREA.—U.S.-Korean trade relations have never been worse.

Tension is mounting in Washington, keeping pace with the growing U.S. trade deficit with South Korea. The Reagan Administration is increasingly frustrated with the pace and scope of Seoul's efforts to open its markets to American goods and services. Korean industries' plans to target the American market with an array of new products—automobiles, computer chips, consumer electronics—are bound to exacerbate frictions.

In Seoul, there is a sense that the United States has singled out Korea as a scapegoat for America's declining international competitiveness. There is concern that Korea will suffer from the backlash of anti-Japanese sentiment now prevalent in the United States. And there is a small, but vocal, streak of defiance in Korean society, a sentiment that Korea's economic performance is nothing to be ashamed of and that the country need no longer restrain itself to suit the Americans.

Trade differences are unlikely to rupture Korea's strong political and military ties with the United States. Both sides have a vested interest in regional stability. But Washington is seemingly oblivious to Korea's debt and employment problems and insensitive to the political turmoil that U.S. trade actions cause for Seoul. And Seoul has yet to divine how Washington works or to accept that being a major industrial power entails buying a variety of goods and services from the world marketplace as well as selling to it.

As a result, there is a fundamental disparity in how South Korea and the United States view their trading relationship. "We're talking past each other on trade issues," said an American expert on Korea based in Seoul.

The price of continuing this miscommunication may be an escalating trade conflict between the two nations.

TRADE PROBLEMS

Trade tensions are already running very high. To try to increase sales by U.S. firms to Korea, the Administration has launched a series of unfair trade cases against Korea and is pressuring the Korean government to accelerate its efforts to open the Korean market to foreign competition. And Members of Congress are attempting to curb the sale of duty-free Korean items in the U.S. market because of Korea's labor policies.

Moreover, the trade balance between South Korea and the United States has gone from a small U.S. surplus in the 1970s to a $5 billion U.S. deficit in 1985. While U.S. imports from Korea nearly doubled from $5.5 billion in 1981 to $10.7 billion in 1985, Korean imports of U.S. products grew only from $5 billion to $5.7 billion, not even keeping pace with inflation.

Koreans point out, however, that the United States has traditionally run a trade surplus with their country. Moreover,they argue that their surplus with the United States only helps to offset Korea's staggering deficit with Japan and that their surplus is neccessary to help pay their $46 billion foreign debt.

What the Koreans fail to acknowledge is that while their dependence on sales to the United States is growing, they are diversifying the sources of their imports. In 1975, 30 per cent of Korean exports went to the United States; in 1985, the U.S. bought 38 per cent. In 1975, Korea bought 26 per cent of its imports from the United States, but a decade later, it purchased only 22 per cent of such goods and services from the United States.

Such problems have led to charges that Korea is the next Japan—flooding the world market with its goods but refusing to buy from other people.

"We copy a lot that is Japanese," acknowledged Yung Chul Park, professor of economics at Korea University. "We emulate Japanese industrial techniques, their work ethics, managerial system and research and development investment strategy."

But there the similarity stops, say Korean officials. Korea is a relatively small country of 42 million people that is just emerging as a modern industrial nation. It has an annual per capita income of only $2,000 and a gross national product (GNP) of just $80 billion. It cannot produce for export to the U.S. market or afford to import from the United States nearly as much as Japan, with a $1.2 trillion GNP, 120 million consumers and a $10,000 per capita income.

In fact, Korean officials argue that many of their trade problems with the United States stem from their small domestic market, which forces their industries to produce for export to survive.

"Who the hell else are we going to sell our autos and TVs?" Park asked. "There are only two countries who can absorb our exports—Japan and the United States."

Nevertheless, the Koreans' ardent, at times desperate, desire to convince Americans that Korea is not another Japan raises suspicions that there may be a kernel of truth to the claim.

"We want to become the next Japan [in the sense that] it is the only Asian country to become an industrial nation in the 20th century," admitted a Korean government official.

And the industrial road map that the Koreans have chosen is the same as Japan's—building up some of the same industries, (by hiding behind some of the same protectionist barriers) and targeting the U.S. market in the same way. Little wonder that Korea is encountering some of the same trade frictions that Japan has.

INDUSTRIAL TROUBLE SPOTS

Even those who do not see parallels with Japan foresee a rough road ahead for Korea in its relationships with the United States. In a whole range of industries, trade problems between the two nations loom on the horizon, and no amount of disassociation from Japan can defuse the coming confrontations.

Korean textile and apparel manufacturers are particularly vulnerable to U.S. protectionism. Korea is the third-largest supplier of apparel to the United States and the fifth-largest textile supplier. Competition from low-wage countries such as China is forcing the Koreans to shift to higher-value products, but this puts them in direct conflict with that small portion of the American textile industry that has survived.

The Administration is pressing Korea to voluntarily cap its textile exports to the United States through 1988. If that fails, Congress may again push for quotas on textile imports. The Korean Economic Planning Board estimates that this could cost Korea 30,000 jobs.

Another area of tension involves consumer electronics products. U.S. imports of Korean electronics have more than doubled since 1981. Korea has long since surpassed Japan in the manufacture of 12-inch portable black and white televisions for the U.S market and last year supplanted Japan in the production of 13-inch color sets. Korea began marketing video cassette recorders in the United States only a year ago, but sold approximately $210 million worth in 1985 and expects sales to reach $380 million this year.

Korea may also be on the verge of flooding the U.S. market with low-priced automobiles. Hyundai Motor Co. hopes to sell 100,000 small cars in the United States in 1986, its first year of marketing in the United States. Daewoo Motor Co. will soon be producing a car under a joint venture with General Motors Corp. With the average Korean auto worker putting in a 50-hour work week, at $2.16 an hour, the Korean firms should easily undercut the prices of U.S. and Japanese automakers.

Moreover, Korean auto parts manufacturers are expanding rapidly. The Samsung Group, in a joint venture with Chrysler Corp., will begin producing auto parts this year, and many industry analysts think a joint auto-making effort involving the two giants is inevitable.

Until 1982, Korea sold no integrated circuits—arrays of computer chips—in the United States. By 1984, integrated circuits were by far the most valuable Korean export to the United States, totaling $732 million. Most of this production was by Korean firms assembling American-made chips, one reason the U.S. chip industry has yet to complain. Using loans from the World Bank and the purchase of foreign technology, Korean firms are now producing their own 64K chips, soon will produce 256K chips and are working on a 1 megabit chip. But the world market for 64K chips has collapsed, and Japanese and U.S. producers of 256K chips are unwilling to cede that new market to the Koreans without a fight.

FUTURE CHALLENGES

Whether Korean industries of the future will pose similar challenges to the American economy depends largely on the industrial strategy choices now being made in Korea.

The Korean economy is dominated by giant industrial conglomerates whose mammoth size has facilitated Korea's rapid growth in exports. "The problem with these large industries is that they do things in a big way," Park said. "So when they enter foreign markets, they have a large impact and draw an unfavorable reaction." And when they move into a new field—such as chemicals in the mid-1970s—they can make costly mistakes.

The Korean government is now trying to encourage the expansion of medium and small-scale enterprises because it thinks such firms will be more responsive to signals from the marketplace and will prove more attractive as joint venture partners for American high-technology firms that are leery of the conglomerates.

The Korean government also hopes that small companies will generate more jobs than the large firms will. Korea's unemployment rate rose slightly last year, to 4 per cent, but due to definitional differences, unemployment in U.S. terms may be almost twice as high. Because of Korea's 1960s baby boom, the economy must grow by 6-7 per cent a year just to generate enough jobs for new entrants to the work force. Lately it has failed to keep up this pace. Half of the spring 1985 college graduates did not find a job last year, fueling the ranks of those ready to take to the streets to protest government economic and political policies.

The Korean government "must be judicious in selecting those medium and high-tech areas [that require] a fair amount of labor—manufacturing components for automobiles, for example," said Henry Nau, a professor of economics at George Washington University. The emphasis has to be more on assembly operations than research and development.

Such a labor-intensive development strategy continues Korea on its collision course with American industry. As Korean producers move into manufacturing machine tools and other sophisticated uses of technology, they will face the same problems that textile manufacturers did. And concerns about generating jobs will strengthen Korea's reluctance to open its service sector—including labor-intensive banking and insurance operations—to more efficient foreign competition.

If such conflicts are to be minimized, Korea and the United States are going to have to radically change the way they relate to each other. "The non-understanding between the two is just phenomenal," said a U.S. trade official.

Koreans are relatively naive about how Washington works. Hyundia, for example, blithely announced plans to market cars in the United States during the U.S. debate on renewing the voluntary auto import restraint agreement with the Japanese. Only recently have the Koreans begun to improve their lobbying and diplomatic representation in Washington.

Many Koreans enter into trade negotiations with the United States with a chip on their shoulder. For centuries, Korea was a colony first of China and then of Japan. From the man in the street to industry captains, the national self-image demands standing up to foreigners. And Korea's Confucian heritage teaches that one does not compromise when one is right. As a result, the Koreans have a reputation for digging in their heels when trying to resolve differences.

For its part, say some observers, the United States has demonstrated a striking insensitivity to the consequences of its actions in dealing with Korea, even when the United States ends up paying a price. The recent U.S. unfair trade practices cases lodged against Korea cost Kim Kiwhan, Korea's chief trade negotiator, his job. His advocacy within Korean government circles of opening domestic markets was seen as appeasement that did not work.

The immediate consequenses of U.S. pressure can be heard in the anti-American slogans chanted in Korean street demonstrations. "The [Korean] government is really being sandwiched," said Bon ho Koo, a professor of economics at Hanyang University. "The United States says Korean government is going too slow [in opening its economy to foreign competition]. businessmen, students and newspapers think they are going too fast."

If Korea is to join the ranks of the advanced industrial countries by the end of the century, it must accept many of the responsibilities of an industrial power-including tempering its robust enconomy so it can live in harmony with its trading partners. This already has begun. More and more Korean companies are forming joint ventures with U.S. firms and investing more in the United States.

The United States, meanwhile, must not object if such joint ventures lead to more U.S. imports from Korea and must "frame [its] trade objectives with the [other] country's domestic situation in mind," said a U.S. trade official. "If we go in with something unrealistic, you make their life miserable and undermine your own credibility."

The ability of Korea and the United States to work better together will soon be tested. The Korean currency, the won, is tied to a basket of currencies, primarily the dollar. In recent months, while the Japanese yen has appreciated 30 per cent against the dollar, the won has appreciated only 7 per cent. As a result, Korean goods are going to become relatively more affordable in the U.S. market compared with Japanese goods, driving up the U.S. trade deficit with Korea. Only sensitivity and understanding on both sides will avoid further trade conflicts.●

RESEARCH ON METHANOL AND ETHANOL PRODUCTION

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, research on alternative fuels continues to require our serious attention. During this period of budget reductions and falling oil prices, funding for research on alternative energy sources has become a very attractive target. We must not forget what happened to oil prices in the past as we prepare to meet our future energy needs. It is critical that we continue to explore potential new sources of renewable energy.

Two areas about which I am particularly concerned are ethanol and methanol. Both ethanol and methanol can be produced from renewable sources of energy. Ethanol, commonly known as grain alcohol, is usually produced from agricultural crops such as corn, wheat, or sugarcane. Ethanol is not only an alternative source of fuel but also creates a use for farm commodities which we currently have in record surplus. The development of a vigorous ethanol industry would reduce crop surpluses and help to improve the depressed state of the farm economy. Nearly 40 percent of U.S. crop production would be required to produce 11 billion gallons of alcohol fuel, which represents approximately 10 percent of U.S. automotive needs. An added benefit would be lower costs for farm programs.

Methanol, commonly known as wood alcohol, is derived from coal, wood, or urban wastes. A potentially great benefit of increased methanol production would be the disposal of huge amounts of urban waste. An estimated 200 million tons of municipal solid waste were generated last year. The processing of 90 percent of this municipal waste into methanol would produce approximately 10 billion gallons of methanol. Methanol and ethanol could not totally replace oil or other fossil fuels, but their production could help to reduce our dependence on imported oil.

The current low oil prices will not last, and in many respects they may cause long-term problems for the economy. Low prices may force major cuts in domestic oil exploration and eventually increase U.S. dependence on foreign oil. We must continue active research and development of alternative sources of fuel, such as methanol and ethanol, as a hedge against the next surge in oil prices.

An executive of General Motors recently stated that methanol will be the fuel of the next century. The adaptation of automobiles to methanol fuel would take approximately 20 to 30 years. We could reduce this time by accelerating development of technology to produce methanol from urban wastes, coal, and sea water. The development of this technology will be essential to achieve the goal of U.S. energy independence.

Mr. President, I urge our colleagues to resist making devastating cuts in funding for research on alternative energy sources. Research and development in this area are critical to the long-term prosperity of the United States and world economies.●

UNITED STATES ACTED WISELY

● Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, the United States has acted wisely and decisively in launching a series of strikes against the terrorist nerve centers of Libya's Mu'ammar Qadhafi. No man, woman, or child is immune from Colonel Qadhafi's thirst for blood. President Reagan's actions reflect the feeling of an overwhelming number of Americans: Terrorists will have to pay a price for their deeds!

The victims of this mass murderer posed no threat to Libya, and left the United States with no choice. I am very proud of our President's response. I am also proud of our military men and women involved in this action.

I am especially proud that Nevada is a temporary home to so many pilots who train for these missions at the Nellis Air Force Base at Las Vegas and at the Naval Air Station at Fallon. We have very few detractors of our military in Nevada, but the vast majority of the people in our State support our installations and are pleased to be their neighbor. I would like to point out that many of our allies use our bases for pilot training as well.

Mr. President, the United States has taken a strong stand against terrorism. We should expect no less from our allies.

Mrs. Thatcher's support will not be forgotten by Americans. Libyan sponsored terrorism cannot and should not be condoned, much less tolerated by any responsible government.

We have tried quiet diplomacy, public condemnation, economic sanctions, and demonstrations of military force. Criminals like Qadhafi must face punishment. I am glad we had the opportunity to administer it.●

THE MILITARY OPERATION AGAINST LIBYA

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the American military operation against Libya last evening was, according to early administration reports, a success in that it achieved its objectives—specifically, to interfere with Libya's ability to undertake terrorist acts by taking out selected military and terrorist support targets, and, by so doing, to demonstrate that terrorism is undertaken only at a heavy cost. This operation, conducted with such professionalism by our fighting forces—under cover of darkness, with highly defined and selected targeting, gives all of us a sense of great pride and patriotism. As always, the men and women of our Armed Forces have performed the mission that is asked of them—this is one of the fundamental strengths which make the United States a great nation. It is regrettable that the problem confronting our airmen and airwomen was exacerbated by the refusal of a number of our European allies to permit overflight through their airspace—this lengthened the time necessary for the American strike aircraft to proceed from their base in England to their destinations in Libya.

Mr. President, I have been very disappointed in the inability of the administration to convince our European allies to join us in a series of closely coordinated actions to deter Qadhafi's regime from its policy of terrorism. Terrorism is a global scourge which confronts civilized society with very difficult problems in how to respond effectively. Without close coordination, terrorists are provided with opportunities and temptations which compound our efforts to combat it.

Therefore, it is clear to me that our allies should now be urged to review their policies toward Libya, and a renewed effort to fashion a common approach be made. There are a variety of actions, such as economic sanctions, that could and should again be explored. To be sure, those economic sanctions may pose short-run difficulties for the nations that impose them. As an example, Italy has substantial economic ties with Libya and would be making a sacrifice in joining an economic blockade of Libya. However, Italy is a nation which has suffered the results of Libyan-generated violence, and the long-term elimination of that violence would be well worth the short-term economic sacrifice which she would have to pay in joining with the United States in a common effort. I believe all western airlines should be prohibited by the western nations from operating into or out of Libya, for example.

It is worth repeating, Mr. President: Terrorism is a world problem which demands a world solution—the sooner that other nations recognize this fundamental reality, the sooner the appropriate common steps can be taken.

Mr. President, yesterday I was invited to the White House, along with Mr. DOLE and a number of other leaders from both Chambers of the Congress. We were asked to come to the White House at 4 p.m. and remained in discussions with the President for a while and then with his advisors until about 6 p.m. The President briefly indicated to the group that he had already ordered a bombing raid on targets in Libya, and after that, Mr. Weinberger proceeded to indicate what the specific targets were. We were informed that the aircraft, FB-111's based in England had been on their way already to their destinations for 2 hours and that they would reach the targets at about 7 p.m. Washington, DC time.

I asked the administration officials at the meeting if anyone in the Congress had been briefed prior to our meeting. The answer being no, it was my conclusion that the consultation requirements of section 3 of the War Powers Act, which states that "the President in every possible instance shall consult with Congress before introducing U.S. Armed Forces into hostilities" . . . had not been satisfied.

The purpose of consultation, required by the War Powers Act, is to seek the best possible advice so that the actions of this Nation on the weighty matter of conducting hostile action is given the benefit of thoughtful consideration by responsible public officials in both branches of the Congress.

I would also note, Mr. President, that it is still somewhat unclear what the long-term policy of the United States is in regard to acts of terrorism and how best to forestall them.

Mr. President, I asked, and several of my colleagues present at the White House meeting yesterday also asked, the basic question: is this just a tit-for-tat policy, and if, after our military action, Qadhafi or someone else, such as the Iranians or Syrians, engage in a terrorist act against Americans, what do we do then? The answer was that we will make that decision at that time. I believe we need a more thoughtful policy. We do have to contemplate the likelihood that terrorists will commit further acts.

We must try every way possible to encourage a well-developed and effective global anti-terrorism policy—a series of agreed-upon diplomatic, economic, and possible military steps in response to or even in anticipation of actions by terrorist groups and states.

In recent days, Mr. President, I have written to the President, as well as to the Japanese Prime Minister, Mr. Nakasone, and to the Soviet leader, General Secretary Gorbachev, to include the question of coordinated actions against terrorism on the agenda of both the upcoming economic summit of western leaders in May in Tokyo and the next Reagan-Gorbachev summit. In addition, I have met with the German Foreign Minister, Mr. Genscher, this afternoon, along with a group of my colleagues, to discuss this matter in more depth.

Mr. President, I am hopeful that the military action taken by the United States last night will have the desired effects—to damage Libya's military and terrorist support sites, and to inhibit Qadhafi from further terrorist acts. I hope it will encourage our allies to take a second look and evaluate jointly with us as to where we go next. I believe that we should work quitely but effectively with our allies to come up with a joint policy. We should be rethinking the range of economic sanctions that can be put into place.

I reiterate my congratulations to, and pride in, the fine young fighting men and women who executed this operation so boldly and so well.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have several letters printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, DC.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I was pleased to note that some progress is now being made in the scheduling of your second summit meeting with Mr. Gorbachev. I also was gratified to note that Mr. Gorbachev has apparently dropped any insistence on preconditions to the scheduling of that meeting. I believe that the benefits for both our nations which will result over the long run from a full and regular dialogue will be well worth your efforts.

We all share the goal that the next summit meeting will produce tangible benefits in the way of major progress on several arms control matters, including, at the least, intermediate-range nuclear missiles, nuclear testing, and the Nunn-Warner proposal for Nuclear Risk Reduction Centers.

I would like to suggest that you give serious consideration to including, on the summit agenda, an initiative for a joint U.S.-Soviet program to work together to reduce the scope of terrorist activities in our world. The recent incident in West Berlin, and the numerous other terrorist actions and threats indicate that better planning should be done and more decisive actions should be taken on a cooperative basis with other nations. I know that you have attempted to develop closer working relations in this area with our European allies, and it occurs to me that it might be possible to broaden your efforts to include the Soviets in some ways. Such an initiative might be constructed along the lines of the Nuclear Risk Reduction Center proposal and other existing understandings between the United States and the Soviet Union regarding nuclear incidents, but broadened to include non-nuclear terrorism as well.

I appreciate your consideration of this idea.

With highest personal regards,
Sincerely,

ROBERT C. BYRD.

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, DC.

His Excellency MIKHAIL GORBACHEV,
General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Moscow, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

DEAR MR. GENERAL SECRETARY: I and my colleagues in the Senate were pleased to note that some progress is now being made in the scheduling of your second series of meetings with President Reagan. I believe that the benefits for both our nations which will result over the long run from a full and regular dialogue will be well worth this effort.

I have also noted that you are not attaching any preconditions to the scheduling of the next summit meeting and I believe that is an important step forward. Naturally, however, we all share the goal that the next meeting will produce tangible benefits in the way of major progress on several arms control matters, including, at the least, nuclear testing, intermediate-range nuclear missiles, and the proposal for Nuclear Risk Reduction Centers.

I have today hosted a luncheon for your very able ambassador to the United States, Mr. Anatoly Dobrynin, and have asked him to deliver this letter to you upon this return to Moscow. The other seven Senators who accompanied me on my visit to meet with you last September also attended this luncheon, and wish to renew their warm regards and best wishes to you. We are delighted that Mr. Dobrynin will continue to serve as an important channel of communication and understanding between our two nations as he assumes his new responsibilities.

I would like to suggest to you that in preparation for the upcoming summit consideration be given to a joint Soviet-American initiative to work together to reduce the scope of activities of terrorists in our world. The recent upsurge of terrorist incidents and threats indicates, I believe, that better planning and more decisive actions must be taken on a cooperative basis by our two nations. I am also making this suggestion to President Reagan.

I hope that this letter finds you and your family well, and I look forward to the opportunity to renew our acquaintance.

With best wishes.
Sincerely,

ROBERT C. BYRD.

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, DC, April 14, 1986.

Hon. Prime Minister YASUHIRO NAKASONE,
Office of the Prime Minister, Nagata-Cho, Chiyoda-Ku, Tokyo, Japan.

DEAR MR. PRIME MINISTER: My predecessor, former Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield, now United States Ambassador to your nation, has described the U.S./Japan relationship as the most important bilateral relationship that both countries enjoy. In a letter to you of March 10, 1986, Speaker Thomas O'Neill, Jr. and I affirmed the importance of this relationship, and encouraged your renewed efforts to reduce the trade imbalance that has had such a profound impact in recent years.

In that letter, we called for increased Japanese purchases of American goods and services. As you know, I am especially concerned about the trend of Japanese purchases of coal from West Virginia. U.S. coal exports to Japan have declined from about 31 million metric tons in 1982 to 13.3 million metric tons in 1985. I understand that U.S. coal producers were recently informed by Japanese officials that Japan would be further reducing its purchase of U.S. coal to about 11 million tons in 1986. About 38 percent of US. coal exports to Japan come from my state of West Virginia. Consequently, I am particularly concerned with the grim prospects for U.S./ Japan coal trade.

The decline in U.S. market share has occurred at a time when the Japanese coal market has increased by 13 million tons to over 90 million tons. Unfortunately, it does not appear that coal producers in the United States will benefit from this growth in the Japanese coal market. I understand that Japan has increased coal purchases from every other major coal exporting nation in the world, except the United States.

Finally, on another matter of shared interest, I encourage you to join with President Reagan and other concerned leaders in assuring that the challenge of terrorism receives an appropriately high place on the agenda of the up-coming summit meeting which you will be hosting in Tokyo. I wrote last week to President Reagan, urging him to move in this direction, and I hereby provide a copy of my letter to him for your information.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT C. BYRD.

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, DC, April 10, 1986.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The up-coming Tokyo Summit provides an important opportunity for cooperation between the seven largest industrial democracies at a time of fundamental change in the world economy. The need for action to resolve trade disputes and avert a global economic crisis is paramount. A related priority will be progress in stabilizing international currency movements to reduce the imbalances which handicap America's ability to compete.

While economic issues should be given priority at these important meetings, the economic challenges do not occur in a vacuum. All responsible nations share the uncertainties created by an increase in international terrorism. It would be unfortunate if leaders of the world's great democratic powers met at this time without reviewing opportunities for increased cooperation in combatting terrorism. In my letter to you of July 9, 1985, I recommended increased multilateral efforts in response to terrorism. The report of the Vice President's Task Force on Combatting Terrorism incorporated some of these recommendations, and provided other initiatives to strengthen the international regime.

I encourage you to seek the support of other Tokyo Summit participants for increased cooperation in combatting global terrorism, and to make sure that such action receives appropriate attention on the agenda of the Tokyo Summit. Participants at the Bonn Summit in 1978 dealt with this issue and included a commitment to combatting terrorism in their final declaration. That effort provided an important foundation for joint action. Given our shared interest in an effective response to terrorism, I believe it is essential that the great industrial democracies use the occasion of the Tokyo Summit to renew and expand that commitment.

You have my support in pursuing multilateral initiatives as well as domestic legislation to protect Americans at home and abroad, and to bring to justice those responsible for terrorist acts.

Sincerely,

ROBERT C. BYRD.

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 10 a.m. on Wednesday, April 16, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders on tomorrow under the standing order, there be special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes each: Senator HAWKINS, Senator CRANSTON, Senator SPECTER, Senator BIDEN, Senator MCCONNELL, Senator CHILES, Senator PROXMIRE, and Senator METZENBAUM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, following the special orders just identified, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 11 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, at 11 a.m. tomorrow, under the provisions of rule XXII, a live quorum will begin, to be immediately followed by a cloture vote on the motion to proceed to S. 1774, the Hobbs Act.

If cloture is invoked, it will be the intention of the majority leader to remain on the motion to proceed for the remainder of Wednesday's session.

If cloture is not invoked, the Senate could turn to any of the following items: S. 1236, technical amendments to the crime bill; S. 2231, Federal Deposit Insurance Act, or its companion bill, H.R. 4551; S. 1923, bankruptcy court judges bill; any Executive Calendar nominations that appear on the calendar; and then resume S. 426, the hydroelectric relicensing bill.

Therefore, rollcall votes can be expected throughout the day on Wednesday.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess in accordance with the previous order.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 7:11 p.m., recessed until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 16, 1986, at 10 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 15, 1986:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Warren Zimmermann, of Virginia, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Minister-Counselor, for the rank of Ambassador in his capacity as Chief of the U.S. delegation to the Vienna Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe Follow-Up Meeting.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Breckinridge L. Willcox, of Maryland, to be U.S. attorney for the district of Maryland for the term of 4 years vice J. Frederick Motz, resigned.

MERIT SYSTEMS PROTECTION BOARD

Daniel R. Levinson, of Virginia, to be a member of the Merit Systems Protection Board for the term of 7 years expiring March 1, 1993, vice Herbert E. Ellingwood.

Daniel R. Levinson, of Virginia, to be chairman of the Merit Systems Protection Board, vice Herbert E. Ellingwood.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 15, 1986:

THE JUDICIARY

Eric G. Bruggink, of Virginia, to be a judge of the U.S. Claims Court for a term of 15 years.

CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE

Robert M. Gates, of Virginia, to be Deputy Director of Central Intelligence.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, April 15, 1986

The House met at 3:30 p.m.

The Reverend Russell Fitts, pastor, Zion Baptist Church, Shelby, NC, offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we recognize that You have told us in Psalms 127:1, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." We look to You to help us build and maintain this Nation.

We pray for the women and men of this House. Be with them in their elected duties. Some have sacrificed time and distance from loved ones to enter service here. Be with loved ones at home while we invoke Your direction upon the activities here.

Grant, we pray, our awareness of Your love for all the world and our appreciation of Your goodness. We pray through Jesus our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 273, nays 128, answered "present" 1, not voting 31, as follows:

Mr. SIKORSKI changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

So the Journal was approved.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeepers will maintain order in the gallery.

FURTHER ANNOUNCEMENTS BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. May the Chair explain what the schedule of the day will be.

First of all, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BROYHILL] for a 1-minute speech.

Then the call of the Private Calendar.

Then under previous agreement, there will be 15 minutes on each side, Democratic side and Republican side, for 1-minute speeches. We will cut off recognition at the end of 30 minutes.

The House will then take up the rule and hope, after the completion of the rule, that there will be 1 hour of general debate on the Contra joint resolution.

It is the Chair's understanding that there is a briefing for the House at 7 o'clock tonight on the Libya situation. My understanding is that it will be at 7 o'clock, and if not, we would have to make other plans, but I hope we will be able to complete the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agreed to the following resolution:

S. RES. 382

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Joseph P. Addabbo, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit an enrolled copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That when the Senate recesses today, it recess as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested a bill of the House following title:

H.R. 3570. An act to amend title 28, United States Code, to reform and improve the Federal justices and judges survivors' annuities program, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 290. An act for the relief of Catherine and Robert Fossez.

THE REVEREND RUSSELL FITTS

(Mr. BROYHILL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege for me to welcome to the House of Representatives the Reverend Russell Fitts, pastor of Zion Baptist Church in Shelby, NC. Reverend Fitts was born and raised in Siler City, NC, was a high school classmate of our colleague, Congressman CHARLIE WHITLEY, educated at Morris Hill College, Furman University, and Southern Baptist Seminary in Louisville, KY. His education being interrupted in World War II with service in the 82d Airborne.

My congressional district doesn't have any major metropolitan areas, just lots of small cities and towns where people get to know their neighbors, and the townsfolk really try to put something back into their communities.

Reverend Fitts, and his wife Mary, are people like that. During their 23 years in Cleveland County, and 8 years at Zion Baptist, they have proven time and again that they are good neighbors, not just to those who belong to their particular church, or share their particular faith, but to anyone in need of a friend.

And I want to thank you, Reverend Fitts, for the message you brought us today. We owe you a debt of gratitude for those comforting words. With the events of last evening still fresh in our minds, and our hearts filled with concern for the future of our country and our world, we need that message of hope; that prayer for wisdom and guidance.

Thank you for honoring us with your presence here today.

I now yield to the Reverend Fitts' former high school classmate, our colleague, CHARLIE WHITLEY.

Mr. WHITLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to associate myself with his remarks in welcoming here today the Reverend Russell Fitts.

As the gentleman said, Russell and I were classmates all the way from first grade through high school, and as you can see, after that time Russell went straight; he has been in the ministry: A very outstanding Baptist minister in North Carolina.

I am delighted to call him my friend and we are happy to have him here today.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Private Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first individual bill on the Private Calendar.

STEVEN McKENNA

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 1598) for the relief of Steven McKenna.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There is no objection.

The SPEAKER. This concludes the call of the Private Calendar.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL CONFEREES ON S. 1128, CLEAN WATER ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1985

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker be authorized to appoint two additional conferees on the part of the House on the Senate bill (S. 1128) to amend the Clean Water Act, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey? The Chair hears none, and appoints as additional conferees the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HOWARD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHUSTER].

The Clerk will notify the Senate of the change in conferees.

TERRORISM AND APPEASEMENT

(Mr. LANTOS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, a generation ago the threat to free and democratic societies came from large-scale conventional military forces under the control of dictators. Today the threat to free and open societies comes from brutal and bloody terrorist attacks controlled by the likes of Qadhafi masquerading as heads of state.

A generation ago the voices of appeasement advised us that if we would only let Hitler take one more little country, his needs would be satisfied and peace would prevail. The voices of appeasement are heard again in Europe and elsewhere—and they are as wrong today as they were decades ago.

I fully support the action of our Commander in Chief. He acted after exhausting all avenues of diplomatic pressure, attempts at persuading our friends to join us in an economic boycott, private and public calls for coordinated action against terrorism.

The critics of our Government's action have an obligation to answer these simple questions: How many more American diplomats will have to be killed while peacefully performing their official duties? How many more 11-year-old American girls waiting at civilian airports will have to be killed while playing with their toys? How many more American grandmothers and infants will have to be blown out of American commercial aircraft before the critics are ready to act?

Appeasement is not a policy. It is the road to war. Terrorism will not prevail because there are enough of us who have learned the lessons of appeasement and who know that free societies must defend themselves if they wish to survive.

EXPRESSING CONCERN FOR THE MISSING F-111 PILOTS

(Mr. DORNAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask us to pause for one moment to pray for the two families of two young American Air Force pilots, the F-111 crew that is still missing and hopes for their safety grow darker with each passing hour.

One of these young pilots—I am sure they both have young wives and small children waiting for them just outside that air base at Lakenheath in England. One of them is 33 years of age, he is Puerto Rican-American named Fernando L. Ribas-Dominicci. The other one is 31 years of age, Paul F. Lorence.

These are the first two Air Force pilots to be ordered into combat since Vietnam in January 1973 and Laos through August of that year. That is the longest period of peace since Pearl Harbor that Air Force or Army-Air Force crews have not been sent into combat.

I ask you to pray for these men, for the brave Navy pilots; the Navy has seen combat in those years and remember that these select few maintain our way of life and our liberty.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY). The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] has expired.

Members giving 1-minute speeches should pay strict attention to the Chair's warnings because there are only 15 minutes on each side and if speeches run over, it is unfair to others who want to address the House.

SERVICES FOR HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from the funeral service held this morning for our dear and departed friend and colleague Joseph Patrick Addabbo. The service which was attended by more than 50 House Members was held in St. Patrick's Cathedral and was officiated by Cardinal John J. O'Connor. The speaker delivered a most moving eulogy.

Joe Addabbo died this past Thursday night at the age of 61. He served this House of Representatives with unique effectiveness for a total of 26 years. He rose to national prominence as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee.

Yet we remember our friend Joe Addabbo, we struggle with our feelings. We are in grief yet we are relieved that Joe is not suffering anymore.

We will remember Joe's sweet nature, his kind and unassuming manner. We will remember a man of unparalled integrity with the highest moral principles and values. Yet he never let the trappings of power to cause him to be removed from his constitutents. He served them for so long and so well that they were part of an extended Addabbo family.

We have lost Joe Addabbo. It is a loss difficult to measure and impossible to reconcile, especially for those of us blessed enough to be his friend. We convey our most sincere condolences to Grace Addabbo and Joe's children Dominic, Diana, and Joseph. We share your loss but hope you will take solace in the fact that his legacy of public service and love of country will endure for years to come.

THE HOUSE MUST HONOR ITS COMMITMENTS

(Mr. COMBEST asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COMBEST. Mr. Speaker, today is April 15 and millions of citizens across the United States have filed their annual income tax forms. Our tax system is based on the commitment of the majority of American people to honor their civic duty and meet the April 15 deadline.

While considering this remarkable system, I am acutely aware of the fact that April 15 is also the date on which Federal law requires Congress to have completed action on a budget resolution for fiscal year 1987. Unfortunately, this law is being deliberately violated by the House.

Mr. Speaker, our country is struggling with the numerous adverse effects of a $205 billion deficit. Last year we passed the Gramm-Rudman legislation in an effort to ensure that Congress meets it deficit reduction targets. Still, the House Budget Committee has failed to produce a budget and bring it to the floor. There is no valid excuse for failing to comply with the law. We were elected to do our job and set national priorities by enacting a budget.

We are here to represent the people in our congressional districts across the country. Like our taxpaying constituents who have met the April 15 deadline, we must produce a budget resolution that meets the appropriate deficit reduction figure. I urge my colleagues to honor their commitment to the taxpayers of America by reporting a fiscal year 1987 budget resolution without further delay.

ATTACKS ON TERRORIST TARGETS IN LIBYA JUSTIFIED

(Mr. McCLOSKEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, the President was more than justified in ordering military attacks on terrorist targets in Libya.

Given Qadhafi's terrorist bent leading up to our actions, it would seem more than even that the administration should press for an allied boycott of Libya.

One of the allies we should start with is the pentagon cancellation of a $7.9 million defense contract to Fiatallia this is crucial, as this firm has 15-percent Libyan ownership.

Why Qadhafi should be reaping profits from a U.S. contract for crawler tractors for the Marines while we urge an economic boycott of Libya by our allies is perplexing, to say the least.

I have introduced legislation to prevent this action, which imperils hundreds of jobs in southern Indiana.

The Congress must urge the Secretary of Defense to suspend this contract.

THE PRESIDENT STRIKES AT LIBYAN TERRORISM

(Mr. BROOMFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I commend the President for his courageous decision to strike back against Libya, a terrorist-supporting state, responsible for the murder in West Berlin of a young Army sergeant from Detroit, after confirming Libya's role in that terrorist action.

Our Government tried to get our allies to agree to nonmilitary options in dealing with Qadhafi. We used public diplomacy to convince him to change his ways. Nothing, however, worked.

Libyan agents went on planning attacks on U.S. military and diplomatic targets.

The President's decision was an act of self-defense, justified under the U.N. charter. Our military operations there were designed to reduce Libya's capability to support and direct terrorism.

While terrorism will not go away, a clear signal was sent. We have raised the cost of Libyan-backed terror.

My heart goes out to the families of those servicemen who were lost. I praise the President for a gutsy decision in defense of our country. He did what he had to do. I believe that all of us in Congress can say, "Well, done, Mr. President."

THE PRESIDENT MADE THE RIGHT DECISION

(Mr. COLEMAN of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there is clearly sufficient evidence to link Qadhafi and the Libyan Government to terrorist acts against Americans. The President made the right decision, based on Qadhafi's continued support of worldwide terrorism. It was the response we should have made.

We must demonstrate a firm resolve against state-supported terrorism. A military option must be part of the arsenal of our defense against terrorism, to be used, as it was in this case, as a last resort when peaceful measures have failed. We all regret the loss of lives, but our resolve must be firm. The next step needs to be the diplomatic and economic isolation of all nations that sponsor terrorism, not just Libya, and it needs to be a concerted effort in conjunction with our allies.

Today we stand as one nation resolved to end international terrorism. Soon, we must stand as one people worldwide resolved to halt the spread of terrorism.

We cannot expect any short-term relief as a result of this action, and all Americans must know that, in fact, we face a possible escalation. We hope, however, that by raising the costs of terrorism to the nations that sponsor it, in the long term we can end terrorism worldwide.

HONORING WILLIAM SIKKEL

(Mr. SILJANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize the outstanding contributions of Mr. William A. Sikkel to his community and to his Nation.

Following 5 years of outstanding military service, Bill Sikkel settled in Holland, MI, where he married the former Alma Brondyke. Bill and Alma now have two children and four grandchildren.

Americans have a way about them, Mr. Speaker. We're known as people who work our way up from the bottom. Our folk heroes are more likely to have their roots in buckskins than in suede.

Bill Sikkel is one of those Americans.

Born in Paterson, NJ, Bill settled in Holland in 1935, got a job as a punch press operator for the Holland Furnace Co., and began working his way up the ladder. But, when war broke out a few years later, he turned in his lunchbox for a backpack.

In 5 years, Bill fought his way through four campaigns in the South Pacific, went from private first class to major and earned a Bronze Star and three Presidential Citations.

Bill returned to Holland after the war. He and Alma were married in 1944, and back at Holland Furnace, he worked his way up to branch manager.

Bill's business love has always been sales. Throughout his career—from the Holland Furnace Co. through Big Dutchman to Haworth, Inc.—this love has carried him through all 50 States and 56 foreign countries. During this time, he trained more than 1,000 sales people.

When he signed on as Haworth's vice president sales in 1966, company sales were $3 million a year. Today, Haworth brings in $350 million putting it at the forefront of the office systems industry. That translates into unprecedented job opportunities for the people of western Michigan.

But there are many outstanding businessmen in America. The man we are honoring today is much more than that.

Bill served enthusiastically as president and director of the Holland Area Chamber of Commerce. He served as director of the Holland Community Foundation. And, an avid hunter and fisherman, he served with particular enthusiasm as the director of Wildlife Unlimited. At one point, Bill successfully mixed business with pleasure launching the Holland Fishing Derby Program which brought in more tourist and resort business and tied them in to the harbor and fishery industries.

I said several times that Bill Sikkel "served." That is the motivation in Bill's life.

He served his Nation in World War II. He served his community by offering his leaderhip skills to civic activities. And he served his family as a faithful and loving husband, father, and grandfather.

His son Bob is an attorney. He and his wife Connie have two sons. Daughter Linda is a homemaker, married to Gary Speet who is a sales representative for Coutours, Inc., of Holland. The Speets have two daughters.

Bill also serves his faith. A member of the Maple Avenue Christian Reformed Church, he is a loyal supporter of private, Christian education. His son, a graduate of Holland Christian Schools, now serves on the H.C.S. Board of Directors.

In 1984, Bill raised $3 million for a new middle school building. Its offices were completely equipped and furnished by a gift from his own corporation. He also utilized his international experience to raise money for Christian Schools International, headquartered in Grand Rapids.

Hero, leader, and servant. For these qualities and accomplishments and more, I ask you, my colleagues, to join me today in commending William A. Sikkel.

UNITED STATES SENT A MESSAGE TO TERRORISTS WORLDWIDE

(Mr. CHAPMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday America sent a message to terrorists worldwide. We said that we are no longer going to lie down for cowardly killing. We are no longer going to lie down because of fear. We are no longer going to ignore senseless brutal destruction.

Qadhafi is a madman who we can no longer tolerate. We told the world we intend to do what must be done to protect our citizens worldwide.

I applaud the President's decisive, measured response against a mindless mad dog Mu'ammar.

Despite the apparent success of last night's mission, I cannot help but share the disappointment expressed by one of my constituents in east Texas that in bombing the military barracks in Libya, Colonel Qadhafi was not sleeping inside.

It is my sincere hope that the Libyan people—who are not our enemy—rethink the direction their leader is taking them.

I do not underestimate the mindless response and brutality of Qadhafi. We may suffer further attacks, but we nonetheless stand ready to act.

United America will fight terrorism and terrorists wherever they are found.

ARE THEY REALLY "MEDICAL SUPPLIES" OR LIBYAN MILITARY SUPPLIES?

(Mr. RITTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Americans protesting proposed aid to the Nicaraguan Contras symbolically placed medical supplies on the steps of the U.S. Capitol; crutches, bandages, ointments, and the list goes on.

These people were not the first to think of sending the Sandinistas medical supplies. The Sandinistas received a shipment a few years ago, and it was marked "medical supplies." However, these "medical supplies" did not immediately reach their destination. Four Libyan planes loaded to capacity ran into trouble and had to land in Brazil. And what did they find? Two dismantled Soviet fighter jets, wire-guided missiles, rifles, machineguns, mortars, bazookas, 90-millimeter cannons, 8 multiple-rocket launchers, 5 tons of bombs, 8 antiaircraft guns, 600 light artillery rockets, and the list goes on. All in all, 84 tons of arms. One of a number of shipments of Libyan military shipments to the Sandinistas. In praise of the Sandinistan efforts, Qadhafi said, "Libyan fighters, arms, and backing to the Nicaraguan people have reached them because they fight with us. They fight America on its own ground."

That is why, my colleagues, he gave $400 million to the Sandinistas.

TO THE SHORES OF TRIPOLI—AGAIN

(Mr. SKELTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, the military action last night was one of self-defense taken against a sustained, continuous, and ever increasing use of terrorism by Colonel Qadhafi directed against America. For too long, he has viewed Americans as easy pickings for his coldblooded murderers. Targets have included our servicemen, our embassies, diplomats and their children, U.S. businessmen, and American tourists throughout the world. To put an end to this, America went to the shores of Tripoli again.

We wish we didn't have to take this action. We also wish there were no terrorism in the world. Unfortunately, we can't wish terrorism away.

The Government and people of the United Kingdom who cooperated in yesterday's mission should be thanked. They remember the lessons of history and well understand that there can be no security in appeasing dictators. My great regret is that the French Government did not see fit to allow our fighter bombers to overfly French territory. Instead of a flight of 8 hours, our flight crews were forced to fly 14 hours.

If our allies had only joined us, months or years ago, in economic sanctions against Libya, this type of military action might never have been necessary.

This Government has talked long and loud about actions it was going to take in response to terrorism. Action has finally been taken. Now is the time to heed the old adage to "speak softly but carry a big stick."

The American people should be aware that one military strike does not a policy make. The fight against terrorism will require a sustained effort, and the most important component is willpower. The fight against terrorism will not end with last night's strike, but a strong blow in a right cause was finally made.

TAX POLICY

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to address both the short-term ill effects of current tax reform proposals and our long-term tax policy and its relationship to the world economy. As America approaches the 21st century, she is facing a greatly altered international trade arena. We must gear our policies, including our tax policy, toward the future.

The business alternative minimum tax will start America moving in that direction. This new minimum tax will bring our tax system into closer harmony with those of our major trading partners, and help level the playing field with foreign competition. It will ensure that corporations pay a substantial and fair share of tax, and will right the wrongs of the huge business tax increases included in the current tax reform proposals.

Today is April 15, Mr. Speaker, a day that is foremost in the minds of American taxpayers. Today our Nation must look toward the future in its tax policy.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting a tax policy to solve the ills of tax reform and allow us to be more competitive worldwide.

THE PRESIDENT'S ACTION DESERVES NOT ONLY BIPARTISAN SUPPORT BUT ALSO ALLIES' SUPPORT

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the President's action on Libya was justified and it deserves our bipartisan support. A good number of our European nation friends, however, have slapped the United States in the face with their lack of cooperation. France and Spain went so far as to prevent us from using their air space. I looked at the definition of "ally" in Webster's dictionary, and it says "one that is associated with another as a helper."

After yesterday, quite frankly, I sometimes wonder. Had the Europeans supported us on economic sanctions, perhaps this course of action might not have been necessary. One cannot simply condemn the Libyans as the EEC did yesterday with rhetoric. I suggest that the Europeans consult among themselves and talk about two words, "alliance" and "NATO."

AIR STRIKE ON LIBYA

(Mr. MOORE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the United States delivered a message to Libya's Colonel Qadhafi in the only language he understands. It was firm, clear, and resounding. Time had come for Qadhafi to end his reign of terror. Our warnings had gone unheeded. He had failed to listen to reason. He had shown no signs of changing his relentless pursuit of terror.

In the famous words of Edmund Burke, "All that is necessary for evil to succeed is for good men to do nothing." Last night when the President talked to America about the day's events, he told us, "Today we have done what we had to do. If necessary, we shall do it again." Mr. Speaker, yesterday good men confronted evil and did something.

I would add one final observation. Last night the President praised French authorities for helping us successfully prevent Libya from carrying out a massacre of civilians waiting in line for visas at the American Embassy in France. I trust we can expect similar behavior on their part in the future so American aircraft will be granted access to French air space and safe passage should it be necesssary in the future. France needs to straighten up its act so we can fly right to the target should another mission be necessary.

THE UNITED STATES RESPONDS TO THE TERRORIST THREAT

(Mr. HUBBARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I support our President regarding our air attacks yesterday in Libya.

We were trying to respond through the only method Col. Mu'ammar Qadhafi understands to the violent terrorist activities ordered and carried out by the world's No. 1 terrorist.

We in the United States appreciate and value human life.

Therefore, we are not happy about, indeed, we're sympathetic with the Libyans, including Colonel Qadhafi, who have lost family members in last night's air strikes.

But, Colonel Qadhafi, you asked for it. You are directly responsible for killing Americans in the Middle East and in Europe on land, at sea, and in the air. We are fed up with you and your terrorist gangs.

The use of U.S. military power must always be used with great caution. Last night the Libyan terrorists learned that Americans are unwilling any longer to see our people's safety and travels jeopardized by Colonel Qadhafi and his terrorist gangs.

WE SHOULD NOT MINIMIZE THE GRAVITY OF THE SANDINISTA INVASION OF HONDURAS

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, Honduran concerns about Nicaraguan attacks across its border were well established before 1,500 Nicaraguan soldiers invaded Honduras on March 23. Honduran military intelligence learned of a large buildup of Sandinista troops on the border around March 19 and 20. The Honduran military reportedly was considering air raids against targets in Nicaragua and had six planes loaded with bombs on standby even before the border crossing by the Sandinista soldiers. Reports indicate the bombing raids were cancelled because the Hondurans were concerned that the Nicaraguans might have installed new antiaircraft defenses along the border.

Honduran officials have reacted angrily to reports that the United States pressured Honduras into taking military action against the Snadinistas. Honduran Armed Forces spokesman Maj. Jorge Arguello said that any reports of pressure were "categorically a lie. No one pushed us into anything." Honduran President Azcona said he made his decision to seek United States military aid "without outside or domestic pressures."

I stongly believe it would be a mistake to minimize the gravity of the Sandinista invasion of Honduras.

HOUR OF MEETING ON TOMORROW, APRIL 16, 1986

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today, it adjourn to meet at 11 a.m. tomorrow, April 16, 1986.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this been cleared with the minority?

Mr. PICKLE. Yes; it has.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

MONEY LAUNDERING PREVENTION ACT OF 1986

Mr. PICKLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced the bill, Money Laundering Prevention Act of 1986, along with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCHULZE]. This bill was drafted by the administration with the close consultation of the oversight staff. The bill closes the loopholes in current law which allow money launderers to escape conviction and provides Internal Revenue Service with seizure and forfeiture authority when there are violations of the bank secretary reporting requirements.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is needed. The Federal courts have taken the position that there is inadequate legislative authority to prosecute people who are actively engaged in money laundering operations.

Mr. Schulze and I are going to petition our colleagues, requesting Members to join with us in enacting this much needed legislation.

CONGRESS NEEDS TO PASS A BUDGET RESOLUTION NOW

(Mr. WYLIE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, today marks the symbolic day for the collection of our national taxes to pay for the feeding frenzy of the Federal Government. Today also marks the day that Congress was expected to take a significant step to curb the voracious appetite of the Government under the Gramm-Rudman legislation passed by this body only a few short months ago.

As millions of Americans meet the April 15 deadline today, Congress ought to be ashamed that we do not have the political courage to meet our own self-imposed deadline to reduce Federal spending.

Why is it important for Congress to get on with the business of deficit reduction? We now have the kind of economic climate many of us have advocated for years: Low inflation, sustained economic growth, declining interest rates, and a dollar moving into a more advantageous position. The Federal Reserve recently lowered the interest rate it directly controls—the discount rate is now at 7 percent—and many forecasters are predicting it will move lower.

Congress needs to complement this action by passing a budget resolution now that meets the Gramm-Rudman deficit target. Millions of first-time home buyers, millions of small businesses, millions of farmers all across America will benefit from the lower interest rates that will ensue from meaningful deficit reduction.

Finally, there is the most dangerous consequence of procrastination of all—the likely erosion of confidence by the financial community, both domestic and international, that the U.S. Congress is serious about cutting the Federal deficits. The result can only be a renewed increase of interest rates—despite recent Federal Reserve discount action—a stronger dollar and a likely delay in the improvement of our trade balance. Working in the limelight of public scrutiny, as we do, we dare not permit the impression that we are wavering in our resolve.

The financial markets expect Congress to act. The good people of this country expect Congress to act. Mr. Speaker, let Congress act. Bring us a budget resolution under an open rule so Congress can work its will and do its part to sustain the present economic expansion.

WE SHOULD BE PROUD OF THE PRESIDENT'S ACTION

(Mr. SCHEUER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, the failure of our European allies, except for England, to join in any kind of collective action against the world's greatest terrorist chief of state was pusillanimous, fainthearted, pitiful, and shameful. The President acted in the only way a Chief of State could react; he did what had to be done.

The act itself, our reprisal, was an excellent military exercise, surgical to the point. If there were any civilian casualities, it is only as a result of Mu'ammar Qadhafi's placing his assassins and his, hiding them under the skirts of women and children, as does his mentor, the PLO chairman.

And the face that our President put on this act to the world in his speech last night was thoughtful, calm, deliberate, much more on sorrow than in anger, and he presented an image that made all Americans proud.

THE DEMOCRATIC STEALTH BUDGET

(Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Defense Department claims that we have the ability to make a fighter plane that will be an effective offensive weapon, but it will be invulnerable to attack because it will in effect be radar invisible. Now I do know that technology exists because the Democrats are using it in their own stealth budget.

Ever since the President released his budget, the Democrats have gone on the offensive, attacking it with glee and vigor across the Nation. They even scheduled a vote on the floor of the House on the President's budget under the guise that they had to vote on that budget before the committee could consider an alternative. That was March 13. The House Budget Committee has not even met since that vote. In the process, the majority party in this House has let the April 15 deadline pass by.

The Democratic stealth budget has its advantages. Since it is invisible, we cannot examine it, discuss it, or criticize it. We could not even agree to it if we wanted to. It is time to take the wraps off the Democrat's stealth budget and begin the process of governing as we were elected to do.

VOTE AGAINST AID TO THE CONTRAS

(Mr. BATES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge my colleagues to vote against the President's proposal for aid to the Contras when it comes before the House for the second time.

More aid to the Contras will not solve our problems with Nicaragua.

The administration says that military pressure is needed if diplomatic initiatives are to succeed. Military pressure in the form of support for the Contras has done nothing to further the diplomatic initiatives.

These Contras who have little support in Nicaragua have achieved little besides encouraging extremists in the Sandinista junta and pushing their country closer to the Soviet Union for military support.

The administration must make clear what sort of a threat they believe Nicaragua is. If the Sandinistas are truly endangering the United States, $100 million to a weak and embattled rebel force will do nothing to stop this threat.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE DESERVE BETTER

(Mr. BROWN of Colorado asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, today is the day when this House was supposed to pass a budget. Sadly, we not only have not enacted a budget for the Congress, we did not even act on it in the House of Representatives.

As a matter of fact, the leadership of this House has not even permitted a markup hearing to exist on the budget. What we have is a refusal by the leadership of this House to even allow the markup of a budget. What they have done is decided to hide from the problem. You cannot hide from this problem. It is not going to go away.

What we see here is a decision by the leadership to refuse to let the American people deal with a budget, and an insistence on the part of the leadership of this House that you go ahead with the sequestering provided for under Gramm-Rudman.

Mr. Speaker, that is irresponsible. The American people deserve far better.

SURPRISE, NO SURPRISE

(Mr. TORRICELLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, last night there were no surprises in Tripoli. From the Libyans, the American Government has found exactly what it expected.

Indeed, the only real surprise, the only real disappointment, is not from an adversary, but from a friend in France, because American pilots had to find uncertain dangers, different dangers, by flying a longer route to the coast of Libya.

So today I rise to apologize, apologize for a French Government that cowers by intimidation and in fear. And I apologize for that French Government to those brave Americans who lie in Normandy and expected more, to those brave Americans who lost their lives in Dien Bien Phu and expected more, to those Americans who sacrificed to rebuild France and expected more. I apologize for all of those who expected more from a free and a proud French people.

Last night was a proud moment for the American people, but it remains a day of shame for France.

TERRORISTS ONLY UNDERSTAND THE LANGUAGE OF FORCE

(Mr. COATS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, America's attack against Libya was clearly justified. No nation need sit back idly while a hostile power maims and murders its citizens. In launching these air attacks against Libya, President Reagan has chosen to speak the only language terrorists understand, the language of force.

We must now work to speak this language with a unified voice in the West. The inability of some of our allies, and especially the French, to join with us in defending our shared interests against wanton attacks is most troubling. The administration, with support from this body, should work to bring all our allies aboard for this effort to end state-sponsored terrorism. Those of our allies who decided not to assist us in this effort need to reexamine their decision. It is time to stand up and be counted.

OUR EUROPEAN ALLIES CANNOT HAVE IT BOTH WAYS

(Mr. MRAZEK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, when we read in the morning newspaper about a terrorist act, we react with horror. But, imagine the horror if it is our own wife and baby daughter that is blown out of a TWA aircraft to their deaths, or our own son whose arms and legs are blown off in a discotheque in West Germany. When terrorism can be tracked to its source, then we have to take action. No one is sure where this action will lead, but without it the murder of innocent civilians would certainly go on.

Our European allies cannot continue to have it both ways. They cannot continue to expect $100 billion a year for their own security while sanctimoniously chastising the United States of America for at least attempting to confront a terrorist menace that has consumed so many lives of their own citizens.

CONGRESS SHOULD COMPLY WITH THE LAW

(Mr. BOULTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, when Congress passes a law, it expects that the law will be obeyed. Today, April 15, is a day for complying with two very important laws.

As many of us will be reminded late this evening, today is the day that Americans file their Federal tax returns. It is the law, and the great majority of Americans comply with it.

Today is also the day that Congress is to have completed action on a budget resolution for fiscal year 1987. Unlike the vast majority of Americans—Congress is not complying with the law today. Congress has not even come close. Unlike the millions of Americans who will put pen to paper late today in order to get the 1040 form completed, the House of Representatives has not started the budget writing process.

Mr. Speaker, it is the Democrat majority that is responsible for this hypocracy—telling the Nation to comply with one law, while this House ignores another. It reminds me of the old saying—do what I say, not what I do.

The Democrat majority on the Budget Committee has delayed any real action on the budget. Do they think the deficit is going to go away on its own?

Well, I, for one, know that it won't. It is time for Congress to follow the example of the American people and comply with the laws by which it is governed.

If taxpayers can pay their taxes on time, then surely we in this body can take timely action to come up with a responsible budget that puts tax dollars to the best possible use.

WE NEED COOPERATION OF ALL NATIONS TO STEM THE THREAT OF TERRORISM

(Mr. HUGHES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, like most Americans, I stand by President Reagan's decision to bomb key terrorist bases and military facilities in Libya. We cannot permit terrorists like Qadhafi and his kind to intimidate with impunity and without fear of retaliation.

The raid on Libya was calculated to protect the lives of Americans and other citizens of the world community. It is my sincere hope that this military strike was successful in disrupting Libya's terrorist agenda, and that it serves as a deterrent to future terrorist attacks by these cowards, who pride themselves on murdering innocent citizens.

It is time for our allies to stand with us in exerting as much economic, political and diplomatic pressure as possible on Libya and the other peddlers of terrorism. Perhaps if our allies had joined with us for that purpose months ago, yesterday's actions might not have been necessary.

I find it inexcusable that France forced our planes to fly an additional 1,200 miles each way around its borders. We are trying to protect the interests of the entire world, not just the United States. It's going to take the cooperation of all nations to stem the threat of terrorism and return some degree of sanity to our world. I am disappointed with some of our allies and their ostrich-like thinking.

REVISED ORGANIC ACT OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

(Mr. DE LUGO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, the legislation I introduce today would correct an unfortunate change in this country's relationship with the U.S. territory that I represent.

The revised Organic Act of the Virgin Islands, enacted in 1954, is the Federal law which establishes the premises of this country's relationship with the territory of the U.S. Virgin Islands. A major component of that act is permanent financial assistance provided to the territory through advanced payment of U.S. excise tax collections on products of the islands. The most significant of these collections are the excise taxes on rum. This tax was imposed on rum entering from the Virgin Islands as a means of equalizing the costs vis-a-vis mainland distillers. From its inception, this equalizing tariff was returned to the territory. There were two prevailing theories for the returns: excise taxes provide an ideal source for meeting the Federal objective of promoting economic development in the territories because they are tied to local production; and Federal taxation of territorial inhabitants suggests taxation without the constitutional minimum of representation, a result which is avoided by returning the assessment to the local government.

The 1984 Tax Act changed this historical economic arrangement. The act increased from $10.50 to $12.50 per proof gallon the excise taxes imposed on distilled spirits, but disallowed the increase to the Virgin Islands for the first time. As is to be expected when the price increases, rum sales diminished. Furthermore, for public policy reasons, alcohol consumption has dropped off somewhat. The dual effect has yielded the Virgin Island a significant loss in revenue. Unlike the Federal Government, the impact has not been mitigated by the excise tax increase.

According to the President's budget, over 5 years the excise taxes returned to the Virgin Islands will fall from $40 million to $25 million. This is hard to accommodate in a territory that, by Federal law, must rely on the funds for many of its capital improvement needs, and which had considered these excise taxes its singlemost reliable resource.

If passed, the increase in excise taxes to be returned to the Virgin Islands in fiscal year 1987 would be just under $5 million. This amount would be generated solely by excise taxes collected on the sale of Virgin Islands produced rum. The revenue would be derived from a source that was never intended as a Federal revenue enhancer, and would be returned to the jurisdiction which Congress had historically recognized as the beneficiary.

BENTLEY PRAISES STRIKE ON TERRORISM

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, our reaction to last night's punitive action must include consideration of the dead in the airports at Rome and Vienna and of the three Maryland dead from the bomb on the TWA plane from 2 weeks ago and another Marylander on a TWA plane last fall. I could go on—the list is endless, the dead from terrorist attacks.

The toast of Robert Goodloe Harper "Millions for defense but not one cent for tribute" was first used in 1798. Several years later that toast became the battle cry of the infant American Republic when it fought the pirates of Tripoli.

For decades, pirates—the terrorists of their day—held Europe at gunpoint. If governments did not pay tribute the Tripoli pirates would disrupt sealanes by sinking ships. The Europeans were afraid; and, counseled caution; 180 years later, the Europeans are still cautioning as yet new Tripoli pirates are attacking travel lanes and committing other acts of barbarism. President Reagan, like Jefferson before him, was forced to protect travel lanes, and to defend against Tripoli pirates.

While the use of force is dangerous, it has been the policy of the new Tripoli pirates for years. A failure to react with force was probably even more dangerous than allowing Qadhafi to go unchallenged. I wish there was a peaceful way to guarantee the safety of our citizens, but I support the President in his necessary use of force.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS AND TRANSPORTATION TO SIT TOMORROW DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. GRAY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation be permitted to sit tomorrow, April 16, 1986, during the 5-minute rule.

This request has been cleared by the minority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SHAW. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, that is quite correct, it has been cleared, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4515, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1986, AND PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF A JOINT RESOLUTION RELATING TO CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 415 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 415

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the Senate of the Union for the consideration of a joint resolution relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 only containing the text of S.J. Res. 283, and the first reading of the joint resolution shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and to the amendments made in order by this resolution and which shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by a Member in favor of the joint resolution and a Member opposite thereto, the joint resolution shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. No amendment to the joint resolution shall be in order except the following amendments, which shall be in order any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding, which shall be considered only in the following order, and which shall not be subject to amendment or to a demand for a division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole:

(1) an amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the Congressional Record of April 14, 1986, by, and if offered by, Representative Hamilton of Indiana, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Hamilton and a Member opposed thereto;

(2) an amendment, which may be offered only if the amendment designated (1) above has been rejected, printed in the Congressional Record of April 14, 1986, by, and if offered by, Representative McCurdy of Oklahoma, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative McCurdy and a Member opposed thereto; and

(3) an amendment, which may be offered only if the amendment designated (1) above has been rejected, printed in the Congressional Record of April 14, 1986, by, and if offered by, Representative Mrazek of New York, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative Mrazek and a Member opposed thereto. At the conclusion of the consideration of the joint resolution for amendment, there shall be an additional period of general debate on the joint resolution to continue not to exceed thirty minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by a Member in favor of the joint resolution and a Member opposed thereto. At the conclusion of said debate, the Committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to commit, which may not contain instructions. The engrossment of the joint resolution shall not be messaged to the Senate if the bill (H.R. 4515) making urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes is passed by the House.

SEC. 2. After the vote on final passage of such joint resolution, all points of order for failure to comply with the provisions of section 302(f) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended (Public Law 93-344, as amended by Public Law 99-177), and with the provisions of clause 2(1)(3)(B) of rule XI, are hereby waived against the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4515) making urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes. During the consideration of the bill, all points of order against the bill for failure to comply wiht the provisions of clauses 2 and 6 of rule XXI are hereby waived. Amendments to strike out the following provisions in the bill shall be considered to have been adopted in the House and in the Committee of the Whole: beginning on page 5, lines 11 through 25; and beginning on page 28, line 19 through page 30, line 16. It shall be in order to consider the following amendments to the bill printed in the Congressional Record of April 14, 1986, by, and if offered by, the Members indicated: the amendment by Representative Hammerschmidt of Arkansas, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI and section 302(f) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, are hereby waived; an amendment by Representative Schroeder of Colorado, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI are hereby waived; an amendment by Delegate Fauntroy of the District of Columbia, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clauses 2 and 6 of rule XXI, and clause 7 of rule XVI, are hereby waived; an amendment by Representative Mica of Florida, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI and clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived; an amendment by Representative Fazio of California, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI are hereby waived; an amendment by Representative Rostenkowski of Illinois, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI and clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived; and an amendment by Representative Bosco of California, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI and clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived. If the joint resolution designated in section one of this resolution and H.R. 4515 are both passed by the House, the enrolling clerk of the House of Representatives shall add the text of such joint resolution as passed by the House, with such technical and conforming changes as may be necessary, to the engrossment of H.R. 4515 as passed by the House, and such joint resolution shall be considered to have been laid on the table.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order against the rule. I am not exactly sure how to express the situation that I face.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. GRAY of Illinois). The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Armed Services, this Member appeared before the Committee on Rules last week to point out that one of the amendments that the rule that has just been read, the so-called Schroeder-Downey amendment, was legislation that has already been referred by the Parliamentarian to the Committee on Armed Services and has been further referred to the Subcommittee on Procurement and Military Nuclear Systems, which I have the honor of chairing, and that the same amendment that is being put in order in this rule was also referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules is in the Chamber. When I testified before the Committee on Rules, the distinguished chariman said: "Do you mean to tell me that the identical legislation that the gentlewoman from Colorado wants to add as an amendment to the supplemental appropriation bill has been referred to the Committee on Armed Services?"

And I said: "Yes, sir."

He said: "Do you mean to tell me that the same piece of legislation that the gentlewoman from Colorado wants to add to the rule already and the supplemental appropriation bill was also referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?"

And I said: "Yes, sir."

And the chairman said: "Well, in that case, we will not allow that to be put in the amendment."

This is in the proceedings of the Committee on Rules, and it would seem to me that a pledge on behalf of the chairman of the committee on a matter that was brought to the attention by the Committee on Armed Services should be honored, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does any Member desire to be heard on the point of order of the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON]?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. What is the point of order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not quite clear. The gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] has made a point of order against the entire rule. I would ask my dear friend, the gentleman from New York, to be more specific as to what point of order he is making.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, the basic point of order is that you cannot make a piece of legislation that has been referred by the Parliamentarian to two standing committees and have it then, without any discussion in those standing committees, added to the legislation that includes this entire rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] desire to be heard?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to my good friend, the gentleman from New York, who is a distinguished Member of the Committee on Armed Services, he certainly understands and realizes that this is not a point of order that can lie against this rule.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Chair to rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] desire to be heard further?

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, it is a point of order of the credibility of the committee. I do not believe that the pledge of the chairman of the committee can be overridden by some individual Member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GRAY of Illinois). The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair would state to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] that the Committee on Rules has the inherent authority to recommend to the House the discharge of any committee from consideration of any matter. The gentleman has the right to express his argument on the merits of the special order during debate or by voting against the rule.

The Chair overrules the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to exercise that privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 415 is a complex and lengthy rule pertaining to two measures. Section 1 provides for consideration of a joint reolution relating to Central America. Section 2 waives certain points of order against the bill H.R. 4515, making urgent supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1986.

House Resolution 415 provides a modified closed procedure for the consideration of a joint resolution on Central America, containing the text of Senate Joint Resolution 283. The rule provides for 2 hours of general debate, to be confined to the joint resolution and to the amendments made in order.

After general debate is concluded, only three amendments are to be in order under the rule. All points of order against the three amendments are waived and they will not be subject to amendment or to a demand for a division of the question either in the House or in the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments are printed in Monday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and are to be considered only in the following order:

First, an amendment in the nature of a substitute to be offered by Representative HAMILTON;

Second, an amendment which may be offered only if the amendment by Mr. HAMILTON is rejected, to be offered by Representative MCCURDY;

And third, an amendment, which may be offered only if the Hamilton amendment is rejected, to be offered by Representative MRAZEK of New York. Each of these amendments will be debatable for not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the author and a Member opposed to the amendment.

At the conclusion of consideration of the joint resolution for amendment, there shall be an additional period of general debate. This debate shall not exceed 30 minutes, equally divided and controlled by a Member in favor and a Member opposed.

The rule provides for one motion to commit, which may not contain instructions. The House will then move to a vote on final passage of the joint resolution.

The rule also contains a stipulation that the engrossment of the joint resolution shall not be messaged to the other body if H.R. 4515—the supplemental appropriations bill—is passed by the House.

Section 2 of the rule before the House contains waivers of points of order during the consideration of H.R. 4515, the urgent Supplemental Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1986.

The rules waives section 302(f) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 against consideration of the bill. In compliance with section 302(b) of the Budget Act, the Appropriations Committee issued a report subdividing the budget authority allocated to the full committee among its subcommittees. While the budget authority contained in H.R. 4515 would not breach the Appropriations Committee's budget authority allocation, it does violate the allocation made to some of its subcommittees. Section 302(f) of the Budget Act prohibits the consideration of legislation if it violates the Appropriate Committee's subdivision and so the waiver is necessary in order for H.R. 4515 to be considered.

The rule also waives clause 2(L)(3)(B) of rule 11 against consideration of the bill. This provision of the House rules requires each committee to include in its report on any bill a comparison of the spending levels in the bill to the subcommittee budget authority allocations.

The rule waives clauses 2 and 6 of rule XXI against the bill. Clause 2 of rule XXI prohibits the inclusion of legislation and unauthorized appropriations in any general appropriations bill. H.R. 4515 contains a number of such provisions which are outlined in the committee's report on the bill.

Clause 6 prohibits reappropriations in a general appropriations bill. A number of the provisions of the bill contain transfers of funds previously appropriated.

The rule strikes out two provisions of the bill. The first provision pertains to modifications of the Farmland Conservation Reserve Program, established by the 1985 farm bill. The other provision stricken by the rule relates to standards and funds for congressional mailings.

The rule waives points of order to permit consideration of seven amendments. Each of these amendments must be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 14, 1986, by its author.

Finally, the rule provides that, if both the joint resolution on Central America and the urgent supplemental appropriations bill are passed by the House, the text of the joint resolution is to be added to H.R. 4515, and the joint resolution itself will be laid on the table.

Mr. Speaker, let me summarize briefly the procedural situation made in order by this rule.

First, it will be in order to consider the joint resolution on aid to the Contras. This will contain only the text of Senate Joint Resolution 283, the administration's proposal.

There will be 2 hours of general debate on the joint resolution after which only three amendments may be offered which will be considered in the following order:

First, an amendment in the nature of a substitute by Mr. HAMILTON;

Second, an amendment by Representative MCCURDY, which may be offered only if the Hamilton amendment is defeated;

Third, an amendment by Representative MRAZEK, which also may be offered only if the Hamilton amendment fails.

Each of these amendments will be debated for up to 2 hours. There will be one-half hour more of general debate after the conclusion of deliberation on the amendments and before the vote on final passage.

After consideration of the joint resolution, we will move to consideration of the supplemental appropriations bill. After the final vote on the supplemental, if both the joint resolution and the supplemental pass they will be joined and sent to the other body.

Mr. Speaker, we have before us two measures of utmost importance to this House and Nation. It is fitting, I believe, that we consider them together.

At bottom, what we debate today, and the rest of this week is the issue of our Nation's priorities.

Mr. Speaker, in H.R. 4515, we have urgent supplemental appropriations for the most pressing problems this Nation faces.

Across this Nation, farmers are facing the threat of bankruptcy and ruin. This legislation will restore funds for the Farmers Home Administration to provide housing in our rural areas. It also recommends that the administration use its authority to defer principal and interest payments and provide loans for farmers who are suffering from circumstances beyond their control.

Much of our Nation has been devastated by floods causing hundreds of millions of dollars in property damage, and threatening erosion to valuable farm land. This legislation provides emergency flood relief, and for flood control.

The bill provides funds for veterans compensation, and pension benefits. Funds for veterans job training and readjustment counseling.

It provides funds for feeding programs for women, infants and children in this country who otherwise would go without adequate nutrition.

It restores funds for economic development assistance in our Nation's cities and towns. For shelters for our homeless who haunt our Nation's streets.

And it makes available immediate funds to strengthen our Embassies throughout the world against the threat of terrorism. In the midst of the current crisis in Libya, who can deny that we urgently need these funds to protect American lives abroad?

Yet, the President has told us he will veto this bill. And because he wants to veto this bill, he wants us to consider separately the question of providing $100 million in aid to the Contras.

Mr. Speaker, when we vote on this rule today, we must face up to the true cost of the war in Nicaragua. The President has told us that $100 million is a small price to pay, a limited investment in Central America. But he has not told us that the true cost of the war in the last 5 years has totalled over $1 billion.

Will we allow the administration to spend a billion dollars in a war against Nicaragua, while allowing our family farmers to face bankruptcy and ruin?

Will we allow the administration to send $10,000 in additional aid to every single Contra, while women, infants, and children in this country suffer from poor nutrition?

Will we allow the people of this Nation who have paid for a billion dollar war in Central America, watch their own homes and savings of a lifetime be washed away with no hope of financial recovery?

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of this rule. The procedure before us is an unsual one, unusual in the extent to which, in this rule, we have bent over backward to provide an opportunity for the administration's position on Contra aid to be presented to the House again.

Three of the relevant committees have already voted their disapproval for the President's Contra request this year. This joint resolution could not reach the floor independently.

By connecting this resolution to the supplemental, we have taken an extraordinary step to ensure Contra aid will be considered on the first possible legislative vehicle.

Mr. Speaker, this is a fair rule. It allows for an opportunity to debate a range of options on our policy in Central America, and it allows this body to face what the President prefers to hide—the true cost to the American people of the Contra war.

□ 1645

Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes, for purposes of debate only, to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me the customary 30 minutes.

Well, I guess I should say, "Thank you very much," but instead, I will say, "There you go again."

You call this rule fair? I really have to question the truth of an allegation that this is a fair rule. In certainly is not. It is the most convoluted process that goes beyond the bounds of anything I have ever seen from the Rules Committee in the 18 years I have been around here, not to mention the fact that it involves foreign policy that this process is being used.

Now, I know that you might say, "I have heard you say that before, that this process is worse than any I have ever seen before."

Incredibly, they keep getting worse. I wonder where it will end. I really worry about the institution when we have a process devised like this one, which is a very thinly veiled effort to thwart the will of the House.

It is clear that the votes are here now to vote for aid for the Contras in Nicaragua. So realizing that the votes are here in the whole House coming from both sides of the aisle. We have this process that will, at the very least, delay a conclusion for probably a minimum of 30 days if it is coupled to the supplemental appropriation bill, goes across to the Senate, they act, and then it goes to conference. And probably, based on what I see and what I hear about this urgent supplemental appropriation, it will be vetoed in the end anyway. So, a month, or 6 weeks, or 2 months from now we will be back here with no urgent supplemental, assuming it is an urgent supplemental, and of course no aid having reached the Contras, even if the House and the Senate will have voted for it.

I repeat, this goes beyond the bounds of anything I have ever seen before.

Let us talk about the rule. I do not want to repeat everything that the gentleman from Michigan has already said. We know the resolution brings this process to the floor and the time that is allocated, but there are a couple really interesting points that maybe have not been touched on that I would like to talk about.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 415 makes in order H.R. 4515, making urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986. This rule provides for the consideration of two measures, a joint resolution relating to Central America and the urgent supplemental. If both the joint resolution and H.R. 4515 pass the House, the Contra aid resolution is automatically included in the supplemental.

The Contra aid resolution is subject to 2 hours of general debate to be equally divided between a proponent and an opponent. It makes in order three amendments which are not subject to amendments: Two hours of debate on an amendment in the nature of a substitute by Representative HAMILTON; 2 hours of debate on a McCurdy amendment if the Hamilton substitute is defeated; 2 hours of debate on a Mrazek amendment if the Hamilton substitue is defeated.

An additional 30 minutes of debate is provided at the end of the amendment process, divided equally between a proponent and an opponent. Finally, the rule provides for one motion to commit, without instructions. At the conclusion of the consideration of the Contra aid resolution that House will proceed with the consideration of H.R. 4515, the urgent supplemental appropriations.

Mr. Speaker, the rule waives two points of order against consideration of the bill: section 302(f) of the Congressional Budget Act and clause 2(l)(3)(B) of rule 11. Section 302(f) of the Budget Act prohibits consideration of a bill which exceeds a committee's section 302(b) allocation of budget authority under the most recent budget resolution. Since several Appropriations subcommittees have already exceeded 302(b) allocations, the waiver is necessary to permit consideration of the bill. The Budget Committee chairman has indicated that a majority of the committee members support the waiver.

I think this is a serious violation of Gramm-Rudman that should not be taken lightly.

The rule also waives clauses 2 and 6 of rule 21 which prohibit legislative and unauthorized provisions, and transfers in appropriations bills. In recent times, we have been specifying in rules by page and line numbers which provisions were given protection. In this rule, we don't do that; we simply waive clauses 2 and 6 against the entire bill. The rule leaves it to you to find out just how many legislative provisions are hidden away in here.

To give you some idea of how much is being protected, I call your attention to pages 44–52 of the committee report in which all the legislative provisions and transfers are listed which require these waivers. This comes to 208 of the bill's 838 lines or 25 percent. It is no wonder the rule avoids telling us about all the offensive provisions being protected. We might begin to take offense and accuse the Appropriations Committee of usurping the powers of other committees. But that would hardly be fair.

Most of these authorization provisions have been given a wink and a nod by the authorizing chairmen.

To compound this problem the rule also waives clause 2 against the consideration of seven amendments specified in the rule. These include the following: First, a Schroeder amendment that deals with nuclear testing; second, a Hammerschmidt amendment of dairy indemnity; third, an amendment by Mr. MICA regarding Embassy security; fourth, a Fauntroy amendment on Haiti aid; fifth, a Fazio amendment on sale of Federal power, sixth, an amendment by Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI on the hospital regulations; and seventh, a Bosco "Buy American" amendment for oil rigs.

Finally, the rule automatically strikes the sections dealing with conservation reserve programs and congressional mailings.

Mr. Speaker, this urgent supplemental started out as a simple little disaster relief bill and ended up more disaster than relief, with the taxpayer picking up the bill.

Mr. Speaker, the rule before us is one of the most blatantly cynical and transparently political I have seen in all my years, and I'll grant you I've seen some doozies. But I have to hand it to the draftsmen who charted this procedural path—they've managed to come up with the most roundabout route to nowhere one could imagine. But while I might give the drafters of this rule an A for creativity, I would give them an F when it comes to fairness and fundamental decency. This rule is an insult to the House as an institution and the Members individually.

Who is going to be fooled by a rule that says, "yes," you can consider the issue of Contra aid in a separate resoluton; but, when you finish with the supplemental, a clerk will automatically insert that Contra aid language in the supplemental bill?

There you go again!

You might say this process is fair, and I ask is that the truth?

Why no, this convoluted process will delay and be defeated by veto.

And you say defeat the supplemental.

This goes beyond the bounds of anything I've seen.

I can't for the life of me understand how that either keeps faith with commitments made to permit separate consideration of the Contra aid issue or demands made for such a clean vote. It was no secret from the outset that the supplemental was veto bait with all the goodies weighing it down. How could anyone truly interested in getting immediate assistance to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua buy-off on a procedure that will tie such aid to a bill that will be delayed at best and vetoed at worst?

This rule is a little like offering the Pony Express rider a free ride on a train you know is going to be derailed: you ain't really doing him any favors.

And what about the favors that are being done within the Contra aid portion of the rule? Under this rule, if the Hamilton substitute, which denies all aid, is adopted, the ball game is over: there will be no separate votes on MCCURDY, MRAZEK, of MICHEL. Whatever happened to the king-of-the mountain approach that we had in last year's supplemental rule? So much for fairness, decency, and civility.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to say a few words about section 201 of the supplemental which purports to take away a good part of the President's deferral authority. I say "purports" because a legal memorandum from the American Law Division of the Congressional Research Service indicates that the actual effect of this provision is to simply eliminate the reporting of deferrals, and not the deferral authority itself.

I can understand the frustration of some of my colleagues over some recent deferrals, and I would agree that some reforms may be in order. But, why, at a time we are trying to meet rigid new deficit reduction requirements, would anyone want to strip the President of the ability to make prudent delays in spending that could ultimately save us billions of dollars? The meat-axe approach taken by section 201 not only contributes to the prospects of a veto, but of higher deficits as well? Is this House that hot to sequester?

Our distinguished Republican leader testified before the Rules Committee against this provision and urged that we take a more deliberate look at the issue in the committees of jurisdiction—Rules and Government Operations. But while the Rules Committee raised a great fuss over the franking rule included in the bill, and took that out in this rule, it let this major deferral repealer stay in with a wink and a nod. It even denied our Republican leader a chance to offer an alternative which would cap policy alternatives at $5 billion a year.

Mr. Speaker, for all these reasons, I urge my colleagues to vote "no" on the previous question so that I can offer a substitute rule which will permanently decouple the Contra aid resolution from the supplemental, guarantee separate votes on the McCurdy and Mrazek amendments and the Michel and Hamilton substitutes in that order, ala king-of-the-mountain, and permit consideration of the Michel deferral alternative in the supplemental.

Mr. Speaker, let us cut the games being played by this rule and adopt a serious substitute that is fair to the Members of this House, fair to the President, fair to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua, and fair to the American people. We're not fooling anyone by this "convoluted process that is designed to self-destruct." Let's face the Contra aid and supplemental appropriations issues involved, fairly, squarely and separately. Vote "no" on the previous question and then "yes" on the substitute rule I will offer. This is the only way to do credit to this House and address the vital international security interests and responsibilities tied to this rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to our distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the previous question and to the rule. I wish I could drag out the familiar angry words and phrases to describe the way the majority has acted in rolling this great, bursting barrel of rancid pork onto the floor of the House, but my heart would not be in it. I am sick of complaining about unfairness and my colleagues are sick of hearing it.

The majority has proved once again that old saying about the effect of absolute power. Let me try to put this process in perspective, and before dealing with the Contra-aid issue, let me first comment on the second part of the proposition having to do with the appropriation process.

My colleagues know and I know that the supplemental appropriation is so overbudget, so hung with baubles, bangles, and beads, that it is a wonder it does not fall of its own weight. The administration, the President's senior advisers, would recommend veto of H.R. 4515 in its present form. Accordingly, the administration believes that this bill is a totally inappropriate, ill-advised vehicle for the urgent matter of funding for the Nicaraguan freedom fighters. I will include that communication in my remarks.

The communication is as follows:

STATEMENT OF ADMINISTRATION POLICY, APRIL 15, 1986

H.R. 4515, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1986 (WHITTEN, MISSISSIPPI)

The President's senior advisors would recommend veto of H.R. 4515 in its present form. Accordingly, the administration believes that this bill is a totally inappropriate and ill-advised vehicle for the urgent matter of funding for the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters.

There has not been so much pork seen in one place since the last "Porky Pig" film festival. As the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] so ably pointed out, this bill would take away the President's spending deferral authority, thereby providing yet another tool with which to break open the locks of the National Treasury.

The power to defer is one of the essential tools we have to keep spending under control. If my memory serves me correctly, over $100 billion has been saved through the deferral process since 1975 alone. One hundred billion bucks through that process, with Congress having overturned only 17 percent of the deferrals submitted by the President.

It is bad enough that the Committee on Rules would allow elimination of the deferral power through ill-considered language on an appropriation bill; it is even worse that the Committee on Rules would not allow any alternatives to the appropriation language to even be considered.

I have an amendment, as the gentleman pointed out, that would retain the deferral power with new limitations. If major changes in the Budget Act are to be considered here, then certainly an amendment of this sort ought to be allowed.

Beyond deferrals and badly written bills, the Members of this body ought to share considerable concern over the integrity of this institution. We are making a mockery of our rules. They are rewritten daily, sometimes hourly, in order to satisfy the political whims of a select few and powerful few around here. If our procedures have no integrity, the House has none; and if the House has none, neither do we.

But these features are not the worst part of the process. No; that prize goes to the way in which the majority leadership has housed the issue of Contra aid in the pork palace. My colleagues know and I know that if we got a clean up-or-down vote on Contra aid, the President's position would prevail.

Bear in mind when we get to this procedure what this rule makes in order. First of all, we are out there standing free with our proposition. We have to take off an amendment by Barnes-Hamilton, beat it down; take on an amendment by MCCURDY, beat it down; take on an amendment or substitute by MRAZEK, beat it down; and then if we are still standing, we get married up with this monstrous supplemental appropriation bill, and with all the goodies in it and projects for districts and all the rest, and I have to go to every one of my men, plus hopefully a select few over here, to make a majority and say, "Vote down those things which you want just to keep us free-standing up there."

We know, as I said earlier, that appropriation bill is doomed to failure and it is going to be vetoed, and what has been done here by this procedure is kill aid to the Contras. Make no mistake about it. And those of you who join in this doggone cabal are just as guilty of playing a part in that charade.

In doing this, the majority leadership has reached the point of no return on the road to dangerously irresponsible manipulation of foreign policy. The majority leadership has set itself up as an alternative government, frankly, complete with its own foreign policy which it seeks to force upon the President and the people through parliamentary maneuverings.

Genuine opposition to a Presidential proposal is a legitimate part of our democratic process, but when that opposition is afraid to come out in the open and hides behind legislative technicalities, it trivializes debate over foreign policy. The Democratic Party has a great tradition of making tough foreign-policy decisions. Harry Truman did not flinch or hide behind legislative trickery to avoid his duty in aiding Greece. He was criticized, and roundly so, but he did what was right, and he was a great Democrat.

That great Democratic Party tradition is being thrown into the rubbish bin of history by this deplorable piece of cut, slick, aren't-we-clever legislative trickery. To the Democrats who remember the great foreign policy tradition of their party and want to reclaim it, I say join with us in voting down the previous question and defeating this rule. I ask you to give the President a fair chance and give this great institution and, yes, your party, something to be proud of.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat baffled by the intensity of the opposition to this rule, and I will tell my colleagues why. Everyone on that side of the aisle understands that we voted last year to provide a special vote on the Contra aid issue when we voted the so-called $27 million.

The President submitted his request, it came up before the House, and it was defeated. It was defeated. There were no obligations to provide another vehicle. There were no obligations to provide other accelerated procedures. But the Speaker, in fairness to the administration, said on the next vehicle that moves through this House, that will become law—and I disagree with the gentleman from Illinois; he knows that the supplemental is going to become law because there are too many important issues in this thing that the President will not veto—the Speaker said, in all fairness, that he would give the opponents who had alternatives a chance.

Quite frankly, there was a hue and a cry from many on my side of the aisle who said, "Why are you giving them another chance? Let them go through the regular legislative process, the committees, the Committee on Rules, and then to the House floor." But the Speaker said, "Let us be fair."

So we went up to the Committee on Rules and we allow the gentleman from Oklahoma, who has an alternative, we allow the gentleman from Illinois, who has an alternative, and we allow the gentleman from Indiana, who has an alternative, to express their will in this first part of the supplemental.

In addition, we separated out the Contra aid from the supplemental appropriation. We think that is fair, and I think the Members of this body will respond that this rule is a fair one.

The gentleman from Illinois suggests, in the great tradition of the Democratic Party, that we stand with Harry Truman. I would point out to the gentleman from Illinois that when Harry Truman involved himself in the Marshall plan and the containment doctrine, he had the American people with him. You do not have the American people with you on this issue.

The latest polls today that came out in the gentleman's own State, the Chicago Tribune, pointed out by a 2-to-1 majority the American people oppose this administration in aiding militarily the Contras in Nicaragua. And those same findings were found in the New York Times poll.

□ 1710

There is a distinct difference between what Harry Truman did and what you are trying to do here in this bill.

Mr. MICHEL. Harry Truman did not legislate by a public opinion poll.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I ask for regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has the time. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] yield to the distinguished minority leader?

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me on a point he just made a moment ago?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. I appreciate the gentleman yielding. I would like to make the point that the rule does not make an amendment in order by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] not by name. It makes in order a House joint resolution.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. The base resolution is the same as that of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LOTT. He was not given an opportunity.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. I correct myself. The gentleman's base resolution is the same as the gentleman proposed the last time.

Mr. LOTT. He did not have an opportunity under the rules to offer the Michel amendment. It is a House joint resolution which was put in the RECORD by a Democrat.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. The gentleman had ample opportunity to offer that in the Rules Committee, ample opportunity.

Mr. LOTT. Ample opportunity to what?

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. To offer the gentleman's position, the bill as passed by the Senate, and the gentleman from Illinois, and the gentleman speaking now had ample opportunity in the Rules Committee to offer that. They refused to do that.

Mr. LOTT. As a matter of fact, this gentleman came to the Rules Committee in an executive session, whatever that was, and asked to make sure that we were going to have to print it in the RECORD with the assumption that we would have an opportunity for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] to put it in the RECORD. But when the rule was brought out from the executive committee, fait accomplie, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] did not have an opportunity.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. If he would like to have had the opportunity, we would like to have had the gentleman express an interest in doing that, and I believe we would have allowed the gentleman to have offered that. He had the opportunity to offer it. He refused to exercise that opportunity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] has 19 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY].

Mr. MCCURDY. Mr. Speaker, last month I voted against House Joint Resolution 540 because I did not believe that it sufficiently addressed the concerns of a number of Members on both sides of the aisle who have been working to develop a bipartisan policy with respect to Central America.

Our group was offered the opportunity to propose an alternative to the President's plan following the Easter recess. We will have that opportunity under the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules that is now before the House, and I will support the previous question and vote for the committee rule.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume just to clarify one other thing, and then I yield to my friend from California.

Before we passed the rule out of the Rules Committee, the gentleman from Illinois' staff was specifically asked if they wanted the gentleman from Illinois to offer the amendment, and they refused.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. COELHO].

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the rule and the previous question on the rule.

Let's be clear about one thing: The issue in the debate today is not fairness, because this rule is very fair.

It's fair because it provides an opportunity for the House to consider a full range of alternatives for United States policy in Nicaragua.

This rule is fair because it allows the House to vote separately on United States policy in Nicaragua and the supplemental, allowing either of them to go forward if the other is defeated.

So the issue is not fairness. On the contrary, it's this: The Republicans in the White House and in this House want to be able to veto the farm aid in the supplemental. They want to fund the Contras, but not the combines.

The issue is this: The administration wants to terminate the Farmers Home Administration while rushing another hundred million to the billion dollar war in Nicaragua.

The issue is this: The supplemental mandates the Secretary of Agriculture to provide loans at a level to give farmers a fair rate of return.

And it encourages the administration to use its existing authority to defer principal and interest payments at this critical time in Central America—that is, from Minnesota to Texas, and everyplace in between.

Mr. Speaker, it's ironic that today, tax day, the administration is trying to veto the supplemental, thereby vetoing thousands of family farmers across the country.

These are people who struggle every year to pay their fair share in taxes, and who are struggling today for their dignity and their future. Yet, at the same time, the President has no trouble giving $10,000 in taxpayer funds to every single Contra fighting in Nicaragua, whether they're running drugs or not.

In short, this administration's priorities are out of whack, and the American people know it. And it's not just farm aid they're upset about: The supplemental restores funding for housing, education, mass transit, health research, and other vital programs.

It's time for the House to send a message to the administration, and this rule will give us all a chance to express our own budget priorities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, earlier today the President said he needed Contra aid to help him fight Qadhafi. But in his speech last night his justification for military action was that he'd exhausted all methods of diplomacy toward Libya. And he was right.

But of course in Nicaragua, Mr. Reagan refuses to negotiate. So the Libyan comparison is wrong, and the American people understand the President's lack of consistency.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume for just a couple of brief points.

First of all, I want to emphasize that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY] who may have left the Chamber, did say in the Rules Committee that he definitely thought that the two bills should be separate, that they should not be coupled together. Now he says he will support the rule, even though it clearly is not what he expressed a desire to have when he came before the Rules Committee.

As far as what a staff member said, you know, there you go again. I mean, have we gotten to the point where we do not even give the Republican leader of the House the opportunity to speak for himself?

The information I have is that the staff did not say he did not want to have that opportunity. But you would think on something this important that the Republican leader would have had a chance to say for himself whether or not he would have liked to have had an opportunity to put that amendment in the RECORD.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. If it was so important, why did not the minority leader come himself and ask for it?

Mr. LOTT. He did not think that the process deserved the type of time and credit that he would be responsible for in coming up to the Rules Committee and ask for this to be in order; and because he thought it would be a very matter-of-fact thing that it would be the Michel amendment to be offered or not to be offered under the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD].

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, at the outset, I want to associate myself with the excellent remarks by the minority leader as well as the minority whip opposing this rule.

Mr. Speaker, this proposed rule, in its present form, should be rejected by the House in light of its bizarre and unjustified treatment of Senate Joint Resolution 283, which would provide assistance to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters.

The joint resolution involves a critical national security and foreign policy issue which should NOT be held hostage in a transparent partisan attempt to "veto proof" H.R. 4515.

That bill is a "Christmas tree" supplemental appropriation which contains a grab bag of provisions, some good and some of highly questionable value.

I believe the House is ready to act with appropriate dispatch on the pressing Contra aid matter. There is no justification for this kind of rule.

It will force the House to purposely slow the progress of Senate Joint Resolution 283 to a snail's pace by retroactively attaching it to H.R. 4515 or alternatively, to defeat that urgent supplemental appropriations bill in order to send the resolution back to the Senate cleanly in the timely fashion which that critical joint resolution deserves.

Members who vote for this rule will be responsible for needlessly forcing a Hobson's choice on the House. Unless we defeat H.R. 4515, we will give the Sandinista regime more time to annihilate its democratic opposition before effective aid can be sent to the Freedom Fighters.

Let's face it, the Sandinistas are playing stall ball, and their recent behavior at the latest round of Contadora talks in Panama revealed how insincere they are about bringing genuine and lasting peace to Central America. They flatly rejected a timetable and deadline for concluding negotiations that was proposed by their Central American democratic neighbors. Particularly noteworthy is the fact that this proposal was also endorsed by the Contadora and support group nations.

Oscar Arias, the President-Elect of Costa Rica, hit the nail on the head when he observed that—

> In Panama the true situation was made very clear. Twelve Latin American Foreign Ministers, among them the Foreign Ministers of four Central American countries, supported the prompt signing of the [Contadora draft of September 1984 with agreed-upon modifications] in accordance with international opinion. Only Nicaragua was opposed, thus demonstrating once again that it has neither an interest in, nor the will for, peace in Central America.

And let's not forget the Holy Week incursion by Sandinista forces into Honduras. That was not just another border skirmish. In fact, this was a blatant violation of Honduran sovereignty and a dramatic illustration of Sandinista intentions to continue to subvert and militarily intimidate its democratic neighbors.

I urge the Members to vote no on this pending rule. An issue of this magnitude must be considered strictly on its own merits. Resorting to clever parliamentarian tactics to frustrate the will of the majority is simply not fair.

In short, Mr. Speaker, we deserve a straight up or down vote on this important question. The democratic leadership knows Contra aid would prevail.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have to break into this discussion of a much more fundamental, important debate on foreign policy to bring up a rather mundane but difficult issue for the House of Representatives to deal with, in fact, for the entire Congress to deal with.

Most of the Members are well aware of the fact that sometime this spring, May or June, we are going to run out of funds to respond to our constituents' mail. We are also going to, in effect, have no funds left for the privilege of using the frank for any purpose.

But I want to underscore it is not simply for legislative newsletters. It is for responding to the burgeoning, increasing amount of mail that we get from our constituents. Yes, we have increased the appropriations on a regular basis, but the incoming mail has been increased by an overwhelming margin. Since 1972, we have had a 1,700-percent increase in our incoming mail while our outgoing franked mail has gone up by only 300 percent. But we need the money to pay the bill.

We recognized that problem last year. It is not a surprise to us, those of us who pay attention to the legislative branch bill.

The Speaker appointed a bipartisan, ad hoc committee of Members who have primary responsibility on this matter from both sides of the aisle, and we had worked out what we thought was the proper approach; funding a supplemental of some $42 million, and at the same time, projecting savings as a result of a variety of reforms recommended by this ad hoc committee to the tune of over $8 million, and through the voluntary restraint of a number of Members cutting back perhaps another $16 million between now and the end of the fiscal year.

These restrictions include the following:

Proviso 1: Amends clause 1 of rule 46 by requiring that first-class mail be sent at the lowest rate practicable. This primarily means using 9-digit zip codes and/or presorting wherever practicable. This proviso also requires that non-time-sensitive mail such as calendars and yearbooks are sent at class 3 or 4 rates;

Proviso 2: Amends clause 2 of rule 46—as of May 1, 1986—to reduce from 6 to 4 the number of districtwide, 3d class, postal-patron mailings;

Proviso 3: Amends clause 3 of rule 46 to require that all mass mailings—500 or more pieces, but not those in response to incoming communications—be submitted to the Franking Commission for an advisory opinion. The purpose here is to get advice on lowest cost method and to provide data on mail volumes;

Proviso 4: A technical correction to clause 4 of the rule;

Proviso 5: A technical correction to clause 5 of the rule;

Proviso 6: For the period of May 1, 1986 through December 31, 1986, a freestanding provision of law, the number of town meeting notices is set at one per address in the congressional district. All additional notices will count against the new limit of four districtwide postal patron mailings, except that notices may be included in regular newsletters without counting against the limitation;

Proviso 7: For the period May 1, 1986, through September 30, 1986—a freestanding provision of law—limits the number of pieces of first-class franked mail not sent in response to an inquiry or request to the total number of addresses in the congressional district.

But it became obvious that this was not going to be an easy matter for us to deal with. Certain individuals indicated they wished to make this a political debate on the floor, and so it is possible to say that in supporting this rule, as I do for a variety of reasons, we will also be rejecting at this time any additional funding for the franking privilege.

I hope that we can continue to work in the bipartisan manner that has brought us to the proposal that was included by the Appropriations Committee in this bill. I hope it will be possible for us to avoid hitting the wall with the Postal Service. I hope we will be responsible and mature and bipartisan, as well as reaching a bicameral solution in solving this problem because it impacts on every one of the Members of this body and the other body, too.

I look forward to having that opportunity sometime in the future. But for today, it appears we do not have the resolve to move forward.

I would simply want to underscore for those concerned about the future that we do not know whether the funds will be available later on. We do not know whether the Postal Service will simply refuse to process our correspondence. We do not know whether we will have to pay this bill in a future fiscal year, or perhaps it will be defined away by some legal opinion.

But the only responsible way is for us to deal with it in the context of this fiscal year's appropriation, and I hope we will have the courage to do so at the proper time. But for now, I urge support for the rule and for the elimination of this provision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will announce that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] has 11½ minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP].

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the rule on the urgent supplemental appropriations bill.

The rule does not give the Members of the House a fair procedure under which to consider the critical issue of aid to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance. In order for those of us who support the President to prevail, we have to defeat three separate nonamendable amendments. Then, if we win on the substance, the rule requires that the victory be taken away by attaching the Nicaraguan provision to the Urgent Supplemental Appropriations Act. Does this sound like a fair rule to assist the House in the disposition of its legislative responsibilities?

The rule before us is procedurally rigged so that if the House supports the President's position on Nicaragua, the legislative provisions will only go forward as a rider on a dead bill.

I urge my colleagues to vote to defeat the rule. That is the only way we can get a fair procedure for consideration of the Nicaragua issue.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The call was taken by electronic device, and the following Members responded to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this rollcall, 400 Members have recorded their presence by electronic device, a quorum.

Under the rule, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4515, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1986, AND PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF A JOINT RESOLUTION RELATING TO CENTRAL AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The chair will state that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] has 11½ minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has 9½ minutes remaining.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS].

Mr. BROOKS. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the rule before the House. Adoption of this rule is most important because it will enable this body to take expeditious action to preserve congressional prerogatives by terminating the absolute line item veto that the President has grabbed by abusing the judicially crippled deferral mechanism in the Impoundment Control Act. While I generally oppose allowing legislation in appropriations bills, I support the waiver of points of order against section 201 because I think we have an emergency situation facing us with which we must deal immediately.

Only if Congress takes away the statutory vehicle that the President is abusing will we be able to force him to sit down and work out a new method of equitably allowing Congress and the Executive to share in the Federal spending process. I strongly urge that we adopt this rule so that steps can be taken immediately to begin this negotiating process.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my strong opposition to House Resolution 415. This rule contains just about every element you'd want to avoid if you were looking for a clean rule to govern debate on a bill requesting new spending.

A good rule wouldn't tie the issue of Contra funding to new spending. A good rule wouldn't contain waivers allowing subcommittee or program ceilings to be breached. A good rule would not allow substantive legislative language in an appropriation bill. And finally a good rule would not allow nongermane, legislative amendments and protect them with waivers from points of order.

Mr. Speaker, last week as the Rules Committee considered House Resolution 415, I submitted a letter to the committee, signed by 70 of our colleagues, urging a rule without waivers that would protect substantive legislative language from points of order. Our letter also asked the Rules Committee to refuse to grant a rule until the Appropriations Committee reported out a bill containing no net new spending.

This last point—no net new spending—is the key. We all know how serious the deficit is, and we all know that every new dollar we spend is just another dollar of debt that we are continually piling on the backs of our children. Does this mean that the Government of the United States cannot initiate any new programs that the Congress deems vital? Not at all.

It simply means that we must embrace the concept of zero sum spending in supplemental appropriation bills. If we need to spend money on a new project, fine, let's do that. But let's take the money from elsewhere in the budget, and not get it from new borrowing or new taxing.

Those of us who signed the letter felt there was ample precedent, even within this supplemental appropriation, to support the concept of zero-sum funding. I personally believe that many items in this spending bill are very important. Recent events in the Mediterranean illustrate the need for the antiterrorism provisions, for instance. And while I disagree with the source of funds for this transfer, I applaud the Appropriation Committee for adopting the concept of zero-sum spending in this instance. There are other examples in this bill where money is transferred from one account to another to reflect changing priorities.

Let me mention two particular points that concern me. Both are legislative in nature, and both would not be in order if this rule did not protect them from points of order.

H.R. 4515 contains legislative language repealing a portion of the Budget and Impoundment Control Act governing the President's power to defer spending. Deferrals are carefully governed under the Budget Act. They are a valuable budgetary tool that have helped us achieve some $65 billion in savings since their creation. A supplemental appropriation bill is not the place to debate and vote on such a major budgetary issue, and I strongly object to waivers in this bill which protect this extraneous legislative provision.

Representative FAZIO will also offer an amendment prohibiting any further study or consideration of proposals to privatize Federal power marketing agencies. An urgent supplemental appropriation is no place to make policy. Whether you agree that privatization is a viable alternative or not, everyone agrees that it represents a major policy shift. Clearly such a change in policy cannot be effectively considered in a half-hour debate over the supplemental which is already overloaded with major policy issues. Privatization deserves a thorough and spirited debate, not a gag order.

For the sake of fiscal responsibility and responsible government, I strongly urge my colleagues to defeat this rule.

□ 1750

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I do have additional requests for time, but I would like to inquire of the Chair how much time we have remaining on each side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has 7 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], the distinguished majority whip.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think it might be useful for us to focus for a bit on what would be the normal course in considering such a matter as the Contra aid issue. The House took action and voted on the issue a month ago, exactly as requested by the administration, but rejected that proposal. The normal course of action to revisit this matter under the circumstances would require the introduction of legislation, its referral to committee, and the holding of hearings. Based upon the previous references to the committees, it would have been referred to four committees of the House of Representatives, three of which reported adversely on it on the last occasion.

Instead of that, Mr. Speaker, there was a commitment made by the Speaker of the House to an extraordinary opportunity, despite all the existing rules of the House and its earlier defeat, to bring this matter up again and to bring it up specifically as an amendment to the supplemental appropriation bill by special rule waiving the necessary points of order.

After the Speaker made this a commitment, I heard no complaints publicly mentioned that this was unfair. Indeed, I believe it was viewed by most Members for what it was, an extraordinary and unusual opportunity to revisit an issue that had already been decided.

Now the rule that comes before the House this afternoon goes even beyond that and allows for separate consideration of the so-called Contra aid issue, separate from the supplemental appropriation, again a matter that benefits those who want to separate out this issue. Yet we hear complaints that it is not precisely as those who favor a particular point of view would like to have the rule structured.

After giving a commitment that the rules and procedures of the House would be bypassed to permit an expedited reconsideration of this issue, within scarcely a month's time, after providing an opportunity for it to be considered under a rule which separates it from the pending business as an amendment, and after offering a way for those who take any position on this issue that they wish to reflect that position, we are told that it is unfair.

I think that the Speaker and the House have been presented by the Committee on Rules with the fairest and most generous opportunity to consider this issue again, and the response of the House should be to recognize that fairness and equity by voting the previous question and adopting the rule. Then may the House decide as it wishes on the underlying issue so important in the consideration of this country's future foreign policy.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I could not disagree with my good friend, the gentleman from Washington, TOM FOLEY, more. The gentleman is a good man and usually right, occasionally wrong; on this issue, I think the gentleman is wrong.

I ask you to vote against the rule, vote against the motion for the previous question. We cannot hide on this issue.

The rule deliberately unites the questions of spending and fiscal policy, the supplemental appropriations bill, with the fundamental issue in American foreign policy today, Central America. What are we willing to risk? What are we willing to stand for? Which friends will we help? That is the issue.

The gentleman from California, VIC FAZIO, said it earlier today in the debate, perhaps inadvertently. The gentleman got up in the middle of the debate and, being a good man, the gentleman told it like it was. The gentleman said, "I hate to get in the middle of this fundamental, basic American foreign policy issue about questions on supplemental."

□ 1800

That is what the rule does. We can work our will as a nation and as a body and end up having united on the final vote questions of the supplemental and questions of support to the Contras.

We deserve better than this. Vote against the previous question. Vote against the rule. Remember, as one Member of the House, a colleague of mine, asked me before I spoke today, "Do you think the American people understand the question of the rule?"

No, they do not. But we do. Every man and woman in this House knows what is at stake. Win or lose, right or wrong, keep the issue of the Contras separate. Let us debate it, dissect it, and I hope we stand for something.

And I will say this to my Democrats: I am proud to be a Democrat, but at this moment the party of the donkey is looking an awful lot like the party of the ostrich.

Let us beat the rule.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of our time to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I guess the heavy hitter who is going to end the debate on your side is the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT]. So I am going to listen carefully during his remarks, because he is quoted in the newspaper of April 9, in an address at the National Press Club, and he said:

> Let us be very clear about the real threat in Latin America. Hopelessness, spawned by hunger, illiteracy, disease and debt—that's the real malignancy.

Now, he did not say "that's a real malignancy." He said "that's the real malignancy."

Now, if that is so, I want Mr. WRIGHT to explain, at least to me—and I am an underachiever—why President Carter halted aid to the Sandinista government. If it was hunger, if it was poverty, why did President Carter cut off the millions of dollars that I voted for to assist that country? I will be interested in the gentleman's explanation.

Now, the meanest argument against foreign aid has been made, and that is: We have people at home who need this money, why do you send it overseas?

I have heard that argument for 12 years. And I will tell you, it is tough to sell foreign aid at home.

"Why feed Ethiopians, even though they are hungry? They are way over there. We need better transit and we need food at home." I have heard that argument. It is a mean argument. It is a good one, but it is a mean one. And usually it is made by right-wing reactionaries, not the party of compassion.

Now, in addition, as far as polls are concerned, I will say to my dear friend from Michigan that if Jesus Christ had taken a poll in Jerusalem, he would never have preached the Gospel. You know that and I know that.

Now, we are actors in a farce today, unwilling and unwitting, but this script was written by the Rules Committee, produced by the Democratic leadership. And "farce" is really too mild a word. "Fraud" would be more descriptive, because it pretends to give us a second bite at the apple, a vote on Contra aid, but it weighs it down with a millstone that is of grotesque proportions. We are going to vote on a sensitive life and death issue and combine it with a wild spending bill.

Now, I have no quarrel with that. I agree with Mr. FOLEY, we had our opportunity, we had a free-standing vote, and we blew it. Sixteen of our people, five of them ranking Members, did not vote with the President. They voted with you.

Now, some of the conservative Democrats may feel a little cynical. They may feel they have been had because they put their flowers at the altar of the Democratic leadership, thinking they would get another crack at it, but they are not going to get another crack at it. They find themselves standing on two stools, the freedom fighters and the Democratic leadership, and they are going to soon learn what a political hernia feels like.

What you are doing, your party of compassion, is trivializing an issue of life and death. And this is a form of blackmail. You are saying, "Mr. Reagan, if you want your $100 million, it is going to cost you $1.7 billion." that is the trade-off. And you want to know if we will become accessories.

Now, seriously, ladies and gentlemen, can we inject a little candor into this debate, a little intellectual honesty? When you Democrats wheel out your heavy hitters to close the debate, spare us the sermonizing about voting your conscience. Spare us that. Because while those words were resounding through this Chamber, there was a line of Democrats at the doctor's office trying to get their shoulders put back in the socket. You know that and I know that. In fact, your whip call, when it went out on the last vote, it did not say, "Vote your conscience," it said, "The Democratic leadership wants a no vote."

So spare us the conscience bit.

And, then, No. 2, spare us any banalities about partisanship stops at the water's edge. Can we skip that this time around? I would appreciate it.

I hope I have the time to discuss Mr. FOLEY's op-ed piece today, because the substance of it is twofold: The Contras cannot win. Thank God he was not Washington's military adviser at Valley Forge. He would have said, "Hey, those guys have no shoes, they can't win." And then he referred to what is going on in Nicaragua as our proxy war. It is not too tough to understand, I should think, that these are Nicaraguans we are helping. They are not invading their own country. The proxies are on the other side—Bulgarians, North Koreans, Libyans, East Germans, Cubans, Russians. Those are the proxies. And that country is an occupied country.

We wish to help Nicaraguans fight Nicaraguans to recover their freedom.

There are two sides, the Communist side and the free side.

And let me close with a quote from a Nicaraguan. Let me just read this to you. This is from testimony from Bernard Aaronson, a very nice liberal Democrat, and he is quoting to us what a Nicaraguan opposition leader said inside the country:

> You have the strength, the opportunity, but not the will. We want to struggle, but it is dangerous to have friends like you. It is dangerous to be stuck on the landing beaches of the Bay of Pigs. Either help us or leave us alone.

I want to help.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, before I yield to my distinguished leader, I yield myself such time as I may consume so that I may respond to my friend, the gentleman from Illinois.

He has accused us of trivializing a policy of life or death. I would respond to my friend that the Nicaraguan people have lost 50,000 of their precious young during the revolution. They lost 12,000 already in this war. That is 62,000 young men who will never know an education, never know a decent living, will never fall in love, never get married, will never grow old in peace.

If you were to take 62,000 of that number and spread that proportionately across this country, with our numbers—that is a country of 2.5 to 3 million people, we are a country of 230 million people—you are talking roughly 5 million Americans.

We have 57,000 Americans on that wall near the Lincoln Memorial. You could stretch that wall up to the Capitol and back down again. So we do not trivialize life and death in this war. We think it is serious.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time on this side to my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized for 5½ minutes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this rule.

I am sorry that the debate has degenerated into an attempt to discredit the Speaker and the leadership of the House on the basis of a rule which is, on its face, patently and eminently fair.

What is a fair rule? A fair rule, by definition, is one which allows the will of the majority of the Members to prevail. That is the purpose of the rules of this House. They exist to guarantee that a majority will not be tyrannized by a minority and that a minority will not be taken advantage of by a majority.

Those who have attempted to make a case that this is an unfair rule do so simply on the ground, as I understand it, that it does not treat the question of Contra aid as a separate matter entirely without any amendments.

But, my colleagues, that is exactly what we did less than 1 month ago. We gave a full and ample opportunity for debate without any amendment whatever and an up and down vote. It did not prevail. The House was under no moral or ethical or legal obligation to give a second opportunity.

I was present in the room when the Speaker agreed with a number of Members that there were Members who wanted an opportunity to have some modification, something in between the all or nothing positions. And quite reasonably and quite fairly the Speaker said, "On the 15th day of April that opportunity will be given, and anybody who has a serious amendment to offer to modify, alter or change will have that opportunity as a part of the supplemental appropriation bill."

That agreement was made almost a month ago, and that agreement is being kept.

I would like for us to reflect that this is the most expeditious way in which the President's position could be given a second chance. There is not any other manner, save by a rule of this type and as an amendment to this bill by which it could be offered without first having to go to committees, be subject to hearings, be subject to amendments.

Now, it is offered as a reasonable proposition that it is not a fair rule because, in order to prevail, those in favor of the Michel approach are going to have to defeat three amendments. Well, how does that differ from any other proposition that comes to this House floor? Any proposition that comes to the House floor, in order to prevail in its raw form, must have a majority who will reject amendments. So it is not any different. It is a fair rule, it is an expeditious rule.

And I want to say, in the last instance, it is a logical rule.

What is this? It is an appropriation, is it not? Does it not belong to be considered as part of a supplemental appropriations bill? Is that not the very purpose of a supplemental appropriations bill, in order that we might consider in concert a number of important matters, urgent supplemental matters, dignified by their urgency and the importance of each of those matters to our country.

Now, it is suggested that we trivialize the question of the Contra aid by considering it in concert with other matters. Now, I just want to ask: Do we truly trivialize it when we consider it in concert with such questions as security from terrorism?

Only a few weeks ago the House voted for a bill that would strengthen the security of our Embassies all over the world so that they do not have to be vulnerable to the kind of madmen who hurdle through space intent upon blowing themselves up and doing so in the process of killing American citizens. Is that trivial? Does that not deserve to be considered also in the same context?

We are carrying that out in an expeditious fashion. Surely the events of last evening demonstrate the importance of that matter.

Finally, I want us to recognize that this is the only manner in which we can properly preserve the constitutional balance between the executive and legislative branch. Due to a juxtaposition of deferrals and rescissions and the change exerted by the judicial branch of Government in our carefully crafted Anti-Impoundment Act, the only way we have to prevent the President's asserting, in effect, a line-item veto forbidden in our Constitution is to have the opportunity to present a rejection of the deferrals.

Now, we have already asserted the will of the majority on each of these items. Low-income housing, is that not important? Housing for the elderly and the handicapped, is that trivial?

We have already asserted the will of this House on a strategic petroleum reserve. And surely if it is appropriate ever, it ought to be appropriate at this time, when the price of petroleum is cheap, to fill up the reserve and reduce our vulnerability to Middle Eastern sources of oil. Is that trivial?

I suggest that it is a matter of important national security and must be considered.

□ 1815

This is the only way we ever will have an opportunity to present these matters which we already have supported by a clear majority in the House and the Senate to require the President to expend the funds that we have appropriated, and that is by incorporating them in this supplemental bill.

Let me suggest one other thought. Surely the plight of the American farmers is anything but trivial. Is it unimportant that we protect our efforts to address that plight, and to preserve the American family farmer from the foreclosures that are greater this year than any year since the midst of the Great Depression, is that trivial? This is our opportunity to do it.

Veterans' compensation programs are protected in this bill. I do not think any man or woman in his rightful mind would consider our responsibility to those who have sacrificed their wholeness in defense of our country as trivial.

So the other matters contained in this bill, too, are matters of extreme importance.

Finally, I just want to suggest to my very dear friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE], who is also delightful and whom I revere and respect, that there is contained in this bill a very important element for the protection of the rights of the unborn, the women's, infants' and children's feeding program, and unless this bill passes, that program will be trivialized by an administration that seems not to understand the needs of those people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WRIGHT was allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I did not realize that my time was otherwise expired. Let me just simply say that it is truly an important matter that we protect the rights of the unborn generations yet to come by providing adequate nutrition for poor, pregnant mothers. All of these things are important.

We give to each an opportunity to go up or down by the will of the majority of the Members of this House under this rule. For that reason, it is a fair rule and I ask all of you to support it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 221, nays 202, not voting 10, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, last week, I inadvertently neglected to record my vote on final passage of H.R. 4332, as amended. I intended to cast a "no" vote.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. FOLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, it would be my intention to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns tonight, it adjourn to meet at 10 a.m. tomorrow. But before I make that request, I would state, Mr. Speaker, that I think we have many Members who are anxious to be at a briefing which is now being conducted by the Secretaries of State and Defense. We had planned to go for 1 hour tonight on the general debate, but I think it would accommodate Members' desire to be present at that important briefing if we were able to get consent to resume the work before tomorrow and have 2 hours in the morning.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. I think our leader would have no objection to that unanimous-consent request. Of course, all of the Members are interested in this briefing, and we would like to join with the gentleman in making arrangements to do so.

I would like to make one inquiry. Do you intend to resolve into the Committee of the Whole at this point, or do you intend for the House to go to special orders after your unanimous consent request?

Mr. FOLEY. I would assume we would go to special orders.

HOUR OF MEETING ON TOMORROW, APRIL 16, 1986

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns tonight, it adjourn to meet at 10 a.m., tomorrow, April 16, 1986.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, DC,
April 14, 1986.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the permission granted in Clause 5, Rule III of the Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives, I have the honor to transmit a sealed envelope received from the White House at 3:50 p.m. on Monday, April 14, 1986, and said to contain a message from the President wherein he transmits the 20th Annual Report of the National Endowment for the Humanities covering the year 1985.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely,

BENJAMIN J. GUTHRIE,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

ANNUAL REPORT OF NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of yesterday, Monday, April 14, 1986, page 7399.)

MAYOR CHASTAINE FLYNT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, the dean of Mississippi mayors is one of my constituents and a good friend, Mayor Chastaine Flynt of Flowood, MS. This year he will celebrate his 33d year in office. The publication of the Mississippi Municipal Association contains a feature story on Mayor Flynt and it details the progress of his city since he took office in 1953.

I want to share the article with my colleagues:

DEAN OF MISSISSIPPI MAYORS CELEBRATES 33 YEARS IN OFFICE

Chastaine Flynt is a man of many titles. His official title is Mayor of Flowood, but he's also called "Mayor of Mississippi," "Dean of Mississippi Mayors," and even "Emperor."

Flynt chuckles about the Emperor title. "I really don't think I act like an emperor because if I did, the nice people around here wouldn't work with me," Flynt said. "I think some people call me that because I've been around so long.

Mayor Flynt has been around for a long time. If fact, he's been mayor of Flowood since the city was incorporated 33 years ago on March 10, 1953. Lately, he's enjoyed laughing and saying he's stayed in office longer than Marcos.

Everyone who knows the "Mayor of Mississippi," no matter how slightly, knows he is full of fun and likes to joke, especially about himself. But don't be mistaken, though he likes fun, he takes his job as mayor seriously. Flowood's growth is proof of it.

The tiny city started from scratch in 1953 and operated the first year on an $8,600 budget. Today's budget is $1,750,000.

The city boasts three major hospitals: River Oaks Hospital, Woman's Hospital and Riverside Hospital. It is the home of Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Mississippi and Aetna Insurance Company. Other major industries include Magna Corporation, BIC Corporation, Stone Manufacturing, Rival Manufacturing, Seagull Corporation, Cataphote Corporation, Steel Services Corporation, Adcock and Campbell Street and Road Builders, Associated Contractors, and Browning Ferris Industries.

Flowood is also home of Jackson Preparatory School, Dean, Dale & Dean, the state's largest architectural firm; three major furniture dealers, two building supply companies, a racquetball club with swimming facilities and the offices of approximately 35 physicians.

When talking about industries in Flowood, Flynt says he usually mentions Shacks Welding Company because he likes the company's motto: "We can weld anything except the break of day and a broken heart."

It's easy to tell that Flynt is proud of Flowood, but he's modest about this industrial development efforts. He says the city doesn't have to go out and look for industries. "They come to us," Flynt explains. "The reason is simple. It's our location."

Recent development includes commercial buildings and residential construction. Fox Meadow and East Lakeland apartment complex were recently completed and Reflection Point, a 244 unit complex is underway. Also under construction is Mirror Lake Plaza, a $27 million project.

The Flowood construction Mayor Flynt is most interested in right now is a new $750,000 fire station. "We're going to call it Central," says Flynt proudly. "Now tell me, how many towns in Mississippi have $750,000 fire stations?"

Flowood owns its city hall and is the only city in Rankin County with it own city auditorium. The population is 1800 for the town in which 12,000 people are employed.

The City Board of Aldermen include E. C. Dewitt, who has served as alderman as long as Flynt has served as mayor; K. R. Ainsworth, W. K. Bell, Ivy Graham and Bobby Gene Moore. Billie Bush is Fire Chief and Gary Rhoads is Chief of Police. Miss Frances Jones is City Clerk.

REAUTHORIZING CERTAIN INDIAN HEALTH PROGRAMS AND REFORMING ADMINISTRATION OF THE INDIAN HEALTH SERVICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today for myself and Mr. WAXMAN, a bill reauthorizing certain Indian health programs and making reforms in the administration of Indian health service.

My committee began consideration of this matter in March 1983. In the 98th Congress, legislation on the subject was passed by both Houses, but was unfortunately vetoed by the President. In March of last year, I reintroduced similar legislation, H.R. 1426, which was jointly referred to the Interior Committee and the Committee on Energy and Commerce. Both committees reported H.R. 1426 in May of last year with amendments. As reported, there were significant differences between the two committee bills.

In the intervening months, we have sought to resolve these differences and to meet some of the further objections of the administration. In addition to resolving most of the differences between the two committees in H.R. 1426 as reported, this new bill significantly reduces authorization levels for the various Indian health programs and reduces the authorization period from 4 years to 3 years.

While I would prefer the passage of H.R. 1426 as reported from my committee, in light of existing fiscal restraints and in the spirit of compromise, I can support the provisions of the bill I introduce today. It is the intent of Mr. WAXMAN and myself to seek consideration of this new bill under suspension of the rules as soon as possible in lieu of H.R. 1426 as reported from our committees.

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION'S TRIP TO LATIN AMERICA

(Mr. O'NEILL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, from March 26–April 8, I led a bipartisan delegation to four Latin American countries.

Democracy is the wave of the future in Latin America. Ninety percent of the people to our south are living in countries that are either fully democratic or moving toward democracy. In the countries we visited, Brazil, Argentina, Venezuela, and the Dominican Republic, we saw that the commitment to democratic institutions is strong and vital. The people of these countries have a strong and passionate belief in human rights, a free press, free elections, and a lively political competition. Rather than being alone in this hemisphere the United States is part of an overwhelming democratic majority in the Americas.

A number of these countries are on the verge of joining the economic first world. They have developed in great strides and while they face serious challenges of debt and trade they have a real opportunity to leave the ranks of developing nations and join those of the developed world. if correct policies are followed these countries could, at sometime in the future, be facing north as economic equals of the United States, Europe, and Japan.

In our visits to these rising democracies, we met with legislators like ourselves who fully appreciate the crisis facing Central America. They have a realistic assessment of the Contadora process and fully realize the frustration and challenges that lie in the path of peace. The fact that they remain committed to the negotiation process, rather than further military escalation, is itself a healthy sign that the democracies of Latin America recognize the essential importance of concerted action.

The leaders we met with shared a common concern that the conflict in Central America must not trigger United States intervention. They believe that such a development could undermine their own democracies by igniting extremist movements who would use American military intervention as means to gaining public support. They expressed this concern both publicly and privately.

Members of Congress in the bipartisan delegation accompanying Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr.:

The Honorable Dan Rostenkowski of Illinois;

The Honorable Edward P. Boland of Massachusetts;

The Honorable Joseph M. McDade of Pennsylvania;

The Honorable Charles B. Rangel of New York;

The Honorable Norman Lent of New York;

The Honorable Pete Stark of California;

The Honorable Ralph Regula of Ohio;

The Honorable John Murtha of Pennsylvania;

The Honorable Marty Russo of Illinois;

The Honorable George Miller of California;

The Honorable Barbara Kennelly of Connecticut;

The Honorable Bill Lowery of California; and

The Honorable Norman Sisisky of Virginia.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the delegation, I submit the following report.

BRAZIL

During its visit to Brazil, the Congressional delegation met with President Jose Sarney Costa; Foreign Minister Roberto Sodre; Presidential Foreign Affairs Advisor Rubens Ricupero; Finance Minister Dilson Funaro; fifteen members of the Chamber of Deputies (including President of the Chamber Ulysses Guimares and members of the Committees on Foreign Relations; Finance; Science and Technology; Constitution and Justice; and the Economy, Industry, and Commerce); Governor of Rio de Janiero Leonel Brizola; U.S. Charge Alec Watson and the staff of the U.S. Embassy in Brasilia and the U.S. Consulate in Rio de Janiero. Several members of the delegation also had separate meetings with the chief of police and with U.S. businessmen. The delegation visited an innovative school in Rio where the children spend nine hours a day (in contrast to the normal three) and receive educational instruction, 3 meals, and health care, and participate in athletics. The discussions focused on the evolution of democracy in Brazil, the current economic situation in Brazil, the external debt, U.S.-Brazilian trade relations, and Central America.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN BRAZIL

1985 was described to the delegation as a year of crisis, both political and economic. The country left behind twenty years of authoritarian rule, and did it without trauma. The death of President-elect Trancredo Neves came at a time of political tension and economic/social crisis; political tension in the transition to democracy at a time when political parties and democratic institutions lacked substance and stability, and economic/social crisis arising from a period of economic recession, falling wages, high external and demostic debt, inflation, and high unemployment.

A year later, the rejuvenation of political activity and an easing of the economic crisis have relieved the social tension that threatened the stability of the transition. By early 1986 Brazil had moved beyond the recession that had lasted seven years. Economic growth in 1985 was 8%, unemployment declined, real wages rose, and the trade surplus was $12.5 billion. However, inflation reached 250% in 1985 and at the beginning of 1986 was approaching 400%, and was quickly erroding any gains achieved in wage increases. Consequently, in February of this year President Sarney instituted the Tropical Plan, under which a new currency was created, all wages and prices were frozen, all indexation was terminated, and the government ceased issuing new money. A month later, no new money has been printed and inflation had been halted.

One Brazilian political leader with whom the delegation met expressed the view that the economic reforms are inequitable in their impact—the burden falls on the poorer 70% of society—and that greater attention to social problems is necessary. However, the accepted view in Brazil appears to be that there is widespread public support for the economic reform plan.

Several Brazilians said the critical thing that remains to be done is to settle the "social debt" which remains from the years of military rule. It was also explained to the delegation that the other item which must be dealt with is the external debt burden. Foreign markets must remain open in order for Brazil to be able to meet its debt service obligations—which commitments it will keep—and it is important to realize that there is a direct link between Brazil's debt burden and trade balance and its ability to sustain its political development.

There was also an expression of the view that the real crisis in Latin America is economic, not ideological. It is the low level of economic activity, not ideological doctrine, that is causing social tension and violence. What is needed is to attack the root causes of the problem, such as in Brazil the widespread labor strikes were attacked not by treating the symptoms (the strikes) but through economic reform that protected wage levels. The result has been a calming of social unrest and a reduction in labor strikes.

TRADE AND DEBT

Considerable focus was directed during the discussions to the issues of Brazil's external debt and U.S.-Brazilian trading relations, and the links between the two. On the broader issue of the Third World debt problem, several Brazilians made the point that efforts had been made by some countries to politicize the debt issue—to make it into an ideological confrontation—but Brazil had rejected and helped block those efforts.

Brazil has the largest external debt of any Third World country, $102 billion as of the end of 1985. Several Brazilians with whom the delegation met pointed out that Brazil's reserves at $8 billion (some sources put them at $9.2 billion) are small compared to its requirements, and Brazil must run a trade surplus in order to meet its annual debt service payments of $10–12 billion. The Brazilian debt was run up during the period 1980–1985 due to high interest rates, and now Brazil must put out the equivalent of its entire debt every six years just to service the debt. Debt servicing was 83% of exports in 1982 and 71% in 1985.

One presentation on Brazil's debt identified its principal sources as rising interest rates and oil prices—$35 billion due to spiralling interest rates during the early 1980's and $36 billion due to the increased cost of oil imports. It was said that these two items are beyond Brazil's control, and it is impossible for Brazil to continue to devote 50% of its export earnings to servicing its external debt; 4.5% of Brazil's savings goes to pay interest on external debt. The flood of petrodollars kept interest rates artificially low, countries like Brazil went into the market, and then interest rates spiralled to 21%. Another Brazilian reported that as much as $45 billion of the debt went for major infrastructure projects, so there appears to be some difference in analysis as to the exact breakdown of the source and use of Brazil's external debt. The danger of interest rates was noted by the fact that a two point rise in interest rates would wipe out the Baker Plan.

One Brazilian urged that the United States reduce its budget deficit in order to relieve the pressure on interest rates and therefore the burden of servicing Brazil's debt. It was asked how long does Brazil have to continue to pay for the U.S. internal deficit. Another asked for the delegation's view on eliminating floating interest rates, undertaking a full audit of Brazil's external debt (part of which may have ended up in U.S. banks as capital flight rather than being put to productive use in Brazil), and the need for a new Bretton Woods arrangement because the Third World debt is unmanageable. It was also suggested that it is in order to be able to meet its debt payments that Brazil has to limit imports. It was asked what would the impact be on U.S. banks if Brazil could not pay its debt. Various officials with them the delegation met emphasized the potential conflict between the development of democracy in Brazil and the burden of Brazil's external debt.

Members of the congressional delegation expressed considerably sympathy for the problems posed by Brazil's external debt, and appreciation for the potential difficulties which the debt burden imposes on Brazil's economic/social stability and the new democratic institutions of the country. They said there is obviously a careful balance which must be struck between Brazil meeting its debt commitments and the development of democracy, and the IMF and the banks must realize what is required to sustain a democracy. Appreciation was also expressed for Brazil's pledge to honor its commitments. However, it was pointed out that Brazil does not face as serious a debt servicing problem as many developing countries. With U.S. commercial banks accounting for only 27% of Brazil's external debt—no more than $4 billion of the total annual servicing burden—that sum is more than covered by Brazil's $5 billion trade surplus with the United States. Brazil's debt problem is not just a problem with the United States, but also with Western Europe, Japan, and some Arab countries.

It was pointed out to the Brazilians that for the House of Representatives 1986 is the year of deficit and trade. U.S. interest rates have declined over the last eighteen months, and, with Gramm-Rudman and other efforts, the Congress is attempting to reduce the budget deficit—so there should be a further reduction in pressure on interest rates. It was also suggested that Brazil should have an easier time servicing its debt in 1986—the recent and expected further reduction in interest rates should result in the servicing requirement for 1986 being in the range of $10 billion rather than $12 billion, and Brazil should save another $1 billion or more from the dramatic decline in oil prices. Brazil, therefore, should have the capability also to meet its official debt requirements, which have accumulated some $2 billion in arrearages since servicing was suspended in December 1984.

Several Brazilians with whom the delegation met expressed the Brazilian reluctance to agree to an IMF arrangement, because the last one required a reduction in trade and economic growth, while Brazil is now taking the opposite tact of attempting to increase exports and to grow out of its economic/debt difficulties. Members of the delegation expressed the hope that Brazil would find a way to cooperate with the International Monetary Fund.

Various Brazilians drew a strong link between Brazil's external debt and its trade balance. They explained that Brazil had to maintain a net trade surplus in order to service its debt. It was explained that for a period of some twelve years Brazil ran a trade deficit with the United States in the range of better than $1 billion annually, so the trade surplus that evolved in 1985 and 1986 is a recent phenomenon. It was noted that in 1985 Brazil had restricted certain types of steel exports to the United States, only to have the difference picked up by other exporters. The concern was expressed that the United States is moving to protectionist measures which will affect Brazilian exports.

Members of the congressional delegation raised various trade problems which the United States faces with Brazil. Particular focus was directed toward Brazilian policy on "informatics", whereby significant segments of the sector are "reserved" for Brazilian production and thereby impacts negatively on both U.S. investments in and exports to Brazil. The software side of the industry faces a lack of copyright protection. U.S. informatics exports to Brazil rose only slightly from $347.9 million in 1980 to $375.3 million in 1984; this trade is increasingly in spare parts, and U.S. products account for a decreasing share of the market. The matter of Brazilian policies affecting U.S. investment in the pharmaceutical industry was also raised, particularly the absence of intellectual property protection, price controls, and bureaucratic delays and discrimination against U.S. owned firms. It was mentioned that the GAO had released a report which documents specific instances of Brazilian import restrictions, quotas, licensing restrictions, and discriminatory taxes. Concern was also expressed over Brazilian subsidy of production and exports.

The members of the delegation explained the many difficulties facing the United States in the area of trade. The current U.S. trade deficit of $150 billion is unsustainable. This situation, and the gradual deindustrialization of basic industries, is producing considerable pressure in the Congress to enact trade legislation. It was explained that the House of Representatives will consider a trade bill in mid-May, and, while a strong effort will be made to prevent it from becoming a vehicle for protectionism, those pressures may be very difficult to fend off. There is a growing feeling in the United States that it is the last nation practicing free trade, and the Congress is coming to the position of demanding reciprocity. If Brazil denies U.S. products access to the Brazilian market, then Brazil will find that its products will be denied access to the U.S. market.

It was pointed out to the delegation that the ITC recently determined that Brazilian imports of ethanol were not causing injury to the U.S. industry. It was also suggested that the United States does not have to worry about Brazilian subsidy because the U.S. regulatory procedures are strong and more than adequate to the task of protecting American business interests.

The overall impression the delegation developed of the foreign investment/trade climate of Brazil is that, while there are specific areas in which there are serious U.S. business complaints because of restrictions and discrimination, overall the climate is favorable and there are many U.S. firms engaged in satisfactory business relations with Brazil.

FOREIGN POLICY—CENTRAL AMERICA AND THE GULF OF SIDRA

The delegation engaged in wide ranging discussions on foreign policy with various Brazilians. The primary focus was on Central America, but recent events on the Gulf of Sidra were also discussed. There was no consensus which could be identified as the single Brazilian view on the issues, as the delegation found a diversity of opinions.

Various Brazilians argued that a negotiated dialogue should be pursued in Central America through the Contadora process and that ideological and East-West confrontation should be avoided. They could not say whether Ortega would negotiate, but negotiations should always be tried. Several also said that what should be attacked is the underlying causes of the civil strife in Central America—the inequitable social and economic conditions that give rise to unrest and upheaval.

Several Brazilians expressed strong opposition to U.S. assistance to the contras, whom they saw as composed mainly of former Somoza guardsmen. It was noted that the Contadora nations were to meet April 5-6th in Panama and that Brazil will attend and support a proposal for a commission to review the veracity of recent events (presumably the recent Honduran-Nicaraguan border conflict). One individual expressed the view that, although the Nicaragua Government is not democratic, it is a strong government following the Somoza dictatorship and is in transition. Another expressed general sympathy for U.S. policy in Central America.

During the discussions the congressional delegation attempted to explain the sentiment within the U.S. Congress and of the American people with regard to Central America. While there is considerable disagreement within the Congress as to the specifics of U.S. policy toward Nicaragua, there is little disagreement that the Sandinistas are in the process of establishing a non-democratic political system and are supporting subversion in the region and that it should be U.S. policy to seek an alteration in that behavior. It was urged that Brazil become more involved in the process and help push for a negotiated settlement. It was also explained that it was important to isolate Nicaragua and that the one point of stablity in the region—El Salvador—should be supported. It was suggested that time is not on the Sandinista's side but is on the side of democracy.

Several Brazilians expressed concern over and opposition to recent U.S. military maneuvers in the Gulf of Sidra and what was characterized as the hawkish U.S. position toward Libya. The view was expressed that the United States provoked the military confrontation and that the U.S. Congress should stand on the side of non-intervention. Several members of the delegation made a strong defense of U.S. actions in the Gulf of Sidra. They explained that Kadafi had become an international outlaw and had violated international law and that the United States was defending the right of passage in international waterways for all countries. The United States had undertaken similar maneuvers before, they had been announced in advance, and the United States cannot allow a Kadafi to engage in international blackmail.

One Brazilian expressed the view that historically the United States has provided support for many dictatorships, but commended the recent change in U.S. policy with regard to the Philippines, Haiti, Chile, and Nicaragua. This was seen as a positive change in policy that should be continued.

The sense which the delegation received from the discussions on foreign policy matters is that foreign policy, Central America specifically, is not high on the Brazilian agenda. Its priority issues are institutionalization of the democratic processes, domestic economic revitalization, and the external debt. Brazilian attention to and involvement in finding a resolution to the conflict in Central America is further down the list of priorities.

ARGENTINA

In Argentina the delegation met with President Raul Alfonsin, Foreign Minister Dante Caputo, U.S. Ambassador Frank Ortiz, and the staff of the U.S. Embassy. The delegation also held roundtable discussions with members of the Chambers of Deputies, led by Chairman of the Chamber of Deputies Dr. Juan Carlos Pugliese, and with members of the Senate, led by Vice President of Argentina and President of the Senate Dr. Victor Martinez. The discussions focused on the return of democracy in Argentina, the Argentine economic situation, the external debt, and Central America.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN ARGENTINA

The delegation congratulated the Argentine political leaders for the successful transition from a military government to democracy. The Argentines explained that their constitution, which dates from 1853, is very similar to the U.S. Constitution—provides for three branches of government that are separate and equal. They said the road to reestablishing democracy has been difficult and Argentina does not yet have the political stability enjoyed by the United States, but that institutionalization of democracy is well on its way.

It was explained to the delegation that the Government of Raul Alfonsin, elected in 1983, inherited the residue of failed economic policies, human rights abuses of the military government, and defeat from the war over the Malvinas Islands. The Government has been seeking a resolution of the dispute with Britain through the United Nations, has brought to trial the nine principal military leaders, and has undertaken economic reforms.

While coming to office seeking economic growth and an increase in wages, the Government of Raul Alfonsin realized in 1985 that the principal economic problem facing the country was inflation. During the first quarter of 1985 inflation totaled 91% and at the end of that period was running at an annualized level of 851%. In June, 1985, President Alfonsin announced a dramatic economic reform program that went beyond even IMF requirements. The Plan Austral froze wages and prices, introduced a new currency (Austral), stopped the issuance of currency unsupported by reserves, and promised to reduce the budget deficit to 2.5%. Inflation declined to 2%/month for the remainder of 1985 and is running at the same level for 1986, with the projected level for all of 1986 being 28%. The Argentine economy grew by 2% in 1984 and declined by 4.5% in 1985. Projections for 1986 are for 4% growth.

Members of the delegation commended the Argentine Government for the serious manner in which it was attempted to bring under control its economic problems and for its pledge to meet its international commitments, specifically its $50 billion external debt. When the Alfonsin Government came to office, Argentina was in arrears on its debt servicing. An IMF agreement and a rescheduling of its debt in 1984, together with a trade surplus of $3.5 billion in 1984 and of $4.4 billion in 1985, has made it possible for Argentina to keep its debt servicing current. Debt servicing as a per cent of exports declined from 125% in 1983 to 91% in 1985.

Various Argentines with whom the delegation met expressed the view that there is a direct connection between Argentina's external debt, its ability to grow economically, and the institutionalization of democracy. The economic constraints required in order to meet the debt payments jeopardizes democracy, not just in Argentina, but throughout the hemisphere. They argued that economic adjustment is necessary, not just by the debtor nations, but also in the Northern economies, in order to reduce the budget deficits which have maintained interest rates at an historic high.

Members of the delegation pointed out that 1986 is for the House of Representatives the year of the deficit and of trade. Tax reform has already passed the House, and a trade bill will be on the House floor in May. The Congress has made a commitment to reducing the federal deficit and set the goal of eliminating it by 1991. That commitment has brought stability and confidence to financial markets, resulting in a decline in inflation and in interest rates. This will help both the U.S. economy and other economies. However, it was pointed out that reducing the budget deficit is not an easy matter. $40 billion has already been taken from domestic spending programs, and there is no longer any fat to cut. Constituents do not want social programs cut and the Administration and other governments do not want defense and foreign aid cut, so where do you reduce the deficit?

An Argentine said that the priority issues in the Argentine Congress are similar. The Congress is seized with budget deficit reduction and tax reform, which are aimed at solidifying the fight against inflation, bringing economic stability and growth, and providing the country with the ability to meet its international commitments.

While the delegation was in Argentina the Congress was involved in a lengthy debate over the external debt. The opposition is suggesting that the debt, having been largely incurred under a non-elected military government, should not be the responsibility of the current government. The need to service the debt has produced economic policies that have resulted in a reduction of the standard of living; instead of paying the debt, the government should be raising salaries. The opposition is also suggesting a debt moratorium and the establishment of a commission to determine which portion of the debt is legitimate and which is illegitimate. The position of the government party is that the debt must be honored, that unilateral action is not the correct path, but that Argentina should seek to negotiate a better deal (the objective of which would be a reduction in interest rates).

The United States appeared to be the target of most comments on the debt situation, and members of the delegation pointed out that the debt is not solely, or even principally, a U.S. matter. U.S. banks account for only $11 billion of Argentina's external debt, so it is a matter also involving Western Europe, Japan, and other countries. The Argentines noted that the Cartagena Group has called for a return of interest rates to historic levels, but the creditor nations have not heeded this plea. The Argentine analysis of the debt problem is that it is no longer just an economic/financial matter, but a political matter, and requires a political solution.

The Argentines raised the issure of the new U.S. farm bill and complained that EEC and US subsidies on agriculture products and barriers to agricultural trade are seriously damaging Argentine agricultural exports, specifically resulting in an international price of wheat of below $100/ton rather than what had been a price of $140/ton. In response, it was explained that the real culprit in imposing trade barriers and engaging in subsidies is the European Community, and the target of the new U.S. farm bill is those unfair European practices, not Argentina. It was noted that the basic problem is worldwide oversupply.

CENTRAL AMERICA

The delegation engaged in wide ranging discussions on Central America in all of the meetings that were held in Argentina. The focus of the delegation's questions to the Argentina political leaders was their views on the Contadora process, the Nicaraguan government, and U.S. policy in the region.

While expressing a desire to avoiding becoming involved in domestic U.S. politics, the Argentines express strong support for the Contadora process and for the necessity of pursuing peace in the region through negotiations. They said that Argentina shares the same objectives as the United States—stopping Nicaraguan subversion in the region and promoting the democratization of Nicaragua—but disagrees on methodology. They said they could not promise that negotiations would achieve those objectives, but that was the preferred approach to pursue.

There was strong expression that Latin America should be composed of democratic nations, with democracy being defined as is customary in this hemisphere—democratic pluralism and political and press freedoms—not dominance by one party with a Marxist-Leninist ideology. Democracy is to be supported in the hemisphere, not just for ideological, but more importantly for practical reasons—practical reasons because communist governments always seek alliances with communist bloc countries and bring hemispheric instability.

When asked whether Nicaragua was committed to being a communist country, the response was that it could go either way, but the current trend is toward consolidating communism. The current economic situation in Nicaragua is in a crisis state, and it was held that such a situation tends to polarize the politics of a country.

Several Argentines suggested that the best path to pursue change in Nicaraguan behavior is through pressure from the other countries of Latin America. Such efforts will require a strong will and will not be easy. The problem of Nicaragua goes beyond Central America, because if there is not a peaceful solution, it will have a damaging effect of public opinion in Argentina and elsewhere. Some felt that direct US intervention in Nicaragua could produce a radicalization in Argentina and even destabilize Argentina democracy.

Several Argentines presented this view, and what obviously was behind this assessment was revealed by one official who explained that historically public opinion in Argentina has not been pro-America. Just as there is an oversimplification in the United States of events in Latin America, the same phenomenon exist in Latin America with regard to the United States. The Argentine government is seeking a more stable, more mature relationship with the United States, in an effort to overcome years of instability in relations between the two countries, but a military intervention in Central America would be a serious set back to that effort because of the adverse impact on Argentine public opinion. It was clear that Argentines see their country as having a direct interest in developments in Central America, as they believe a non-peaceful development there would adversely affect the efforts to institutionalize democracy in Argentina.

Various Argentines expressed strong support for the efforts of the Contadora countries and suggested that the recent Declaration of Caraballeda offered the basis for an agreement. When queried why it was thought that agreement was possible when three years of effort had proved fruitless, the response was that recent efforts had focused too much on technical details rather than on the main issues and that multilateral diplomacy is always difficult. It was noted that the Declaration of Caraballeda was agreed to by the Contadora nations and the Contadora Support Group, which together represent 90% of the population of Latin America. This support, together with that which has been offered by the European Community, Canada, and Japan, should increase the pressure for an agreement.

Members of the delegation explained that, although there is general agreement within the delegation on the importance of the Contadora process and that negotiations are the preferred route, the time for negotiations is running short. They explained that Congress will probably pass legislation similar to what was approved by the Senate on March 27, resulting in a ninety-day period between enactment of legislation and the time that restrictions are removed from the provision of offensive military assistance to the contras. They further explained that it therefore is very important that progress be made at the April 5-6 meeting in Panama of the thirteen nations (the five Central American countries, the four Contadora nations, and the four Support Group nations); and that a Contadora agreement be concluded during the ninety-day "window of opportunity". It was suggested that this period is a unique opportunity for Latin America to have a positive impact on the United States. If the Latin American countries do not influence the Sandinistas and resolve the conflict in Central America, it will be a tremendous loss for Latin America in U.S. public opinion.

There was understanding and accord from various Argentines that the time for negotiations is limited. The view was also expressed that Argentina was prepared to accept the consequences of a pacificist approach to the situation in Central America. If a peaceful solution is not found, the situation will deteriorate rapidly. But, if the United States intervenes, it will affect the entire hemisphere and will constrict U.S. relations throughout the hemisphere.

There was a recognition among some Argentines that, during the period of no U.S. assistance to the contras, the pressure was taken off the Sandinistas and there was no progress on negotiations. One Argentina tied the lack of progress to the absence of agreement between the United States and Contadora on either objectives or methodology. Various Argentines agreed that it was important to maintain pressure on the Sandinistas but said it should be Latin pressure.

When queried as to the recent Nicaraguan incursion across the Honduras border, Argentines said similar occurrences happen frequently, but that this last incident was particularly explosive. Argentina is reviewing a proposal to create a peace force in the area, similar to the one proposed for the border between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, but they said the northern border of Nicaragua is different from its southern border. The Canadian Government has studied the situation and has reported that, for a border force to be effective, would require a 20,000 man force.

When queried as to whether there was a difference of opinion between the two major parties on policy toward Central America, the response was "no", that there is consensus on non-intervention, self-determination, and support for Contadora. It was also suggested that, while the Argentine position should not be taken as being against the United States, there is a feeling in the country that a political solution is possible, like the political progress that has been made in Guatemala and El Salvador. One Argentine expressed the view that, because Nicaragua is subject to invasion from outside, maybe it cannot survive under a political system similar to other countries in Latin America, and, while Argentina struggled against terrorism through a bloody means, the objective in Central America should be peace. Another reported that there is Argentine concern over certain actions by the Nicaraguan government, specifically its connection to M19 in Colombia.

It was explained to the delegation that Argentina favors the development of pluralistic democracy in Nicaragua because developments in Central America can affect the security of the region and the integration of the hemisphere. The Nicaraguans have been told by Argentines that there are two paths to political developments, one the Eastern European model of "popular democracy" and the other of Latin American pluralistic democracy. If the latter is chosen, then Nicaragua can benefit from integration into Latin America and can expect assistance in solving its economic and social problems. The most effective means of achieving this objective is through Latin pressure. Several Argentines said there is no guarantee as to what path will bring peaceful development of democracy to Central America, but that the route of peace is the more likely one.

It was suggested that a solution can be achieved when there is agreement by the United States and the Contadora countries on an acceptable methodology for pursuing it, and that the Contadora process would be strengthened if there were a coincidence of view with the United States. When asked what it is Argentina would want the United States to do in order to help Contadora, the suggestion was made that, instead of providing $100 million to the contras, the United States should use the funds to help the Contadora nations to promote economic development in Central America. Another Argentine suggested that, rather than providing the $100 million to the Contadora countries, what is necessary is a new analysis of the situation by the United States and actions in consort with Contadora. It was said that any formula that is arrived at by the Contadora countries must be approved by the United States to be successful.

When asked whether it was being suggested that peace and democracy could be achieved in Central America and Nicaragua only if the contras are removed from the borders, one Argentine responded in the affirmative and said the methodology of assistance to the contras was wrong. It was suggested by another that international law permits criticism of certain actions by the "other" super power, but that U.S. actions in Central America are jeopardizing that ability and that international law would be dead were the Congress to approve aid to the contras, which would amount to Congress approving assistance to overthrow a government which is a member of the Organization of American States.

When asked how long should be given for Contadora to bring about a resolution to the strife in Central America before another route is chosen, the response was that no time limit can be placed on negotiations. As to the implications if negotiations fail, it was explained that would not be catastrophic because there is always possibility of change. It was said that, if faced with alternatives, Argentina will always choose the path of principle.

VENEZUELA

In Venezuela the congressional delegation held discussions with President Jaime Lusinchi; Foreign Minister Simon Alberto Consalvi; former President Rafael Caldera; President of the Senate (and of the entire Congress) Reinaldo Leandro Mora and other members of the Senate; President of the Chamber of Deputies Leonardo Ferrer the other members of the Chamber of Deputies; several members of the board and the presidents of two of the operating companies of Petroleos de Venezuela; and Chargé Kim Flowers and the staff of the U.S. Embassy. The delegation also held a joint meeting with leaders of the two principal political parties specifically to discuss their views on Central America and the Contadora process. The discussions in Venezuela focused principally on the Venezuelen economic situation, international oil prices, the country's external debt, and Central America.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN VENEZUELA

Members of the delegation commended the Venezuelans for having the "oldest of the young democracies of Latin America", dating from 1957, and for being such good friends of the United States. The Venezuelen economy generally has been depressed during the 1980's. The country was faced with a balance of payments deficit in 1983, but that was reversed by a combination of devaluation, fiscal austerity, debt rescheduling, and import and exchange controls. Venezuela posted a trade surplus of $8 billion in 1984 and of $7.4 billion in 1985. Its trade surplus with the United States was $3.4 billion in 1984 and $3.6 billion in 1985. Given the current international prices for petroleum, Venezuela faces the prospect that foreign exchange earnings from oil exports will decline approximately one-third, from $12.5 billion in 1985 to $8 billion in 1986. Venezuela's international reserves stood at $14 billion at the end of this 1985.

In the various discussions the delegation held in Venezuela, the two economic issues foremost on the minds of Venezuelan government and political leaders were international oil prices and the country's $26 billion external debt (with private debt, the external debt reaches $39 billion). It was suggested to the delegation that the source of the Latin American debt problem is a combination of irresponsible borrowing and use of the loans by the Latin American debtors and the rashness of the commercial banks in pushing loans. It was said that Venezuela will meet its international responsibilities, but it must be accomplished in a manner that avoids a reduction in the standard of living of the Venezuelan people. Venezuela's debt service payments were 63% of exports in 1982 but in the range of 36-38% for 1983-1985.

When queried as to their assessment of the Baker Plan, several Venezuelans responded that it is a welcomed recognition that the debt problem must be dealt with in a political context, as Henry Kissinger suggested some time ago, but it is not a complete solution to the problem and the inclusion of the IMF as one of its pillars makes it unpopular for many in Latin America. A recent article in Foreign Affairs by Abe Lowenthal was also mentioned; the statistics he presents demonstrate that growth is impossible if the Latin American debtors are to meet their debt service payments. It was pointed out that such a situation will endanger democracy and stability in the hemisphere.

It was suggested by one Venezuelan political leader that what is needed is a dialogue between the debtor and creditor nations and a Latin version of the Marshall Plan. When Western Europe was threatened by communism in the late 1940's, the United States responded with the Marshall Plan. The debt situation presents a similar threat of instability and communism in Latin America today, and a similar response is in order. The essence of a debtor-creditor agreement on debt would be a reduction in the interest rate, which has remained at an historic real high. Current interest rates of 11-12% are unconscionable when inflation in the United States is 3-4%. It was suggested that the source of the high interest rates was the need of the United States for capital to finance its fiscal deficit.

The response by a member of the delegation was that interest rates have come down in the United States, but they are unlikely to decline much more because there appears to have developed a permanent differential of some five points between the rate of inflation and interest rates.

Another approach to the debt problem suggested by a Venezuelan would be for a multilateral institution, possibly the World Bank, to secure a pool of funds from creditor nations which could be used to purchase Third World loans from commercial banks, in exchange for which the banks would hold long term paper, at a lower interest rate which could be sold at discount.

When asked whether capital flight was a problem for Venezuela, the answer was "yes" and that the problem arose from a concern and fear of devaluation and a lack of confidence in the domestic economy. It was suggested by a member of the delegation that Venezuela's debt problem can be traced to capital flight, and if Venezuela could find a way to attract that capital back home, its debt problem would be solved. It was explained to the delegation that one of the clauses of the rescheduling arrangement was a contingency clause permitting a reopening of discussion on the terms of debt repayment, and the decline in oil revenues may force the government into invoking that clause.

Many Venezuelans with whom the delegation met raised the issue of the likelihood of the U.S. Congress enacting an oil import fee, or quotas. The importance of oil to the Venezuelan economy was made clear: in 1984 the petroleum industry accounted for 23% of gross national product, 65% of federal revenues, and 88% of foreign exchange earnings. Venezuela's petroleum resources include proven reserves of petroleum of 29 billion barrels (the same as the United States) and unproven petroleum reserves of 225 billion barrels. Venezuela's current petroleum production capacity is 2.6 million barrels/day and current production is 1.7 million barrels/day, of which 1.4 million barrels/day is exported, one-third as refined products. Over forty percent of exports go directly to the United States. Thirty per cent of exports go to the Caribbean, mostly, to be refined, and half of that is subsequently shipped to the United States, so over half of Venezuela's oil exports end up in the United States.

The Venezuelans expressed serious concern over proposals that have been made in the United States to impose a fee, or quotas, on oil imports, either to protect domestic U.S. production or for purposes of energy conservation. They made a strong point of the fact that Venezuela has been over the years a dependable source of petroleum for the United States. In time of peace, war, and crisis—during World War II, the Korean War, the Vietnam War, and the Arab oil embargo—Venezuelan supplies were always available. Furthermore, it is important to maintain dependable supply relationships and there are many advantages which Venezuela has to offer as a supplier—operational flexibility (30-40 different types of oil and the ability to shift from one type to another); capacity to increase production; a large and excess refining capacity; a modern marine capacity and proximity to the United States (three and a half days shipping time); large natural gas resources; and competitive costs (production costs of $3.5/barrel).

The Venezuelans argued strongly against any discriminary fee based on geography (imports versus domestic production, or preferential treatment of Canadian and Mexican imports over Venezuelan) or based on product (higher fee on refined products than crude oil). When asked whether they had the same concern about an across the board tax on gasoline, or petroleum products, or energy products, the answer was negative. Concern was also expressed over proposed legislation which would define certain raw material pricing practices as a subsidy that is countervailable.

When asked by a member of the delegation whether Venezuela did not need the U.S. market as much as the United States needed Venezuelan oil, the answer was "yes", there is a strong mutuality of interests in the relationship. Another member of the delegation explained that one of the points raised in the United States is that a continuation of the current price level will result in capacity of a million barrels/day having to be shut-in in California alone, and that production capacity will be lost forever, or until prices reach some astronomical level. Such a development will lead to increased U.S. dependency on foreign sources of oil, with which the United States has an unfavorable experience. The Venezuelans suggested that the United States would be better off conserving its petroleum resources, because, if it uses them up now, it will be even more dependent on foreign supplies in the future.

When asked where oil prices were going, the Venezuelans said they did not know, but the bottom had not likely been reached yet. A Venezuelan suggested a dialogue between producers (OPEC and non-OPEC) and consumers to bring stability to the international oil market, an objective which should be in the interests of both exporting and importing nations. Markets can sometimes be artificial, so government action may be required to insure stability. A member of the delegation noted it was ironic that in the 1970's OPEC nations criticized the United States for being an excessive oil consumer, but it was the success of the United States in responding to that criticism—on reducing petroleum consumption—that had brought on the collapse of international oil prices. It was reported by a member of the delegation that there is not a strong move in the United States to impose a fee on oil imports, but the proposal obviously could gain momentum at any point.

Several Venezuelans said that they understood the economic difficulties being faced in some U.S. oil producing states—Louisiana, Texas, Oklahoma—but that U.S. policy should not be driven by short-term solutions to those problems. Any action taken to discriminate against oil imports would have both a practical and psychological effect on Venezuela.

Noting that the Venezuelan petroleum industry had been nationalized in 1974, a member of the delegation asked whether a similar policy would be recommended for the United States. The answer was not necessarily because of the different circumstances of the industry in the two countries. Oil in Venezuela is the economy. Under Hispanic law the resource is reserved for the state. The nationalization process in Venezuela was not instituted for political/social reasons, but because investment had been declining in the industry for some years and because of a lack of national control over the industry. Furthermore, the process was not traumatic; it was the result of lengthy discussions and negotiations, and the nationalized industry has maintained technical and supply relationships with the former owners. When asked when a resolution would be reached to the ten-year-old dispute over the allocation of the reserve fund from the nationalization, the response was hopefully soon. Most interested parties appear to be reaching a position of being satisfied with a wash, the government is pushing for a resolution, and it is principally a matter of completing the judicial proceedings, which have proved to be lengthy.

FOREIGN POLICY—THE AMERICAN HEMISPHERE AND CENTRAL AMERICA

As in the other countries visited by the congressional delegation, a clear link was drawn between economic and political development. While the principal foreign policy issue discussed in the meetings in Venezuela was Central America, an appropriate introduction to those discussions is a review of the other foreign policy issues which were raised. Those other issues are developments in other countries of the hempishere, and that portion of the discussions is representative of the broad range of Venezuelan interest in the hempishere. As a Caribbean nation, a member of the Andean group, a South American country, and a neighbor to Central America, Venezuela has interests throughout the hempishere and could be seen as sitting at the center of a crossroads.

Concern was expressed for the narcotics situation in Peru, Bolivia, and Colombia, and it was suggested that those governments need to be strengthened and an alternative source of income offered to its peasants in order to permit those countries to be able to deal with the narcotics production and trafficking problems. The United States was praised for its role in helping to bring democracy to Guatemala, and it was urged that greater assistance be provided to the recently elected civilian government. Costa Rica also needs help in getting through its current economic difficulties. The institutionalization of the democratic processes of Brazil and Argentina—in Argentina it is particularly fragile—need to be helped along, and attention must be directed toward a return of democracy to Panama. The new U.S. policy toward Chile, with greater emphasis on human rights, was also praised, and it was urged that the situation there not be let to fester too long as time is likely to strengthen the communist elements in the country.

A direct link was made between the political road likely to be chosen in these countries and their economic difficulties, specifically the external debt problem and the need to maintain and increase exports. A plea was made for the United States to approach the debt problem on a global basis and to find some mechanism of dealing with the unmanageable burden of high interest rates. It was also urged that the United States maintain adequate access to its markets for the exports from the region. Trade barriers or specific tariffs would be a tragedy—especially on oil for Venezuela, on manufacture products for Brazil, and on agricultural products for Mexico.

It was suggested that it is up to the Western Christian world—the United States, Canada, Western Europe—to help guarantee democracy in the American hemisphere. The ideological war will be waged in Latin America, not in Asia. Basic equality must be insured. Venezuela is a true ally of the United States. Venezuela and other countries of Latin America share the values of democracy, and the United States should invest in democracy in the region. What is needed is joint solutions to the mutual problems facing the hemisphere.

A special plea was made to the delegation on policy toward Haiti. Recent U.S. policy toward Haiti was described as good, but as needing to go further. It is uncertain whether the governing council in Haiti will produce a process for democracy, and Venezuela and the United States should collaborate to insure that such a path is followed. A transitional government is obviously required and the current president of the council deserves our trust, but the environment in the country is very unstable and dangerous. There is the potential for external subversion, and the United States and Venezuela should work together to counter any such effort. Venezuela is prepared to use its oil resources as leverage for the democratization of Haiti.

A Venezuelan political leader expressed the view that the search for peace in Central America is tied to the search for economic and social equity, because deprivation can lead directly to violence. Venezuela supports peace in Central America and the Contadora process because events in Central America can affect social and economic progress in Latin America, so Venezuela has a self-interest in what happens there. Violence has been present in Central America for many years, in the form of both guerillas and dictatorships. Those who want to foment violence do not need to undertake a great effort; they do not even need foreign financing because today it can be financed through narco-trafficking.

The Venezuelans expressed a strong commitment to search for peace through the Contadora process. Countries representing 90% of the population of Latin America are behind the most recent Contadora effort, the Declaration of Caraballeda, which seeks to terminate the activities of all irregular forces and stop the arms escalation. The Document of Objectives defines the type of society which is being sought—democracy which is characterized by pluralism, liberty, respect for human rights, free elections, and private enterprise. Unfortunately, not all parties see the Contadora process as a sufficiently serious effort to achieve this objective, but they should today. Contadora has been declared dead many times, and the possibility of negotiations is limited and the process has suffered set backs, but it is strong today, the delegation was told.

Several Venezuelans said that, as the question of assistance to the contras is a matter of internal domestic U.S. politics, they would not address that issue directly.

A member of the delegation explained that the Soviet Union and Cuba are providing assistance to Nicaragua, and if the Contadora nations do not want the United States to provide military assistance to the contras, then they must act quickly. A Venezuelen agreed that the Soviet Union and Cuban interest in the region cannot be ignored and must be removed. Venezuela has had experience with Cuban subversion and with communist influence in its universities and got rid of both. Venezuela knows how to deal with communist elements. The correct path is through political pressure, because if it looks like war is being promoted then the United States will lose public opinion in Latin America. If anyone is to be blamed for the absence of peace, it must be clear who deserves the blame in order to keep public opinion on your side. The forces for democracy have been losing the war in the media. It is time to be less declarative and take actions that will make it clear that it is the Sandinistas and Cuba who are the real aggressors. The Vietnam War was lost in the media, and the same could happen with Nicaragua.

Another said that there has been plenty of good will and political support for Contadora, what has been lacking is the strength to conclude the negotiations. Venezuela appeals to the United States—and to Cuba, the USSR, and Nicaragua, because there is no one source to blame—to reject intervention and to support democratic self-determination, not imposed self-determination. The Sandinistas and the United States have hindered the negotiating process, and both the Sandinistas and the contras must be brought into any dialogue, the one way to find a possible solution. One Venezuelen suggested that President Duarte should be taken up on his proposal to engage in a dialogue with the Salvadorian armed opposition if the Sandinistas would engage in a dialogue with the contras.

Another Venezuelen proposed that Cuba be invited into the negotiations, as Cuba is part of the problem and so must be part of the solution. He suggested, given the fact that Castro has to be worried about the possibility of U.S. intervention, he may be willing to talk and negotiate. Venezuela has told the Sandinistas to open up and pursue democracy, but they are too stubborn and only know how to live with violence. There are potential sources of instability, which could be contagious in Venezuela, so Venezuela has a direct interest in finding peace in Central America. War is good business for some, and can lead to intransigence. An excess of resources can be counterproductive, so one needs to be careful on the use of military resources as they could play into the hands of those seeking to destabilize the hemisphere. Another view was that maybe guns will be necessary, it cannot be ruled out, but only after all other routes have been tried.

It was said that the meeting in Panama April 5-6th is the first time that the foreign ministers of all of the thirteen countries involved in the Contadora process have come together, and at this meeting it will be determined who is really interested in peace—who is interested in negotiations and who is interested in war. The way to demonstrate interest in and support for the Contadora process is to demonstrate a will to implement the Contadora draft treaty. When pressed as to the agenda for the April 5-6th meeting in Panama and what Contadora could accomplish during the ninety-day "window of opportunity", the response was that there is no set agenda but there is great interest in knowing exactly what the Nicaraguan position is and whether it intends to commit to the principles set down in the Contadora documents. The matter of a commission to supervise the Honduran/Nicaraguan border may come up during the meeting, but Venezuela has no position on the adviseability of that proposal.

It was explained to the delegation that the objective of Contadora is not just peace in Central America, but also democracy and freedom in Nicaragua. Certain political promises were made when Somoza was overthrown, but democracy has not evolved, and now the danger is that Central America may be given over to a violent solution. When the delegation was asked its view on the situation in Central America, it was explained that a broad consensus had developed within the U.S. Congress on two issues: that the Sandinistas were not pursuing a democratic course and were moving to establish a Marxist/Leninist structure; and the preferable route to pursue a resolution is through negotiations and the Contadora process.

However, there is disagreement in the United States over the means of achieving the dual objectives of democracy in Nicaragua and an end to Nicaraguan external subversion. Some members feel that the President's policy is correct and military assistance should be provided to the contras, as the only effective way to bring pressure on the Sandinistas, while others believe that both the Sandinistas and the President's policies are wrong and that negotiations should receive greater emphasis and support.

Several Venezuelen political leaders expressed agreement with the U.S. assessment that the Sandinistas are attempting to create a Marxist/Leninist dictatorship, but said there are other means besides military resources to exert pressure. An alternative route is to support the remaining sources of democratic pluralism in the country—the private sector, media, church, labor unions. These groups still exist within Nicaragua. To a large extent they do not agree with the contras and have been calling for a dialogue, and use should be made of these forces for democracy in Nicaragua. The Sandinistas have used the contras and the possibility of a U.S. invasion to justify waging war on these groups, and this excuse should be removed.

One Venezuelen agreed that we cannot just go on and on pursuing negotiations to no conclusion, and made the proposal that one possibility is to force the Sandinistas to hold elections. In 1984 thirty per cent of the vote went against the Sandinistas, even though there was no comprehensive, coordinated opposition. A unique opportunity was lost in 1984 with the failure of the opposition to unite and actively contest the election, so maybe outside pressure could force the holding of new elections.

Another Venezuelen noted that unfortunately elections were held in Nicaragua and that elections are not always a democratic expression, if the government appoints the candidates and announces the results. However, he said it was unfair that the remaining democratic forces in Nicaragua—church, trade unions, etc.—did not share the views of the contras but were having to pay for their actions. He said that some of those groups want dialogue and not support for the contras. However, he said it was also unfair to label the contras as Somozistas just because some of them had been members of Somoza's National Guard.

It was mentioned that the Venezuelen delegation to the April meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Conference in Mexico City will present a resolution which reaffirms support for the efforts of the Contadora Group.

The view was expressed by one Venezuelen political leader that, although Machiavelli may have been correct that sometimes it is necessary to practice diplomacy through other means, war and direct U.S. intervention is too dangerous in Central America. The people of Latin America are of Spanish heritage, so are a proud people and react strongly to foreign intervention. Political pressure must be pursued, because violence simply allows the Sandinistas to strengthen themselves through further militarization of the country.

It was suggested that communism will be very difficult to consolidate in Nicaragua. Nicaragua is different from Cuba. Nicaragua is backward, is not an island, and has a diversified economy. Castro could take over the sugar industry and in that one action essentially nationalized the entire economy. In contrast, the Nicaraguan economy is backward and diversified and would be much more complicated to take over. In addition, in Nicaragua there is a low level of political activity, the church is strong, and the Indians do not speak Spanish and have a strong sense of their own self-determination. When asked by a member of the delegation whether the situation in Nicaragua was not the same as in eastern Europe and Cuba, the answer was "no", because communism has not been consolidated yet in Nicaragua and there are differences among the Sandinista leaders.

Finally, it was suggested that the United States has great moral authority, which is much more powerful than its dollars, and that is what should be exerted. Various Venezuelens with whom the delegation met said it was necessary to put "pressure" on the Sandanistas. Sometimes the pressure was specified as "political", or "Latin". Sometimes it was unspecified. There was never any direct suggestion that it was military pressure that should be applied.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

In the Dominican Republic the congressional delegation met with: President Salvador Jorge Blanco; Foreign Secretary Jose Augusto Vega Imbert; President of the Chamber of Deputies Hugo Tolentino Dipp; President of the Senate (and presidential candidate of the Dominican Revolutionary Party) Jacobo Majulta Azur, and his Vice Presidential candidate Micolas Vargas; former President (and presidential candidate of the Social Chirstian Reformist Party) Joaquin Balaguer, and his vice presidential candidate Carlos Morales Troncoso; and U.S. Ambassador Lowell C. Kilday and the staff of the U.S. Embassy.

The focus of the discussions in the Dominician Republic were on the political developments of the country and the pending elections, the state of the economy, problems with the external debt and sugar exports, and Central America.

Because of the delegation's interest in the situation in Haiti, and in keeping with one of the principal purposes of the trip of reviewing and expressing U.S. support for the new democracies in the hemisphere, the delegation requested and received a briefing from U.S. Ambassador to Haiti Clay McManaway and his political counselor Larry Rossin.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC SITUATION

The delegation commended Dominican government and political leaders for the firm institutionalization of democracy since 1966 and wished them well in the May elections. It was explained to the delegation that, while a strong base for democracy has been laid over the past twenty-five years, that base could be jeopardized, specifically by adverse economic developments. A strong economy is necessary in order for the country to be able to deal with its social problems, and, conversely, economic decline could produce social problems that can endanger democratic institutions.

One Dominican political leader suggested that the United States should provide observors for the May elections. It was explained that this was done for past elections, and that the benefit was in insuring that the conduct of the election was fair and in providing people with confidence that their vote will count and be respected. A member of the delegation explained that the sending of election observers was a matter to be taken up with the U.S. Embassy and the Executive Branch, in response to which the Dominican express skepticism that the Dominican Government would make such a request.

Members of the delegation congratulated the Dominicans for the strong and difficult economic adjustment measures which the government had instituted. In the early 1980's the Dominican Republic faced a spiralling external debt and growing arrearages, a declining price for and exports of sugar, an overvalued exchange rate, a lack of export diversity, and high unemployment. Between 1982 and 1985 the government undertook major economic reforms which led in 1985 to a one-year IMF Standby Agreement, a rescheduling of $800 million in commercial debt, and a Paris Club rescheduling of $280 million in official debt (mostly to the United States).

The reform measures included: devaluation and unification of the exchange rate at a free market rate; monetary and fiscal discipline; and reduction in subsidies, including increased prices for petroleum products, electricity, and basic food items; curbed money supply growth; and a stop to printing money to finance the government deficit.

The United States assisted the Dominican Republic through this adjustment process, most importantly in 1984 in providing a $50 million ESF loan which enabled the government to initiate the structural adjustment program (including the unified exchange rate) and also in 1984 a further $40 million ESF loan which assisted the country to meet the performance criteria under the IMF Standby Agreement and thereby permitting the commercial and official debt rescheduling.

One Dominican political leader with whom the delegation met expressed the view that the government's economic program had been inadequate and that what was needed was greater fiscal austerity and a reduction in the size of the government bureacracy.

Having gone through this painful adjustment process, the Dominican Republic is now facing an improved economic outlook, including favorable international trends in the form of lower oil prices (saving over $100 million), lower interest rates, and higher coffee and gold prices. The negative side remains sugar, with continued low international prices, reduced access to the U.S. market, and a lower than average production. Inflation, which hit an annual rate of 70 percent in the month of January 1985, is projected at 15 percent for 1986. Expectations for 1986 are for minimal growth, which has been characteristic of the economy during the first half of the 1980's, and for a continued balance of payment and trade deficit.

TRADE/ECONOMIC ISSUES

Sugar

All of the Dominican officals and political leaders with whom the delegation met raised the issue of sugar. It clearly is the principal economic issue in the country and to the Dominican perspective of relations with the United States. The Dominicans explained the importance of sugar to the Dominican economy and the economic setback which had occurred in recent years. The sugar industry provides the Dominican Republic with 40 percent of its total exports and 35 percent of foreign exchange earnings. One out of every ten Dominicans derives his daily livelihood from the sugar industry. In 1981 the Dominican Republic shipped 747,000 tons of sugar to the United States valued at $414 million. The sugar quota has been steadily cut, and in 1986 the quota will be 276 tons. When combined with low international prices and reduced harvesting, 1986 export revenues from sugar are expected to be around $145 million.

The Dominicans explained that economic difficulties were being incurred, not just because of the reduced sugar quota, but also because of the manner in which they were being applied this year. Rather than being set on a quarterly basis, they are now administered on a monthly basis. The Dominican Republic traditionally has exported at the beginning of the quarter, so it now finds itself short of working capital. One Dominican said that a further difficulty is the inefficiency of the state owned sugar industry. The deficit of the Dominican Sugar Council had been gradually reduced since 1982, but low prices and the reduction in the U.S.

sugar quota has reversed that positive trend.

The current difficulty with the harvest was explained as arising from delay in commencing the harvest and from the inadequate availability of Haitian workers. At the beginning of the harvest season, just days before Jean-Claude Duvailier left Haiti in early February, the Dominican government provided $2 million to the Haitian government for the annual recruitment of workers to harvest the sugar crop. The $2 million disappeared, and the workers never arrived in the Dominican Republic. The country is attempting to substitute with military and civilian Dominican workers, and Haitian workers already in the country, but the harvest is 50 percent behind last year. Other difficulties of the Dominican sugar industry were identified as the inefficiency of the state-run lands and mills and over production by Cuba and the European community.

External debt

The other priority economic issue that is substantially affected by external developments is the country's debt. By the end of 1984 the external debt had grown to $3.4 billion. The economic reforms and the reschedulings outlined above rescued the country from near financial bankruptcy. Debt servicing requirements were 44 percent of exports in 1983 and 31 percent in 1985. The Dominicans with whom the congressional delegation met said that the external debt remains a serious problem.

The view was expressed that the democratic process could be sustained only through a process of further development, but that development was being jeopardized by the debt overhang. It was suggested that the external debt can no longer be paid for with poverty and that the Cartegena Group has presented a clear formula—debt service must be adjusted to a country's level of foreign exchange earnings. Statistics demonstrate that in the past several years Latin America has exported more capital than it has imported, a serious reversal of historic trends. What is needed is a reactivation of the world economy and a reduction in trade barriers.

CBI

The Dominicans also raised the matter of the Caribbean Basin Initiative and explained that the Dominican Republic had benefitted from the initiative. They produced statistics which showed that for the years 1984–1985, the CBI had bought fifty-five investments in agribusiness worth $280.6 million and creating 6,728 jobs, and 102 investments in free trade zones worth $368.4 million and employing 17,745 people. The deficiencies that were noted were insufficient financial resources and restricted access to U.S. markets. 1985 non-traditional exports were 9.5% above their 1984 level.

Book piracy

The other economic/trade issue discussed was piracy of intellectual property. A member of the delegation explained that there was concern in the United States over the illegal publication of American copyrighted books and inquired as to the prospects for legislation to remedy this problem. It was explained that remedial legislation had passed a first reading in the Chamber of Deputies, but that a second reading had been delayed by the difficulty in securing a quorum because members were campaigning for the May elections. The assessment was given that the bill would pass a second reading, after which it would be considered by the Senate.

CENTRAL AMERICA

The matter of Central America was also discussed in the meetings, although not to the extent as in the other three countries visited by the delegation. One Dominican expressed the view that there is concern in the Dominican Republic over developments in Central America because they could affect the Caribbean. He also said that we are now seeing the harvesting of seeds sown in the past—seeds produced by a monopoly by a few of the productive assets, which had produced misery and provided the base for civil unrest. He further asserted that it is important to learn from the lessons of the past that a lack of social justice produces social discontent which leads to violence. It is important to create conditions where people do not lose faith in democracy. The United States' role is vital to achieving that goal. It was further explained that Latins are a proud people, but, if treated fairly by the United States, they will respect the United States.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS

Democracy.—The new democracies visited by the congressional delegation are strong and vibrant, but their political leaders are concerned that they could be subject to instability due to economic difficulties, particularly due to the external debt burden. The congressional delegation understands and appreciates this concern and hopes that the United States Government will continue and enhance its efforts to work with these countries to overcome their economic difficulties.

Debt.—The external debt situation is one of the principal issues of concern in Latin America. These countries are increasingly coming to see the external debt as not just an economic/financial matter, but also as a political problem, and are calling for it to be dealt with in a political context. While admitting to some irresponsible borrowing and use of the loans on their part, they see the debt burden as having spiralled due to the run-up of interest rates in the early 1980's and to their continuance at an historic real high today, and they are asking why and how long they have to pay for the U.S. domestic budget deficit.

The congressional delegation is convinced that the debt servicing burden is restricting a return to economic prosperity, which can have serious potential political ramifications, particularly in the new democracies. The delegation hopes that a reduction in the U.S. fiscal deficit and other actions will bring a continued decline in interest rates and calls on the U.S. Government and commercial banks to devote renewed effort to finding means of easing this burden.

Trade.—The congressional delegation found in all of the countries visited a perception of rising protectionist sentiment in the United States and a concern over possible increased restriction of access of U.S. markets, with a special concern in the Dominican Republic over its reduced exports of sugar to the United States and in Venezuela over proposals for an oil import fee. The congressional delegation did not find a concomitant recognition and appreciation of the extent to which U.S. exports and investments are restricted from access to those economies due to trade barriers, subsidies, and restricted investment policies. The congressional delegation emphasized the U.S. concern and explained that the House of Representatives will consider trade legislation in May which will demand fair and reciprocal trade relations, but hopefully will not be protectionist.

Central America.—The congressional delegation engaged in wide-ranging discussions on Central America in all of the countries visited. The delegation explained the current prevailing view in the United States: that there is a consensus that the Sandinistas were pursuing a route to totalitarianism and communism and that their support for external subversion was unacceptable, but no consensus over the policy options to pursue a change in that behaviour. Several members of the delegation also expressed an urgency over achieving substantial movement in the Contadora process toward a peaceful solution during the ninety-day period which is likely to be provided in legislation that may be passed by Congress; otherwise, military assistance to the contras will be renewed.

The government and political leaders with whom the congressional delegation met expressed the following views:

Strong support for the Contadora process and negotiations, and the importance of the United States strongly supporting those efforts.

Concern that direct U.S intervention could have serious adverse repercussions on public opinion in Latin America and could even be politically destabilizing in some countries.

Athough many shared the U.S. concern over the nature of the Sandinista regime and its support for subversion, there was no overall consensus.

Many called for external pressure on the Sandinistas, with the pressure called for being identified as "Latin", "political", "moral", or unspecified.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

A bill of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 290. An act for the relief of Catherine and Robert Fossez; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to the enrolled bill and joint resolutions of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1282. An act to amend the Public Health Service Act to revise and extend the programs of assistance for primary health care;

S.J. Res. 136. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating the calendar week beginning with Sunday, April 13, 1986, as "National Garden Week"; and

S.J. Res. 315. Joint resolution designating May 1986 as "Older Americans Month."

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 p.m.) under its previous order, the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 16, 1986, at 10 a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

3300. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Comptroller), transmitting a listing of contract award dates for the period May 1, 1986 to June 30, 1986, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 139(b); to the Committee on Armed Services.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

305. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the city council of Detroit, MI, relative to Public Law 93-531; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

306. Also, petition of the council of the Borough of Ringwood, NJ, relative to an amendment to the 16th amendment to the Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 281

By Mr. JEFFORDS:

(Amendment in the nature of a substitute.)

—Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Constitution Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1986".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 2(2) of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. 152(2)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In the construction industry, any two or more business entities performing the same or similar work in the same geographical area and having common ownership, management or control, shall be deemed a single employer if there is a practice of interchanging employees among the entities or if any such entity directly competes with or intentionally deprives other such entities of work."

(b) Section 8(d) of such Act (29 U.S.C. 158(d)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Whenever the collective bargaining involves employees of a business entity comprising part of a single employer in the construction industry, as defined in section 2(2) of this Act, the duty to bargain collectively, for the purposes of this section, shall include the duty to apply the terms of a collective bargaining agreement between such business entity and a labor organization to all other business entities comprising the single employer within the geographical area covered by the agreement: Provided, That the employees of the combined business entity covered by the agreement constitute an appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining, consistent with section 9(b) of this Act.".

(c) Section 8(e) of such Act (29 U.S.C. 158(e)) is amended by inserting before the colon at the end of the first proviso of such section the following new proviso: ": Provided further, That nothing in this subsection (e) shall be construed to prohibit any agreement between a labor organization and an employer in the construction industry form including any prohibition, restriction, or requirement on such employer with regard to the ownership, management, or control of other business entities in the same geographic area that are engaged in work similar to that performed by the employees in the bargaining unit".

(d) Section 8(f) of such Act (29 U.S.C. 158(f)) is amended—

(1) by striking out " geographical area:" in clause (4) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "geographical area. An agreement lawfully made pursuant to this subsection shall impose the same obligations under the Act as an agreement made with a majority representative pursuant to section 9(a):"; and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end of such section the following new proviso: ": Provided further, That any agreement lawfully made pursuant to this subsection may be repudiated at any given site only where (A) at least 30 days after the hiring of the first employee under such agreement at such site, the employer, based upon objective considerations and after compliance with any requirements in such agreement permitted by clause (3) of this subsection, determines that the majority status of such labor organization at such site has not been established or is no longer present; or (B) the Board certifies the results of an election conducted pursuant to section 9(c), in which a majority of employees in an appropriate bargaining unit selects a bargaining representative other than the labor organization with which such agreement was made or chooses not to be represented by a labor organization.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SOLIDARITY SUNDAY FOR SOVIET JEWRY

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, once again I am privileged to introduce the congressional resolution of support for Soviet Jewry. Each year, to highlight the plight of those denied their religious and cultural rights under international law, the Coalition to Free Soviet Jews, in New York City, organizes a massive rally at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza opposite the United Nations. Nearby are the Shcharansky Steps, which for years commemorated the daily struggle of Anatoly Shcharansky as he languished in a Soviet prison under the false charge of treason. Yet, on May 11, 1986, hundreds of thousands of concerned citizens will stand in solidarity with Soviet Jewry, and will hear the words of the newly freed Anatoly Shcharansky.

This past year has been a time of both joy and frustration to those of us concerned about the plight or Soviet Jewry. Apparently, the recent summit meeting between President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev, helped to bring about the release of several well-known long-term refuseniks and former Prisoners of Conscience, including Dr. Mark Nashpitz, a Moscow dentist with whom I had been corresponding for almost 15 years, and Ilya Essas, a self-taught Hebrew and religious teacher who became the focal point in Moscow for observant Jews. these two men were in Washington recently, where many Members of Congress had the opportunity to meet with them.

Yet, from a high point of over 51,000 in 1979, we saw emigration plummet in the early 1980's. And in 1985, only 1,140 Jewish men, women, and children were allowed to participate in the reunification process as provided for by the Helsinki Final Act.

During the past year, we have also seen other innocent people arrested, harassed, and interrogated for no other reason than they had expressed their desire to emigrate to Israel. Yakov Berenshtein's sight is almost completely gone as a result of having been beaten by criminals in his prison, POC Yuli Edelshtein lies in a hospital, the victim of a badly shattered broken leg and ruptured urethra associated with a suspicious accident while on a construction project at his labor camp.

These innocent people continue to suffer, as do all those who make the decision to apply to emigrate. There are almost 400,000 individuals who are at some point in the application process. Once their decision to emigrate is made, loss of employment is almost certain to follow. Once unemployed, such an individual risks arrest on the charge of parasitism. If the applicant is younger, he most certainly risks being drafted into the Soviet Army, which automatically carries with it the knowledge of state secrets for at least 5 years, certain grounds for emigration refusal. There are so many obstacles ahead of one who decides to emigrate, and so much official discrimination and persecution, that those who pursue their dream are to be admired. They suffer for their principles, but they will not be bowed.

Mr. Speaker, Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry is our annual opportunity in the House of Representatives to make known our commitment to human rights. When Anatoly and Avital Shcharansky ascend the platform on Solidarity Sunday, the free world will see for itself a shining example of the triumph of the human spirit in the face of adversity. Yet we cannot forget the hundreds of thousands who are left behind the Iron Curtain. It is for them that we must continue to speak out, until all those who desire to practice their religious and cultural heritage freely are allowed to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I request that at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the full text of this resolution be printed, and I invite our colleagues to cosponsor this important measure. I anticipate floor action in the very near future, and will be conducting a special order in the week prior to Solidarity Sunday.

H. RES. 420

Whereas on May 11, 1986, the constituent agencies of the Coalition to Free Soviet Jews will convene the fifteenth annual "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" in reaffirmation of the American People's resolve to secure freedom for Soviet Jews and beleaguered persons everywhere;

Whereas Americans of all faiths will join in myriad activities on that day in public expression of solidarity with the long suffering Jewish community in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the right to emigrate freely and to be reunited with one's family abroad is denied Jews and many others in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations, and the Helsinki Final Act explicitly assert guarantees of those rights;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union has nevertheless continued to restrict emigration, particularly in the last few months, when the number of Jews allowed to emigrate has declined to extremely low levels;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union is persecuting its Jewish citizens and denying them even those few rights and privileges accorded other recognized religions in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union discriminates against Jewish cultural activities by banning and suspending Hebrew and Jewish cultural classes, by arresting teachers of Hebrew, and by harassing those Soviet Jews who seek only to practice their religion;

Whereas a virulent anti-Semitic campaign continues unabated in the Soviet Union and Soviet Jews are increasingly deprived of occupational and educational opportunities;

Whereas thousands of innocent Jews and other persons, having applied to leave the Soviet Union, have been subjected to immediate induction into the armed forces, improper incarceration in mental institutions, expulsion from school, and constant surveillance and harassment;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union will not succeed in isolating Soviet Jews from their friends in the free world so long as those who cherish liberty continue to speak on behalf of beleaguered people everywhere;

Whereas "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" shall provide vigorous expression of American determination to secure freedom for Soviet Jewish prisoners of conscience incarcerated solely for their desire to emigrate; and

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union refuses to permit the free exercise of religious beliefs and cultural expression and also refuses to remove all obstacles to the free emigration of its Jewish citizens and others who wish to leave and live in other countries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives hereby expresses its full support for "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry", to be held on May 11, 1986, and encourages Americans to participate in the activities of that day.

TRADE LAW IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1986

HON. DENNIS E. ECKART

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today, I along with my distinguished colleague and congressional neighbor JIM TRAFICANT, am introducing the Trade Law Improvement Act of 1986. Both Representative TRAFICANT and myself have worked hard to bring jobs back to northeast Ohio by promoting our local businesses and industries. This bill takes urgently needed steps to save both local and national industries from the invasion of unfairly produced imports which are threatening our economy and endangering jobs in America and in northeast Ohio.

Over the course of the past 5 years, this Nation has suffered a steady erosion of its ability to compete in the international marketplace. This problem has rapidly approached epidemic proportions. Last year, the United States imported $148 billion more in goods than we exported, causing the largest trade deficit in our Nation's history and turning us into a debtor nation. This staggering figure represents a nearly fivefold increase over the 1980 trade deficit of just $30 billion.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.
Matter set in this typeface indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

The unavoidable bottom line of this crisis is lost jobs for Ohioans. Over 140,000 Ohioans in auto-related industries have lost jobs due to the import invasion, more than 20,000 people lost their steel-related jobs, and in northeast Ohio alone, tens of thousands of jobs have fallen prey to the growing trade imbalance. In areas like Ashtabula, OH, where unemployment still hovers above 15 percent, and Trumbull County, OH, with an unemployment rate over 12 percent, this comes as no surprise. We are not strangers to the economic devastation and personal ruin brought about by the unfair trade practices which this administration has allowed to exist and proliferate. The administration continues to perilously cling to its weak adherence to free trade while other nations subsidize their industries and erect barriers against American products at their borders.

What has become most disturbing and in need of immediate remedy is the discovery that our Government's current trade laws not only allow this uneven international playing field to exist, they are helping to tip it further from our advantage. The specific problems encountered by RMI Corp., based in Niles, OH, with plants in Ashtabula County and elsewhere, only serve to illustrate the glaring inequities in our trade law which are similarly hurting other industries nationwide. The 1983 contract award for the purchase of titanium sponge by the General Services Administration [GSA] handed 80 percent of the contract to foreign producers at dumped prices. This action blatantly ignored buy-American requirements, favored goods produced unfairly in foreign countries, and threatened our Nation's national security interests. Titanium sponge is a critical element in the manufacture of crucial defense components. It is, therefore, unconscionable that our own trade practices would allow for the development and advancement of foreign manufacturers of this strategic product to the detriment and potential destruction of domestic producers.

This bill contains several key provisions to help level the playing field and erode the barriers to fair and free trade:

It closes existing loopholes in the antidumping laws for certain purchases by the Federal Government to ensure that imports are priced at fair value and domestic producers can compete evenly and openly.

It requires that companies responding to Commerce Department inquiries in antidumping and countervailing duties certify their responses as accurate.

It gives producers injured by customs fraud a private cause of action against the persons involved in the fraud. Widespread customs fraud has recently been discovered in connection with imports of steel and textile products—industries especially hard hit by unfair trade practices.

It provides a workable private cause of action for damages caused by dumping. Existing provisions are revised by the bill to make a more meaningful remedy for damages caused by dumping, as well as to provide a deterrent to future dumping.

Trade policy and the U.S. trade deficit are among the biggest issues facing Congress this year. This bill offers relief to specific aspects of what is indeed a much larger ailment. It is vitally important that any—and all—efforts be made to shape a workable and practical trade policy for America. This proposal which Representative TRAFICANT and I are introducing today takes us one step closer toward achieving that goal.

THE TRADE LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 1986

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to be joining my colleague, Representative DENNIS ECKART, in introducing the Trade Law Enforcement Act of 1986.

In the fall of 1985, representatives of the RMI Co. of my congressional district brought to my attention a disturbing case of how our own U.S. trade and tariff laws were injuring American industry, making it more difficult and in some circumstances impossible to compete in the international marketplace. RMI's particular case of discovering the U.S. purchase of illegally dumped titanium from foreign manufacturers instead of from an adequate domestic industry is literally just the tip of the iceberg in the question of fair trade.

The legislation we are introducing today, the Trade Law Enforcement Act of 1986 addresses the concerns of domestic industries in order to bring a fairer trade policy forward. Specifically, the closing of existing loopholes in the antidumping laws for certain purchases by the Federal Government will insure the opportunity of competition to domestic producers. Likewise, it provides for a private cause of action for damages sustained by "dumping," a situation occurring when a foreign company sells large quantities of a resource or product in U.S. markets at prices below market value. Current U.S. trade law makes this practice illegal and requires a stiff duty be imposed on illegally dumped goods. However, goods purchased by the Federal Government for the national defense stockpile are exempt from this action.

This bill will have a significant impact on the trade policy of this Nation—a policy that desperately needs to be reformed in order to save American jobs and America's industry. Faced with the largest trade deficit in this Nation's history the threat of more U.S. plants closing; and the despair of our unemployed Americans, action must be taken immediately. The Trade Law Enforcement Act as introduced by Mr. ECKART and myself will provide some relief to these problems and reflect a move toward a trade policy that is both fair and just in responding to the pressing needs of our Nation.

I urge my colleagues to join us in sponsoring this important trade legislation.

THE MAJORITY WHIP ON CONTRA AID

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an excellent article by THOMAS S. FOLEY, majority whip of the House. His views on the Contra aid question deserve careful consideration before this body votes on this issue again. This article appeared in the Washington Post April 15, 1986, and the text follows:

CONTRA AID: AN ACT OF WAR

(By Thomas S. Foley)

Today the House will revisit the contra aid debate. Shortly before the last vote in the House the administration abandoned its erstwhile strategy of all or nothing on the contra issue. Its new strategy has two facets. On the one hand, it has begun to offer paper compromises. On the other, it has tried to develop some public relations event equivalent to last year's famous trip to Moscow by Nicaraguan leader Daniel Ortega.

Despite strenuous effort, the administration has been unable to rally convincing majorities of the public or Congress to its position. The week following the last House vote on contra aid, the Senate voted by a narrow margin to approve a "compromise" plan which many regard as little more than a cosmetic makeover of the president's original proposal. Key features of that plan were that "only" one quarter of the $100 million, 18-month financing would be available in the first 90 days, only "defensive" weapons could be bought and the president could not release the remaining funds until an additional 15 days had expired, 15 days in which Congress could veto the decision to release the remaining funds and the president could veto any such congressional action. A thinner compromise could hardly be imagined and, indeed, only a thin majority of the Senate supported the president where he had hoped for an overwhelming vote.

But before the Senate vote, the administration believed the public relations coup it has so fervently desired had fallen into its hands, a highly trumpeted "invasion" of Honduras by Nicaraguan troops in pursuit of the contras. Originally the administration had difficulty in persuading the Hondurans that they should acknowledge the event at all. Their reluctance was understandable in light of the fact that the Nicaraguan action may have been larger than normal but nevertheless closely resembled hundreds of similar reported incidents over the last five years. For Honduras to raise a public outcry would, in its view, publicly acknowledge that the contras were being allowed to stay in Honduras.

Congressional leaders of both parties said the "invasion" had had little or not effect on the Senate vote. In the face of subsequent intelligence and press reports, which substantially reduced the scale of the incident, the administration's public relations machine has had no choice but to seek a new approach.

Now, before the second vote in the House, the administration has launched a new offensive on the Contadora front. The president says the Nicaraguans have "torpedoed" the Contradora peace process with their latest rejection of a proposed document that called on them to reduce their armed forces without their first being a cut-off in aid to the contras. Diplomatic damage experts have noted that the disappointment of the Contadora negotiators with the latest action by the Nicaraguan representatives was obvious. But the communique issued by the Contadora nations after the recent breakup contemplates getting back to work as soon as possible. It does not resemble an obituary. Nevertheless the administration has seized on the latest development and is now trying to exaggerate its consequence in yet another attempt to weaken opposition to its proposal, a proposal which would wring from both houses a reluctant declaration of a proxy war in Nicaragua.

The Contadora negotiators continually point to the fact that the contras merely frustrate the Contadora process. The Central American nations know what they want from negotiations: regional security. But the administration wants the Sandinistas to negotiate cession of power, a concession it also says it never expects them to give without military defeat by the contras. Yet the continuation of the contra war will reduce, not enhance the security of Nicaragua's neighbors. The administration appears confused about its own goals and in any case is acting at cross purpose to Contadora, as the Latin Americans view it.

We should make no mistake. This is not a one-time vote for $100 million. We are on the eve of a historic decision. This vote is merely a down payment on hundreds of millions, perhaps billions to come over many years in support of the contras (indeed we have already spent $1 billion on military preparations in Central America). Much more important than the money, however, is the unprecedented and damaging decision we are about to make to support and finance the proxy invasion of a foreign country with which, for whatever purpose, we maintain diplomatic relations. This course of action sweeps aside the president's own stated concern, only a year ago, that to pursue such a course would be an act of war. In any case, our action would be totally unilateral with no support from our allies anywhere on the globe.

We desperately need a better strategy regarding Nicaragua and, despite the recent setback, Contadora is that strategy.

The Contadora process is far from dead. On the contrary, it has been the administration's own refusal to promote Contadora that has deprived the process of its moral authority to pressure the Nicaraguans. We have been unable to exploit the Nicaraguans' recent action because the other Latin American participants do not view us as supporting Contadora. Reports say that several Central American foreign ministers have come away with the impression that their recent visits from U.S. envoys were actually attempts to undermine Contadora.

If we were wholeheartedly to support the Contadora process, we would vastly improve its possibilities for guaranteeing regional security, U.S. security and liberalization of the Nicaraguans' internal policies. The current policy of aid to the contras, accompanied by lip service support of Contadora, allows the Sandinistas plausibly to claim that their internal repressive policies, their military build-up, their reliance on thousands of Cuban advisers, their close ties to Moscow and their reluctance to negotiate are all the result of their need to repel the American-sponsored contra invasion.

The Contadora process offers us many opportunities to pressure Nicaragua productively that we do not now have. We would have the support of the rest of Central America to pressure Nicaragua to reduce its armed forces, expel the Cubans, honor its borders and cease support for insurgencies in other countries. We do not now have the support of those countries. We would have the support of the entire Western world when we pressured the Sandinistas to cease their lockdown of Nicaraguan society and honor basic human rights principles there. We do not have such support for our policy of backing the contras.

Some suggest that only the contras can put productive pressure on the Sandinistas, but we must remember that Nicaragua has a weak economy, totally dependent on world trade. Western opinion, if it is united, will mean a great deal to them, and they can ill afford to continue to disillusion Western democracies with their repressive internal policies.

Some Contadora ministers have confided that the contras are the best thing to happen to the Sandinistas in Nicaragua. The story goes that the Sandinistas can survive years of war with ease, but six months of peace would be a terrible threat because of the natural political pressures that would develop within Nicaragua.

If Contadora were ultimately to succeed, and with the enthusiastic backing of the United States, the pressure on Nicaragua to cooperate would be intense, and we would have the moral authority and international support to militarily back up the treaty if that ever became necessary.

What are the risks of Contadora? We need not fear the military loss of Central America while talks continue. Congress will support any action to repel Nicaraguan aggression against its neighbors, or to prevent the introduction of advanced weaponry or to prevent the use of Nicaragua as a base for Soviet and Cuban main forces. Our steady policy of strong support for the other democracies in the region has lessened the Nicaraguans opportunities for subversion, and we should continue that policy with determination. This is the approach that all the Central American countries we are trying to help urge upon us.

In contrast to Contadora, what risks does the continued policy of support for the contras present? What will we do if, after hundreds of millions of dollars, years of support, training and equipment and an incalculable investment of American political and diplomatic currency, the contras eventually face defeat? What if they face decimation or capture? Will we never send our own forces to help them no matter how desperate their situation? Or will we leave them to their fate in a giant replay of the Bay of Pigs? Will we then be negotiating to save the contras rather than to reform Nicaragua?

Perhaps I view the contras' prospects too pessimistically, although the overwhelming weight of American intelligence and military opinion, some of it on the public record, agrees that the contras have no chance of military victory. A bloody stalemate is their best hope, and even this analysis assumes a static situation without escalation on the other side.

I accept President Reagan's assurance that he has no present intention to send American troops to Nicaragua. But the president's present intentions are not what will determine the outcome. We have all witnessed this inexorable process before. As our commitment increases, our options dwindle, and the day when we are out of options grows nearer.

I have trouble understanding the administration's strategy. On the one hand they say that the contras really don't have to win. They need only stalemate the sandinistas to force them to the bargaining table to negotiate internal reforms in Nicaragua. But administration officials also almost invariably say that no Marxist-Leninist regime will ever voluntarily relinquish power. They often publicly use that as reason why direct U.S.-Nicaragua talks will not succeed. Stalemate will not be good enough. The contras must win or the Sandinistas will simply keep fighting with all the resources they can command or that the Soviets and Cubans can provide. If the contras must win, we must decide now what we are willing to do to ensure their victory, and if we are not prepared to use American forces we must be prepared to accept the possible defeat of our proxy army and the resultant embarrassment to ourselves.

In short, the contra option is a prescription for an unprecedented U.S. proxy invasion of a country with which we are not at war, a proxy invasion with almost no chance of military victory without American participation and no chance of productive results short of victory. Compared with the sometimes difficult course of negotiations, military action seems strong and decisive, but it is fraught with terrible risks. It leaves us with the probable choice of having to use our own forces or accept the defeat of the army we have armed and suborned. Compared with this, Contadora remains the compelling choice.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICAN YOUTH

HON. JERRY HUCKABY

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, our youth of today, as our leaders of tomorrow, will face some stiff challenges in the years ahead. They may very well face a world and a lifestyle unlike what we have today.

For that reason, I am always impressed when I come across the accomplishment of a young person that shows strength of purpose and a realization of what lies ahead.

Mark Oliver of Bastrop, LA, one of my constituents, is such a young man. He was the Louisiana winner in the VFW Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program, a program which has challenged our youth to think responsibly for 38 years.

I commend for your attention the script written by Mark Oliver. I think you will be impressed with him as I was.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

(By Mark Oliver)

A few days ago, as I was sitting quietly, thinking on this topic, how I could tell you exactly the things I wanted to tell you about it, an idea came to me, so I got in my car and I drove out to a nearby field.

The field was large and wide, and there were no trees as far as the eye could see. So as I stood there, feet planted firmly in the wet grass, looking toward a beautiful sunset, I was able to see the most perfectly clear horizon that I've ever seen. But it was then that all these things on which I had been thinking came together, and they made sense.

That horizon out there is like a goal, a destination, it's the future. I felt as if I would walk across that field, I would soon be there standing on the horizon I saw in the distance.

But the truth is with every step I would have made in that direction I would have created a new horizon for myself. Oh, if I had kept on, I would have eventually have gotten to the spot where I saw the first line, but from there I would see a new horizon, a new goal, a new destination, and a new future.

For you see, there really is no such thing as a horizon. The sky really doesn't meet the earth. It only appears to. But unless we, as America's youth have something to look toward, a horizon to walk toward, our feet will remain firmly planted in the wet grass, and we will go nowhere.

Just as I had to step out of my nice dry home, and go and stand in that wet field, to see that physical horizon; we as America's youth are going to have to step out to see our horizon's. We have to picture them. You can't begin your journey to the future on the horizon until you know where it is, until you've caught a vision of it.

But now understand this; the field where I stood was a rare sort. I haven't seen very many fields that are that broad and that bare, and thus with a horizon that clear. Oh, there is one place you can always see a perfect horizon: and that's standing on the sea, and looking out over the seemingly calm waters, but those are the hardest and most dangerous of all horizons to reach.

This occurred to me as I was returning home that evening and had looked out to see behind a small hill covered with trees, the beautiful colors of the sunset; red, orange, and purple radiating in the sky.

You see, most of our horizons are much harder to see. Sometimes we have to start by just following the signs. Now I knew there was a horizon over that hill, and if there wasn't, and all I found was another hill, well, as long as I could see the light I'd know that the horizon was there, just over that hill or perhaps the next. A new horizon for an American youth.

Oh, thank God I'm an American youth. I took a picture of that perfect and clear horizon. And when I returned home I sat down with that picture. I reached into my desk and took out a roll of dark tape, and with the tape I covered the horizon. In the picture now I could see a glow rising above the dark band that was like a wall between me and it. If that was my horizon on the other side of that wall, it didn't look like I would ever be able to reach it. Just like many young men and women in other nations around the world have set their eyes to a goal, a destination, or a future; but can't get over the wall that's been built in front of them. Oh, thank God I'm an American youth, and if any of you listening to me have ever fought for my freedom, I thank you, because of you I can reach for my horizons.

Basically, what I'm trying to say to you and the youth of America is that first of all we, the future leaders and protectors of our nation must get out and look for new horizons, and realize that as we travel toward them they change, and become anew every day. And it's very rare one sees a destination clearly and unobstructed, and if one does there is more often than not unforeseen dangers lying ahead. In most cases our horizon is over a hill or behind some trees, but it's there all the same. And as long as we catch a vision of it and where we're going, we can get there; and when we do . . . we'll find a new horizon, a new goal, a new destination, and a new future.

MONEY LAUNDERING

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, the Oversight Subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means has investigated problems associated with money laundering. The subcommittee held a hearing, last year, focusing specifically on the responsibilities of the Internal Revenue Service in this area. In addition, several members of the subcommittee toured the IRS training facilities at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Glynco, GA, to learn more about the IRS enforcement in this area.

Our subcommittee's investigation resulted in two important findings. We found that because of loopholes in the current law, the Government has been unable to successfully prosecute the person who puts together schemes that allow illegal source cash to be laundered. We also found that problems existed in the ability of IRS to seize illegal source income when a criminal, such as the drug dealer, launders his illegal source income through domestic financial institutions.

We as a nation, are losing our battle against the flow of illegal drugs. Money laundering is an intricate part of the drug trafficking process. Therefore, any efforts to try to stop the drug traffic must stop the money laundering associated with it. Also, I should point out that businesses and individuals in the United States are laundering income, from both illegal and legal activities. This problem is a growing one. As a result, I am concerned about the impact of money laundering operations on the collection of U.S. Federal income taxes.

As members are aware, the enforcement of the Bank Secrecy Act reporting requirements is the responsibility of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has delegated his authority to the IRS. Under current law, domestic financial institutions must report cash transactions of $10,000 or more to the Internal Revenue Service. In a typical scheme, money launderers often break up large sums of money, into transactions of less than $10,000, to avoid having the financial institutions report the cash.

I asked the administration to work with me in drafting legislation that will close loopholes in the law that have not allowed the government to successfully prosecute money launderers and will give the IRS adequate seizure and forfeiture authority. The bill I am introducing today, "The Money Laundering Prevention Act of 1986," represents the results of this joint effort. This bill (H.R. 4523) was drafted by the administration with close consultation with my staff. The bill closes the loopholes in current law which allow the money launderer to escape conviction and provides the IRS with seizure and forfeiture authority when there are violations of Bank Secrecy Act reporting requirements.

The bill, as drafted, is primarily under the jurisdiction of the House Banking, Financing and Urban Affairs Committee. I will share the proposal, with its distinguished chairman, Mr. ST. GERMAIN and members of that committee. I am confident that this committee will proceed to carefully evaluate this legislation.

Before I outline my bill, I think one thing should be made clear. The administration has developed its own comprehensive approach to address the entire area of money laundering. Their proposals are being actively worked on in the House and Senate Judiciary Committees. I encourage all efforts in this area.

My bill, which has administration support, is designed to complement other money laundering proposals. My bill, even if it is enacted on its own, will be a useful addition to current law in combating money laundering activities.

Let me briefly outline this legislation. H.R. 4573 does the following:

Section 1 of my bill expressly subjects persons to criminal and civil liability where they cause or attempt to cause an institution to fail to file a required report or an incorrect report. This will be helpful in not only getting the smurf who does the actual transaction, but also those who plan the activity. This would also allow Treasury and IRS to act before the 15 days the financial institution has to formally file a CTR report.

Also, the bill creates an offense of structuring or assisting in structuring a transaction to evade the reporting requirements. For example, this provision would prohibit the structuring of a transaction to circumvent the reporting requirements by involving two or more financial institutions.

Section 2 of my bill allows forfeiture and seizure authority to be used by the IRS to seize laundered cash and property directly traceable to the laundered cash. Thus, both the IRS and the Customs Service will be able to use seizure and forfeiture authority more effectively to get the money or the property before it disappears.

However, there are protections in my bill for innocent third parties. If a person proves he was a good faith bona fide purchaser or could prove that it was not a willful violation, he would not be subject to forfeiture.

Section 3 of my legislation provides a new civil penalty for violations of the Bank Secrecy Act. The amount of the penalty would be the difference between the amount forfeited under section 2 and the total amount of the laundering transaction. Again, the standard for this new civil penalty would be a willful violation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe the need for this legislation is obvious. Federal courts have taken the position that there is inadequate legislative authority to prosecute people who are actively engaged in money laundering operations. At a minimum, this loophole should be closed forever. Under my bill, it would be. Also, for the first time, this legislation will allow the Internal Revenue Service to seize and forfeit cash and property that is involved in a violation of the Bank Secrecy Act. As members may know, laundered money cannot be seized because there is difficulty in proving that there is a nexus between the laundered money and a criminal activity. In most cases, the case involves illegal drugs. My bill also represents a careful effort to strengthen IRS enforcement authority against money laundering, while at the same time, protects third parties.

H.R. 4573

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Bank Secrecy Act (31 U.S.C. 5311 et seq.) is amended as follows:

SECTION 1. Section 5313 of Title 31 of the United States Code is amended by adding to the end of subsection (a) a sentence which reads as follows:

No person shall cause or attempt to cause a domestic financial institution to fail to file a report required by this subsection, shall cause or attempt to cause a domestic financial institution to file a report required by this subsection that contains a material omission or misstatement of fact, or shall structure or assist in structuring a transaction for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements of this subsection.

SEC. 2. Section 5317 of Title 31 of the United States Code is amended by:

a. Revising the first sentence of section 5317(c) of Title 31 of the United States Code to read as follows:

(c) A monetary instrument being transported, or which has been transported, or any interest in any property, including any deposit in a financial institution, traceable to such instrument, may be seized and forfeited to the United States Government when a report on the instrument under section 5316 of this title has not been filed or contains a material omission or misstatement.

b. Adding a new subsection (d) which reads as follows:

(d) United States coin or currency (or other such monetary instrument as the Secretary may prescribe) or any interest in other property, including any deposit in a financial institution, traceable to such coin or currency involved in a transaction or attempted transaction in violation of section 5313(a) of this chapter may be seized and forfeited to the United States Government under the procedures of subchapter C of Chapter 75 of Title 26 of the United States Code whenever a person (excluding a domestic financial institution examined by a federal bank supervisory agency or a financial institution regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission liable under subsection 5321 (a) of this chapter) violates section 5313(a) of this chapter. No property or interest in property shall be forfeited under this subsection if it can be established that the owner is a bona fide purchaser for value who took without notice of the violation or if the violation or attempted violation of section 5313(a) was not willful.

SEC. 3. Section 5321 of Title 31 of the United States Code is amended by:

a. Adding to subsection (a) a new paragraph (4) to read as follows:

(a)(4) The Secretary may impose a civil penalty on a person or persons (excluding a domestic financial institution examined by a federal bank supervisory agency or a financial institution regulated by the Securities and Exchange Commission) willfully violating section 5313(a) of this chapter. A civil penalty under this paragraph may not be more than the amount of the United States coins and currency (or other monetary instruments the Secretary may prescribe) for which a report was required under section 5313(a) of this chapter. A civil penalty under this paragraph is reduced by an amount forfeited under section 5317(d) of this title.

b. Deleting "or (2)" from subsection (b) and adding in lieu thereof ", (2) or (4)".

c. Deleting "5317(b)" in subsection (c) and adding in lieu thereof "5317(c) or (d)" and by deleting "subsection (a)(2) of".

SEC. 4. Section 7302 of Title 26 of the United States Code is amended by deleting "such property" in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "property under this section and under the forfeiture provisions of Title 31 of the United States Code enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service" and by adding "or under the provisions of Title 31 of the United States Code enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service" after "section" in the fourth sentence.

SEC. 5. Section 7321 of Title 26 of the United States Code is amended by adding "or under any provision of Title 31 of the United States Code enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service" immediately following "title".

SEC. 6. Section 7327 of title 26 of the United States Code is amended by inserting immediately following "internal revenue laws", the following: "or under provisions enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service under Title 31 of the United States Code, to the extent not inconsistent with the provisions of Title 31."

SEC. 7. Section 7608(b) of Title 26 of the United States Code is amended by adding "or any provision of Title 31 of the United States Code enforced or administered by the Internal Revenue Service" immediately following "responsible" in paragraph (1) and immediately following "the internal revenue laws" in paragraph (2)(C).

"BACKDOOR BROKERING" IMPORT POLICIES

HON. RON MARLENEE

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, our cattlemen have been suffering from years of economic stress and it is time that we send a signal to the Canadians that their "backdoor brokering" import policies are placing the results of an unfair trade practice right at the front door of the United States producer.

A major concern of America's cattle industry is Canada's import policy, particularly subsidized imports from the European Community. This can cause a disproportionate amount of imports into the United States from Canada. The extra imports into Canada from the EC displaces Canadian beef into the United States. We are essentially a safety valve for anything Canada cannot consume.

Subsidized beef imports from the European Economic Community to Canada may be displacing the Canadian market to such an extent that Canadian beef products are being imported in the United States in increased quantities. This substitution or "backdoor brokering" needs immediate attention.

For example, in 1983, Canada imported around 13 to 14 million pounds from the EC. In 1984, this rose to almost 50 million pounds. The Canadian cattlemen have fought this practice.

The irony of this situation is that the Canadian livestock producers commissioned Canada's equivalent of our International Trade Commission [ITC] to study whether EC beef being imported into Canada is subsidized. The preliminary findings by the Canadian tribunal have determined the EC beef is subsidized.

Today I am introducing legislation to stop "backdoor brokering" from Canada. The legislation places a moratorium on Canadian beef products. This moratorium includes both live cattle and fresh, chilled, or frozen beef.

The moratorium remains in place while the ITC undertakes and completes within 6 months a study under section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974 to determine if beef products are being imported from Canada in such increased quantities as to be a substantial cause of serious injury to America's industry producing live cattle and fresh, chilled, or frozen beef.

Upon completion of the study, if the ITC does not find serious injury to the livestock industry, the moratorium will be lifted. If, however, serious injury is found, the moratorium will remain in effect. The ITC will periodically update the study—not less than twice each year. If, as a result of any study update, the ITC finds that the injury is no longer serious, the moratorium will be lifted.

The EC's export subsidies have brought some cheap beef into Canada, which has displaced local production. Ultimately, the surplus ends up in the United States.

Unless Canada does something about importing subsidized EC beef, we will bear the brunt of it in the long run.

SHEET-METAL JUSTICE

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the House of Representatives an important editorial which appeared in the Sacramento Bee on Sunday, March 2, 1986.

The editorial, entitled "Sheet-Metal Justice," examines attempts by the Justice Department to reverse many of the civil rights gains made over the last 30 years. The Justice Department has sought to amend Executive Order 11246 and has argued against affirmative action in the courts.

I commend this article to all of my colleagues.

SHEET-METAL JUSTICE

Until it was ordered to integrate by a court in 1964, Local 28 of the Sheet Metal Workers union was lily-white. The New York union had a clause barring non-whites from membership until 1946, but even after that was struck down nothing changed in the racial composition of the union's membership.

In 1966, the union was forced to give a court-ordered aptitude test but sought to void the results because blacks had scored too high. When the union administered the test again the following year, it paid for tutorials for white friends and relatives of union members.

The union refused to organize non-union shops that had no white employees, would only accept as transfers members of other unions who were white and, in the years between 1968 and 1972, after a court ordered the union to give preference to minorities in admitting new members, the union issued only temporary work permits. Of the more than 400 such permits, only one went to a non-white. In 1971, it refused to comply with a plan by the mayor of New York to admit one minority trainee for every four members employed.

What's the proper remedy for such a record of discrimination?

For the U.S. Justice Department in 1971, the answer was clear. It sued the union and, in 1975, won a federal court order requiring the union to strive for a minority membership of at least 29 percent, a figure that more or less reflected the racial composition of the community. The 29 percent goal was upheld by an appellate court, which ruled that it did not constitute a quota, only a target to remedy a clear history of discrimination.

In 1981, having raised minority membership to only 7 percent, the union was held in contempt. It appealed the decision, lost in the circuit court, and is now before the Supreme Court, where the Justice Department, having reversed two generations of federal civil rights policy, is arguing the union's side. The Civil Rights Act, the Justice Department claims, was never meant to force employers to hire by race. Counting by race is racism, says Attorney General Ed Meese.

In a case like this, what should be counted? Of course it would be better if all judgments—on the job, like everywhere else—were made without reference to race. But how, without guidelines, can a union or company with such a record be trusted to do the "color-blind" hiring that the administration proposes as an alternative? If enforcement depends on each applicant for union membership who is a victim of discrimination hiring a lawyer, collecting the required evidence, itself often impossible to get, and waiting for a case to move through two or three levels of courts, there will be no remedy for discrimination of any sort, certainly not within any reasonable time.

The issues and problems arising from affirmative action policies are rarely easy, but the country has made progress with them. For the courts to begin reversing them now would not only undercut that progress, but also make a mockery of the ideals and objectives that the nation, and not least the federal government, have honorably been pursuing for more than 30 years.

GLENDALE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE RECOGNITION LUNCHEON: WOMAN OF THE YEAR—MARLENE HAMILTON, MAN OF THE YEAR—RICHARD JUTRAS, ORGANIZATION OF THE YEAR—GLENDALE FEDERAL SAVINGS & LOAN, GOLDEN SERVICE AWARD—FLOYD C. "BABE" HERMAN

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, on April 23 the Glendale Chamber of Commerce will host its annual special recognition luncheon at which three individuals and one organization will receive deserved and special recognition.

The chamber will honor Marlene Hamilton as Woman of the Year, Richard Jutras as Man of the Year, baseball great Babe Herman as the recipient of the Golden Service Award and Glendale Federal Savings & Loan as the Organization of the Year.

Marlene Hamilton has been a community mainstay for years. Her record of involvement is extensive and long standing. She has served the chamber, the Days of Verdugo, the Tournament of Roses Float Committee, the United Way, the Building Industry Association, the Verdugo Hills Mental Health Association, the YMCA, and the city of Glendale with charm and efficiency. Each entity has benefited from Ms. Hamilton's energy and dedication.

Richard Jutras is an active and involved member of the chamber of commerce and the Kiwanis Club. He served on the Glendale Planning Commission for 6 years, the last as its chairman. He has served on the board of directors of the Salvation Army and Los Conquistadors of the Glendale YMCA. Mr. Jutras' record of civic involvement and success is one worthy of the special tribute.

The Golden Service Award is presented to an individual who has demonstrated a special brand of community devotion for a long period of time. Few Glendalians are more worthy of this honor than Babe Herman. While we all know that Babe has skillfully served the legend and lore of baseball with a great 14-year major league career, his numerous contributions to the city of Glendale are not as well chronicled but just as appreciated by his many friends and fellow residents. Babe Herman is one of those individuals a community delights in calling one of her own.

The success of Glendale Federal Saving & Loan as a financial institution and community benefactor is virtually without equal. It is one of the largest federally insured savings institutions in the Nation and it is the principal underwriter of much-lauded Glendale Symphony Orchestra. It has recently become a sponsor of the LPGA's tournament at Oakmont Country Club, a growing community tradition.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Glendale Chamber of Commerce paying special tribute to Marlene Hamilton, Richard Jutras, Babe Herman and Glendale Federal. I am also grateful to each of the honorees for their contributions to the city and its residents. We all have benefited because of their charitable ethic.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, on rollcall No. 78, I inadvertently pressed the aye button on the electronic voting device when I had intended to vote no and did not realize my mistake until after the rollcall had been completed. While I am officially recorded as voting "aye" my correct vote was intended to have been "no." A correct no vote, unfortunately, would not have changed the result.

BERN HUMAN CONTACTS EXPERTS MEETING OPENS

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, today, April 15, 1986, marks the opening of the Bern Human Contacts Experts Meeting, one of the followup meetings between the 35 signatories of the Helsinki accords which have become an integral part of the Helsinki process. This meeting is mandated to discuss the development of international contacts among persons, institutions, and organizations. Among the topics for discussion which the U.S. delegation considers most important is the Soviet Union's record of noncompliance with the human contacts provisions spelled out in the Helsinki accords. Specifically, the U.S. delegation will raise numerous cases in which the Soviet Union has obstructed the reunification of families.

Family ties, the firm foundation of so many American values, are taken for granted by most U.S. citizens. Unfortunately, families with relatives living in the U.S.S.R. cannot take these for granted. Families divided by the Iron Curtain are given little reason to hope for reunification with their loved ones. Their applications for visas are routinely rejected; even the submission of an application for a visit or emigration can result in serious persecution. Life has become miserable for these family members.

The case of Kaisa Randpere is a prime example of the Soviet Union's flagrant disregard for the pledges it made in Helsinki in 1975. At the age of 3½ years, Kaisa is the world's youngest refusenik. In August 1984, her parents Valdo and Leila—a senior aid to the Estonian Minister of Justice and a popular Estonian singer, respectively—managed to secure passage to Sweden while on a tour of Finland. Once they had requested asylum from the Swedish authorities, the Randperes requested that their 13-month-old daughter be allowed to join them. They never imagined that the Soviet authorities would refuse this request, and instead of the month-long separation they had expected, Valdo and Leila have been waiting for nearly 2 years to see their daughter. Since 1984, Kaisa's parents, many organizations and individuals, including 110 Members of Congress, have made repeated attempts to secure Kaisa's release. Instead of acting positively toward these request, the Soviet Government continually has harassed the child's grandmother, with whom Kaisa is staying, threatened to send Kaisa to an orphanage, and told the Randperes, "You will never see her again." Such is the Soviet Union's shameless attitude toward family reunification.

The Bern meeting provides us with a forum to reemphasize our commitment to realizing the humanitarian goal of bringing families together rather than forcing them to live apart. My fellow Commissioners and I hope that this meeting will result in concrete actions on the part of the Soviet Union and its East European allies to facilitate human contracts between our citizens.

NEW AMERICANS: FREE CITIZENS IN A FREE SOCIETY

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, last month my colleague from New York, Congressman STEPHEN J. SOLARZ, was asked to deliver an address to a very special audience at the Federal courthouse in Brooklyn: The event was the swearing-in of 397 new American citizens.

The audience in that courtroom represented people from 59 countries. These men and women had worked and studied hard to fulfill the requirements mandated by the Congress to become citizens of this great Nation. Now they were freely choosing to accept the duties and responsibilities of American citizenship.

The address which Congressman SOLARZ delivered was a brief, but eloquent, explanation of just what our democratic way of life means and what citizenship in this Nation entails. STEVE SOLARZ, like many of us, represents a congressional district which welcomes many newcomers each year and which is a microcosm of the wonderful mosaic of ethnic, racial, and religious groups which make this Nation so unique and so dynamic.

Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of the naturalization process in our political life, I ask that the entire text of Congressman SOLARZ' address be reprinted in today's RECORD.

FREE CITIZENS IN A FREE SOCIETY—WELCOMING 397 NEW AMERICANS

A few moments ago, each of you swore to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States.

With those few words, you ended a long journey from your homeland. How you begin anew—as free citizens of a free society.

Today I am proud to welcome you to this great nation—to this citadel of democracy and freedom—the United States of America.

We are not an ancient nation. But we are dedicated to some of the oldest and most profound truths associated with the human enterprise.

We believe and we cherish what Thomas Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence: "That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

And we have taken to heart another timeless message of Thomas Jefferson: "I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man."

Where many other countries are founded on fear, our country is founded in freedom. Where many other societies are torn apart by hate, ours is held together by hope.

In many other countries, an iron curtain descends to bar the free flow of people and ideas.

In America, we refuse to lock people in or lock ideas out.

In many other lands, leaders launch a relentless assault against the human spirit. In America, we celebrate the human potential. We reward artistry in literature, theater, and music. We never define the creative expression of the soul as a threat to the continued existence of the state.

In America, we do not remain indifferent to the fate of freedom in other lands. We understand, as Malusi Mpumlwana, a black South African priest and friend of Steve Biko, has said, "The measure of your freedom is to what extent you are able to recognize the unfreedom of others and battle to undo it."

And so we have reached out to rescue those who have been trapped in the gulags of the Soviet Union or the killing fields of Cambodia. Often we fail. But when we succeed—when, after a decade of struggle, we save Anatoly Shcharansky from the clutches of the KGB or when we aid Dith Pran in his death-defying flight from the genocidal Khmer Rouge, we honor our sense of national purpose.

Last Thursday morning, in this very room, Dith Pran took the solemn step you have taken today. And on Thursday evening, Tom Brokaw, the anchorman for NBC News, spoke for all Americans when he said, "I am proud to share a citizenship with Dith Pran."

America is not a perfect nation. But we pledged in the Constitution to form a more perfect union, and we remain committed today to perfecting and improving our system of government.

One hundred and fifty years ago, a French citizen named Alexis de Tocqueville wrote a book called Democracy in America. He wrote, "America is a land of wonders in which everything is in constant motion and every change seems an improvement. No Natural boundary seems to be set to the efforts of man: and in his eyes what is not yet done is only what he has not yet attempted to do."

Or as the playwright George Bernard Shaw once said, "Some men see things as they are and ask why. Others dream things that never were and ask why not."

We build no walls to keep people in, and we build no ceilings to limit their achievements. Last year, the daughter of immigrants, Geraldine Ferraro, come upon the world stage as the first woman ever nominated for the second highest office in our land.

And last month, when the space shuttle Challenger exploded, we saw dramatic evidence of our diverse heritage. America grieved for its seven fallen heroes—Baptist and Buddhist, Catholic and Jew, Black and white, men and women. From different parts of America, from different backgrounds, races, and religions, they came together, united in a drive for excellence and scientific advance, and in doing so, they brought America together as well.

The United States is not—as we once thought—a melting pot. But we are a remarkable mosaic of many races, creeds, and ethnic backgrounds. Look around you in the City of New York. You will see not a clash of cultures, but a place where each culture leaves its own imprint and enriches us all.

Each new wave of immigrants—from Europe, from Asia and the Pacific Islands, from Africa, from South America, from the Caribbean—has brought new ideas and new ambitions, new drive and new achievements to our society.

Indeed, we are not just a mosaic, but a kaleidoscope, a changing canvas of many colors and many cultures, the emblem of a dynamic and free society.

America is not a government of men and women, but a government of law.

In this country, we seek to change the policy of our government through the ballot, not the bullet.

We reject the concept of arbitrary state action or the confiscation of private property.

We settle disputes through our public courts, not private armies. We resolve conflicts by hiring attorneys, not assassins.

We cherish the right to disagree—privately or publicly—with our government, and our press reminds us that self-criticism lies at the heart of a free society.

Now you are part of this revered American tradition. Now you, too, share the rights and responsibilities of American citizens.

You are free to work and live where you will.

You are free to practice any religion or no religion, according to the dictates of your conscience, not the dictatorship of any state.

You can join any political party, or none at all.

You are free to read or publish any newspaper or magazine, to listen to or watch any radio or television program.

At the same time, you are responsible for obeying the law and respecting the rights of your fellow citizens.

In a few months, we will celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the Statue of Liberty—our heroine and herald of freedom. I suspect that just as you are very proud today of all that you have achieved in becoming an American citizen, so, too, you will look with special pride at the festivities next July.

More than most Americans, you will see beyond the glitter—beyond the fireworks lighting up the sky and the spectacular procession of ships in our harbor. You will not lose sight of the symbolism of the Statute of Liberty—reminding America of our special status as a refuge for the dispossessed.

On that day—indeed on any day, all Americans can reflect upon the words of the songwriter, Phil Ochs, "This is a land full of power and glory—beauty that words can not recall. The power shall rest on the strength of her freedom. Glory shall rest on us all."

May God bless all of you and our great nation, of which you are now a part.

MATT SNYDER, NEBRASKA WINNER 1985/86 VFW VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

HON. VIRGINIA SMITH

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues the winning entry in the Nebraska Voice of Democracy contest, sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars and its Ladies Auxiliary.

The author is Matthew Snyder of Broken Bow, NE, and I am extremely proud of his inspirational thoughts about the future of America. I hope my colleagues will find his essay of interest:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

We stand right at the mid-point of the decade. In only fifteen years we will be welcoming a new millennium—the year 2000. As we look toward that horizon—toward the twenty-first century—we realize that it is today's American youth who will determine our nation's course.

How will we do? It is appropriate and timely for us to begin now, preparing for the challenges America and our generation will face.

First, let me backtrack a little to consider how earlier generations of Americans prepared themselves for the coming of a new century. From our nation's very birth, Americans have accepted challenges which seemed to threaten our future. As we approached the nineteenth century, colonial farmers and merchants, trappers and bookkeepers, formed hometown militias and risked their lives in battle against those who would deny basic human rights in this new land.

Midway through that century, Americans again were called to take up arms to preserve the unity of our young country, and our nation came out of this internal struggle a freer and stronger country.

Barely into the twentieth century Americans were called to battle twice, joining free forces all over the world—forces determined that mankind would not be ruled by fascist tyrants. Once again we proved to ourselves and to others, that America was strong and more than willing to protect that invaluable freedom with the strength that is America.

I think it is appropriate, as we consider the new millennium on our horizon, that we remember the lessons of yesterday—that they might guide us tomorrow. Consider, for a moment, one of those lessons as described by an American poet, Douglas Mallach, in the first stanza of this poem. He creates an imagery which seems very appropriate here.

The tree that never had to fight
For sun and sky and air and light;
That stood out in the open plain
And always got its share of rain,
Never became a forest king,
But lived and died a shrubby thing.

Facing challenges with optimism and courage has become an American tradition—a tradition we must carry with us into the twenty-first century. If we see a better life on the horizon, we must not be blind to the challenges which lie between us and that dream.

We know that if we are to conquer disease, we must begin our preparation today. If our horizon holds dreams of energy independence, it is today's graduates who will have to find new ways to tap new deposits of oil and coal below the earth's surface. If the very spirit of America is to serve us well into the new era, we must accept the challenge of instilling American values in the next generation.

America is rich in resources—resources beyond minerals and food, beyond medical advances and education. And we are at this moment at the brink of discovering and developing that which I am convinced is our greatest resource of all, our generosity and pride of nation.

It is a unique opportunity for America's youth to lead this exploration and development. And when today's youth reach those horizons which they explored and then developed, they can say.

America fought.
And America will be that forest king.

When we meet those horizons we have set, we must not stop. We must expand them. We must not only find way to reach below the earth's surface, but we must put our energy resources to work to keep America the industrial giant of the world. We must not only prepare to conquer disease, but we must continue to improve the quality of life. We should not stop at instilling American values in the next generation, but must live so that each new generation has cause to be proud of their country. And after we have expanded and passed those horizons we set, we can say with pride in our voice,

America grew,
America is the forest king,
And America will never die a shrubby thing.

THE CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET PROCEDURES HAVE FAILED ONCE AGAIN

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, Congress has failed again to meet its budget deadlines. Today is April 15, the new deadline for House and Senate agreement on a budget resolution, but there is once again no budget resolution to be found.

That's not really surprising though. Last year, Congress didn't reach agreement on the first budget resolution until August 15, 2½ months late. In 1984, we were 4½ months late. In both 1982 and 1983, Congress was 5 weeks late.

According to the Budget Act of 1974, the first budget resolution is supposed to be nonbinding. It's the second budget resolution that is supposed to be the binding budget guideline. But our record with the second budget resolution is even more dismal. We haven't passed one in any of the last 4 years!

How ironic that we have set April 15 as the new deadline for a first budget resolution. This is the same date that American taxpayers must meet the deadline to file their income tax returns. Congress has established penalties for taxpayers who don't meet these deadlines. Maybe we need to establish penalties against Congress when we fail to meet our deadlines.

I believe, however, there is another solution to our budgetary difficulties. Let's revamp the current budget process, which has become too cumbersome and just doesn't work. To begin, I propose at least a temporary 2-year budget cycle to allow us to get caught up with budgetary matters. I also propose to abolish the House and Senate Budget Committees and the new level of bureacracy they have established with Congress. In place of the Budget Committees, the Appropriations and Ways and Means Committees would meet early in the process to issue a statement of receipts and outlays that cites estimated revenues for the budget period and a maximum level of expenditures.

New deadlines would be established for authorizing legislation to be brought before Congress prior to the consideration of any appropriations bills. Finally, a 1-month period would be set aside for the sole consideration of the 13 regular appropriations bills.

As a member of the Appropriations Committee, it's obvious to me that Congress has failed miserably in meeting its fiscal deadlines and responsibilities. Not only have we failed with regard to the budget process, but more importantly, we have failed to meet our appropriations deadlines. Seven of the 13 regular appropriations deadlines. Seven of the 13 regular appropriations bills were included this year in a massive continuing resolution. Continuing resolution are a symbol of our failure to discharge our responsibilities, and unfortunately, they have become a rule rather than an exception.

The Library of Congress recently analyzed the record of Congress with regard to appropriations bills since the institutions of the 1974 Budget Act. According to the report:

Before the Budget Act it was highly unusual if all 12 months of a fiscal year went by without passing the regular appropriations bills. It is now a common occurrence. From fiscal 1968 through fiscal 1975, only two appropriations bills were under a continuing resolution for an entire fiscal year. From fiscal year 1976 through fiscal 1985, that figure jumbed to 27.

Because of our failure to meet budget and appropriations deadlines, our Government was on the verge of fiscal chaos last year. The Secretary of the Treasury even had to resort to the disinvesting of the Social Security trust funds in order ot make good on Federal obligations.

We funded the operations of our Government on a week-to-week basis under continuing resolutions for 2½ months. We let important legislation pile up to the point that we had to consider temporary extensions to prevent programs from expiring.

We were asked to vote on major legislation in excess of 1,000 pages with little or no time to review key provisions. This happened with regard to the tax bill, farm bill, and reconciliation bill.

The situation became so bleak that Members were willing to accept the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings concept and turn over to computers our constitutional responsibilities to make important financial decisions for the Federal Government. I opposed Gramm-Rudman because we shouldn't turn our backs on casting the tough votes and making the difficult Federal spending decisions. That's why we have been elected to Congress.

The conduct of Congress the past few months is a sad commentary of how the greatest Nation in the world conducts its fiscal affairs. We need to work together to find the solution to our problems. We need strong and effective leadership to guide us on our course. We need to resist gimmickry and return to procedures that will enable Congress to make the tough decisions we're charged with making in a timely fashion.

Above all else, we need to make a commitment to quit wasting time and to fulfill the responsibilities of governing our Nation. Since we reconvened here January 21 for the second session of the 99th Congress, the House has met to conduct official business on only 29 of a possible 59 days. On eight other days, the House convened in pro forma session or conducted no legislative business.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that we can move forward by working toghether to discharge our duties in a responsible and timely fashion. As a cornerstone of this effort, I look forward to working with my colleagues to craft a new, streamlined budget process that will get us back on track in making the important funding decisions so we can do our job to reduce Federal deficits and ensure a strong and thriving national economy.

A CONSTITUENT RESPONSE

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, recently, there has been a great deal of discussion in the House about public opinion toward how best to achieve peace in Central America and to reduce nuclear proliferation. And, later this week, the House will, once again, meet to make key policy decisions on these matters.

Mr. Speaker, I recently received a letter from a distinguished constituent of mine, Allan J. Bing, a retired lecturer of philosophy at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, which raises a number of compelling points with respect to these issues. And, while the jury may still be out as to overall public opinion, Mr. Bing's letter is just one example of how a majority of the residents of the 21st District of Ohio view U.S. policy in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, I submit his letter to be inserted into the RECORD and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

MARCH 28, 1986.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STOKES: I must vehemently protest against the underground nuclear bomb explosion which took place in the Nevada desert on Mar. 22. As you must know, the bomb was ten (10) times as powerful as the one exploded at Hiroshima, and shook all the major buildings in Reno, seventy miles away.

I can only regard this explosion as a completely irrational defiance of the Soviets, especially in view of the Moratorium on nuclear explosions which the Kremlin proposed, and itself rigidly adhered to, since last July 30. Most peace groups, both in Cleveland and in Washington, regarded this proposed moratorium on testing as the most significant breakthrough on the issue of nuclear disarmament, since the two superpowers began to build their arsenals. Pres. Reagan must be off his nut to order this explosion. As Nina McLellan, head of the Cleveland chapter of the Sierra Club, said, as quoted by the Cleveland Plain Dealer on March 23: "The reason that Pres. Reagan refuses to negotiate a test ban is that he wants to test and build new, advanced nuclear weapons. These weapons represent a significant change in nuclear technology and are a dangerous esculation toward nuclear war. A test ban could easily be verified."

On the somewhat related issue of the question of aid to the Contras in Nicaragua, I refer you to the lead article in the current issue (March 31) of Time Magazine. After attempting to regard the Sandinistas in a more reasonable and human light than the President has, the writer concludes: "In fact, if the peril posed by the Sandinistas were as great as the President's political rhetoric suggest, he would be irresponsible not to send in American troops."

This President needs to have his head examined. Please personally see to it that his irrationality and stupidity are tightly contained.

Very truly yours,

ALLAN J. BING.

APRIL IS MONTH OF THE MILITARY CHILD

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger has designated this month, and every April Thereafter, as "Month of the Military Child." I would like to join military families throughout the world in recognizing the important role our youth play in the development of this great land of ours.

This year's theme has been appropriately titled, "Children and Youth: Our Investment in the Future."

In the March 28, 1986, edition of Astro News, Lt. Gen. Forrest S. McCartney, Space Division Commander at Los Angeles AFS, has written an excellent editorial on the significance and importance of recognizing the many contributions of military children. This article is as follows:

[From the Astro News, March 28, 1986]

COMMANDER SALUTES YOUTH

(By Lt. Gen. Forrest S. McCartney)

April 1986—and every April thereafter—has been designated the "Month of the Military Child" by Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger to recognize the important role that our youth and their activities play in our lives.

The theme this year, "Children and Youth: Our Investment in the Future," appropriately reflects the effort we have placed in our programs which care for and nurture our young family members.

These programs include the Fort MacArthur Youth Center, the Youth Elite Society, and the station's child care program.

The center is an outstanding source for a wide variety of activities which help develop social and intellectual values. It also provides an outstanding perspective of Air Force life for high school-age participants who aspire toward military careers.

The Youth Elite Society, which has benefited our children for four years, holds activities which set social, intellectual and spiritual standards as guidelines for growth.

The society's field trips help its members widen their horizons, and its service projects help teach them how to set example and meet goals. The society also recognizes those who excel in their scholastic and extracurricular activities.

The child care center, when completed later this year, will provide much-needed day-time supervision of our infant children and thus ease their parents' concerns for adequate care.

Those concerns have already been considerably alleviated thanks to many of the wives at Fort MacArthur who have become certified to care for children in their homes.

Our youth activity coordinators work very hard in support of our familes. They are planning activities at the Fort in commemoration of the Month of the Military Child. I encourage you to participate in the efforts.

SMALL SCHOOL DISTRICTS

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, the economic crisis of our times has forced education to be on the back burner of priorities for our Nation. This displacement of education within the nation within the framework of our national priorities comes at a time when the illiteracy rate of our Nation is at an all time high; the dropout rate of our youngsters from high school is devasting to our national security; and, local school districts do not have the economic resources to properly and appropriately address the issues of today.

On Friday, April 4, 1986 the Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary and Vocational Education of the House Education and Labor Committee held a hearing in Paramount California to address some of the problems which are being encountered by the cuts in Federal funding to small school districts. Among those who submitted testimony was Mr. Willard H. Murray, vice president of the California Voter Education and Research Action, Inc., who succinctly charactered the problems in education as a result of the cuts in Federal spending on the State of California.

Herewith is Mr. Murray's statement:

Congressman DYMALLY: Thank you for allowing me to present this testimony to you to be a part of the Committee print of this hearing. I am Willard H. Murray, Vice President of the California Voter Education and Research Action, Inc, (VERA). While not an expert, I am knowledgable of the effects that are being realized by the State of California and the Assembly district which I seek to represent—which includes large and small school districts. I will address federal cuts in education as a whole and a beam of hope that I see on the horizon.

It is my position that in order to ensure a strong educational system and a vital nation, the State, Federal government and local school districts must be in the position to carry out their roles and work in accord with one another. The cuts in Federal funding, which have been the trend of the Reagan Administration, have placed an undue and unfair burden on the State of California, and this burden is felt in greater proportions by local school districts. This burden comes at a time when the United States of America is witnessing the worst economic crisis for the poor and the farmer since the Great Depression of the 1930's, and the deficit of this great nation of ours is at an all time record.

In the area of Elementary and Secondary Education, the cuts in federal spending have mounted to such great proportions that it may take years for our nation to recover. When comparing the actual federal appropriations from 1980 until the present, and adjusting for inflation, there is actually a 23.9 percent decrease in funding of the Chapter 1 program. This program provides funds for supplementary education and related services to educationally disadvantaged children. California suffers because of this.

Chapter 2 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981, the program which provides block grants to State and local educational agencies and provides programs such as basic skills development, educational improvement and support services along with special projects in elementary and secondary schools has experienced a 54.6 percent cut (with inflation considered). The impact was felt greatest in urban areas which is much of what the district that I seek to represent consists of. California suffers because of this.

Bilingual Education, a subject that can not be ignored by the State of California at any level, has experienced a 44.7 percent decrease since 1980 (inflation adjusted). The impact of this cut for California is that more state funds will have to be allocated to this area at a time when economic crisis throughout the Nation does not allow the State to secure more taxes and thereby making revenues unavailable to sustain the program at the level needed. I must add that bilingual education is negatively correlated with income wealth or other measures of taxing and spending capabilities. California suffers because of this.

The Impact Aid Program provides financial assistance to local school districts for the cost of educating children. A cut in Federal activities has caused a financial burden to the district. The cuts in Federal funding of Impact Aid by approximately 36.2 percent has been especially hard for the State of California because of the amounts of Federal property which is in the state. California suffers because of this.

While education of the handicapped has fluctuated in terms of federal funding, the overall results have been negative and the nation has witnessed a 7.8 percent decrease. Mr. Chairman, the same is true for Vocational Rehabilitation.

Vocational education, the portion of education which is necessary in order for the State of California to meet the needs of the workforce of the future and ensure equity and equal opportunity for all Californians, has been cut to such a level that the industries of California will be hard pressed to have a workforce within the next few years. Nevertheless an educated and qualified one will ensure the national defense and stability of these United States. And, yes, California suffers because of this.

While the list goes on and on and includes such topics as adult education and adult literacy, I wish to speak now about a beacon of hope.

The hope I speak of is a piece of legislation which was recently introduced in the House of Representatives by the distinguished Chairman, (H.R. 747) "The Effective Schools Development in Education Act of 1985".

While it is true that the State of California has long since implemented a program simular to this Legislation, in my opinion this legislation is much farther reaching and will benefit the 54th Assembly District as well as the State of California in most significant ways.

The effective schools bill has the purpose of assisting and encouraging State and local education agencies in broadening and improving effective school programs that they have developed and/or implemented. Through grants provided to states, this legislation will create effective schools by providing basic educational skills to the functionally illiterate parents; enhance a child's very early pre-school education; help parents learn how to teach three to seven year old children; and, help the school administrators, teachers, and other school staff, parents and community to learn how to organize an effective school through school analysis of all of its functions and, then, develop and implement plans which will vastly improve those functions.

Mr. Chairman, the federal cuts in funding are hard for the State of California to adjust to. Your bill should help us do the job of educating our students in a more appropriate sound manner. California will be thankful when this bill becomes law. Then, perhaps we can make do with the awful cuts that we are experiencing.

NO AID TO THE CONTRAS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, our colleague from the State of Washington, the distinguished majority whip, TOM FOLEY, wrote an excellent, well-reasoned op-ed piece on why we shouldn't aid the Contras. I will not express my own views at this time on why we should not send them aid, other than to say that I agree with my colleague wholeheartedly. I am inserting the article in the RECORD for my colleagues' perusal.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 15, 1986]

CONTRA AID: AN ACT OF WAR

(By Thomas S. Foley)

Today the House will revisit the contra aid debate. Shortly before the last vote in the House the administration abandoned its erst-while strategy of all or nothing on the contra issue. Its new strategy has two facets. On the one hand, it has begun to offer compromises. On the other, it has tried to develop some public relations event equivalent to last year's famous trip to Moscow by Nicaraguan leader Daniel Ortega.

Despite strenuous effort, the administration has been unable to rally convincing majorities of the public or Congress to its position. The week following the last House vote on contra aid, the Senate voted by a narrow margin to approve a "compromise" plan which many regard as little more than a cosmetic makeover of the president's original proposal. Key features of that plan were that "only" one quarter of the $100 million, 18-month financing would be available in the first 90 days, only "defensive" weapons could be bought and the president could not release the remaining funds until an additional 15 days had expired, 15 days in which Congress could veto the decision to release the remaining funds and the president could veto any such congressional action. A thinner compromise could hardly be imagined and, indeed, only a thin majority of the Senate supported the president where he had hoped for an overwhelming vote.

But before the Senate vote, the administration believed the public relations coup it has so fervently desired had fallen into its hands, a highly trumpeted "invasion" of Honduras by Nicaraguan troops in pursuit of the contras. Originally the administration had difficulty in persuading the Hondurans that they should acknowledge the event at all. Their reluctance was understandable in light of the fact that the Nicaraguan action may have been larger than normal but nevertheless closely resembled hundreds of similar reported incidents over the last five years. For Honduras to raise a public outcry would, in its view, publicly acknowledge that the contras were being allowed to stay in Honduras.

Congressional leaders of both parties said the "invasion" has had little or no effect on the Senate vote. In the face of subsequent intelligence and press reports, which substantially reduced the scale of the incident, the administration's public relations machine has had no choice but to seek a new approach.

Now, before the second vote in the House, the administration has launched a new offensive on the Contadora front. The president says the Nicaraguans have "torpedoed" the Contadora peace process with their latest rejection of a proposed document that called on them to reduce their armed forces without their first being a cut-off in aid to the contras. Diplomatic damage experts have noted that the disappointment of the Contadora negotiators with the latest action by the Nicaraguan representatives was obvious. But the communique issued by the Contadora nations after the recent breakup contemplates getting back to work as soon as possible. It does not resemble an obituary. Nevertheless the administration has seized on the latest development and is now trying to exaggerate its consequence in yet another attempt to weaken opposition to its proposal, a proposal which would wring from both houses a reluctant declaration of a proxy war in Nicaragua.

The Contadora negotiators continually point to the fact that the contras merely frustrate the Contadora process. The Central American nations know what they want from negotiations: regional security. But the administration wants the Sandinistas to negotiate cession of power, a concession it also says it never expects them to give without military defeat by the contras. Yet the continuation of the contra war will reduce, not enhance the security of Nicaragua's neighbors. The administration appears confused about its own goals and in any case is acting at cross purpose to Contadora, as the Latin Americans view it.

We should make no mistake. This is not a one-time vote for $100 million. We are on the eve of a historic decision. This vote is merely a down payment on hundreds of millions, perhaps billions to come over many years in support of the contras (indeed we have already spent $1 billion on military preparations in Central America). Much more important than the money, however, is the unprecedented and damaging decision we are about to make to support and finance the proxy invasion of a foreign country with which, for whatever purpose, we maintain diplomatic relations. This course of action sweeps aside the president's own stated concern, only a year ago, that to pursue such a course would be an act of war. In any case, our action would be totally unilateral with no support from our allies anywhere on the globe.

We desperately need a better strategy regarding Nicaragua and, despite the recent setback, Contadora is that strategy.

The Contadora process is far from dead. On the contrary, it has been the administration's own refusal to promote Contadora that has deprived the process of its moral authority to pressure the Nicaraguans. We have been unable to exploit the Nicaraguan's recent action because the other Latin American participants do not view us as supporting Contadora. Reports say that several Central American foreign ministers have come away with the impression that their recent visits from U.S. envoys were actually attempts to undermine Contadora.

If we were wholeheartedly to support the Contadora process, we would vastly improve its possibilities for guaranteeing regional security, U.S. security and liberalization of the Nicaraguans' internal policies. The current policy of aid to the contras, accompanied by lip service support of Contadora, allows the Sandinistas plausibly to claim that their internal repressive policies, their military build-up their reliance on thousands of Cuban advisers, their close ties to Moscow and their reluctance to negotiate are all the result of their need to repel the American-sponsored contra invasion.

The Contadora process offers us many opportunities to pressure Nicaragua productively that we do not now have. We would have the support of the rest of Central America to pressure Nicaragua to reduce its armed forces, expel the Cubans, honor its borders and cease support for insurgencies in other countries. We do not now have the support of those countries. We would have the support of the entire Western world when we pressured the Sandinistas to cease their lockdown of Nicaraguan society and honor basic human rights principles there. We do not have such support for our policy of backing the contras.

Some suggest that only the contras can put productive pressure on the Sandinistas, but we must remember that Nicaragua has a weak economy, totally dependent on world trade. Western opinion, if it is united, will mean a great deal to them, and they can ill afford to continue to disillusion Western democracies with their repressive internal policies.

Some Contadora ministers have confided that the contras are the best thing to happen to the Sandinistas in Nicaragua. The story goes that the Sandinistas can survive years of war with ease, but six months of peace would be a terrible threat because of the natural political pressures that would develop within Nicaragua.

If Contadora were ultimately to succeed, and with the enthusiastic backing of the United States, the pressure on Nicaragua to cooperate would be intense, and we would have the moral authority and international support to militarily back up the treaty if that ever became necessary.

What are the risks of Contadora? We need not fear the military loss of Central America while talks continue. Congress will support any action to repel Nicaraguan aggression against its neighbors, or to prevent the introduction of advanced weaponry or to prevent the use of Nicaragua as a base for Soviet and Cuban main forces. Our steady policy of strong support for the other democracies in the region has lessened the Nicaraguans opportunities for subversion, and we should continue that policy with determination. This is the approach that all the Central American countries we are trying to help urge upon us.

In contrast to Contadora, what risks does the continued policy of support for the contras present? What will we do if, after hundreds of millions of dollars, years of support, training and equipment and an incalculable investment of American political and diplomatic currency, the contras eventually face defeat? What if they face decimation or capture? Will we never send our own forces to help them no matter how desperate their situation? Or will we leave them to their fate in a giant replay of the Bay of Pigs? Will we then be negotiating to save the contras rather than to reform Nicaragua?

Perhaps I view the contras' prospects too pessimistically, although the overwhelming weight of American intelligence and military opinion, some of it on the public record, agrees that the contras have no chance of military victory. A bloody stalemate is their best hope, and even this analysis assumes a static situation without escalation on the other side.

I accept President Reagan's assurance that he has no present intention to send American troops to Nicaragua. But the president's present intentions are not what will determine the outcome. We have all witnessed this inexorable process before. As our commitment increases, our options dwindle, and the day when we are out of options grows nearer.

I have trouble understanding the administration's strategy. On the one hand they say that the contras really don't have to win. They need only stalemate the Sandinistas to force them to the bargaining table to negotiate internal reforms in Nicaragua. But administration officials also almost invariably say that no Marxist-Leninist regime will ever voluntarily relinquich power. They often publicly use that as reason why direct U.S.-Nicaragua talks will not succeed. Stalemate will not be good enough. The contras must win or the Sandinistas will simply keep fighting with all the resources they can command or that the Soviets and Cubans can provide. If the contras must win, we must decide now what we are willing to do to ensure their victory, and if we are not prepared to use American forces we must be prepared to accept the possible defeat of our proxy army and the resultant embarrassment to ourselves.

In short, the contra option is a prescription for an unprecedented U.S. proxy invasion of a country with which we are not at war, a proxy invasion with almost no chance of military victory without American participation and no chance of productive results short of victory. Compared with the sometimes difficult course of negotiations, military action seems strong and decisive, but it is fraught with terrible risks. It leaves us with the probable choice of having to use our own forces or accept the defeat of the army we have armed and suborned. Compared with this, Contadora remains the compelling choice.

GUN BILL RECORDS CHECK DELETION

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, April 10, 1986, the House of Representatives passed legislation (H.R. 4332) changing the focus of the Gun Control Act of 1968. During floor consideration of the measure I had planned to offer an amendment to the Judiciary Committee's version of the bill to delete the records check section of the bill, but instead withdrew the amendment due to time constraints. And, while the House did finally pass a measure that did not incorporate a records check, I feel that the House should be aware of the reasons for objecting to a records check provision.

The records check section of H.R. 4332 as passed by the Judiciary Committee was included in an effort to maintain some control over who purchases a handgun. While admirable in intent, the practical aspects of a records check are far less positive. Simply stated, a records check requirement would place a tremendous burden of cost and labor on the FBI but would yield few if any of the protections of criminal history tracing supposedly available. I submit to the House for the edification of the Members a letter from John R. Bolton, Assistant Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, to Representative BILL MCCOLLUM, ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Crime, regarding the Department's feelings on the handgun records check requirement of H.R. 4332 as passed by the Judiciary Committee, and hope that if considered again a records check provision will be reworked to correctly address the problems it is trying to amend.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE AND INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, March 19, 1986.

Hon. BILL MCCOLLUM,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MCCOLLUM: The Department of Justice has deferred to the Department of the Treasury as to the substantive portions of S. 49, which passed the Senate on July 9, 1985, and H.R. 4332, the Federal Firearms Law Reform Act of 1986, which was ordered reported by your Committee on March 11, 1986. However, I would like to address one particular section in the House bill which directly affects the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and poses serious problems.

Section 14 of H.R. 4332 makes it unlawful for a licensed dealer or other persons to sell or transfer a handgun to an individual who is not licensed unless the transferor promptly sends by registered or certified mail a copy of the documentation of transfer to the chief law and enforcement officer of the transferee's place of residence and to the FBI. The FBI is then required to examine "Federal official records which may reveal any circumstances making illegal the receipt or possession of a handgun by the transferee" and report such information to the chief law enforcement officer of the transferee's residence.

Our primary concerns with this language are as follows:

(1) The proposed examination of Federal records is based on an individual's name and other identifiers (date of birth, place of birth, etc.). Those persons with a criminal record who are prohibited from purchasing a handgun are the ones most likely to obtain false identification documents to support a new name. As to felons using a false identity, the name check will not reveal any information regarding the purchaser's criminal activity which might make him ineligible to own a handgun. Even if the purchaser uses his true name, it may not be possible to determine with certainty whether or not a criminal record belongs to the purchaser or another person with the same name. There are many people with identical names and similar identifiers who have criminal records. It is possible that the FBI might identify a half dozen individuals with criminal records whose name is the same as the purchaser; further, even if we identify only one record in an individual's name, that does not mean that the record belongs to the purchaser. The outcome of the name check may be that persons with no previous contact with the criminal justice system will be further investigated merely because they wish to purchase a handgun while those with a disqualifying criminal record will perhaps be able to escape closer scrutiny.

(2) The bill would require the FBI to check all "Federal official records which may reveal any circumstances making illegal the receipt or possession of a handgun by the transferee . . ." Currently, the FBI estimates that the cost of a name check of its Identification Division criminal record system is about $7. However, the broad language of the bill would not only require a name check of the Identification Division system, but the FBI's central records system as well. I understand that the National Rifle Association is estimating that from 2 to 4 million handguns are purchased each year. The cost of the name check of just the FBI Identification records could be as much as 30 million dollars a year. However, the bill does not provide any additional funding for the FBI to cover its costs.

(3) The bill would conflict with State laws governing criminal record checks currently performed in connection with firearms purchases. Pursuant to Public Law 92-544, the FBI is permitted to exchange identification records with officials of state and local governments for licensing and employment purposes if authorized by state law and approved by the Attorney General. Public Law 99-180 (the Department of Justice Appropriation Act for 1986) authorizes the FBI to collect fees to process fingerprint identification records for noncriminal justice employment and licensing purposes and credit up to $13,500,000 of such fees to its appropriation to be used for salaries and other expenses incurred in providing this service. The states have enacted various types of laws which mandate a criminal history record check based on fingerprints for different licensing and employment purposes, i.e., to license teachers, child care workers, real estate brokers, etc. Twenty-one states including the District of Columbia and three territories now require handgun purchases based on their fingerprints. The fingerprints are submitted to the State Identification Bureau or other similar central state authority. If the central state authority finds anything in its records which disqualifies the purchaser, it will be submitted to the FBI for processing. The FBI charges $14 for this service. (The states may have additional charges). The FBI's fees are funneled back into its budget to cover costs. For Fiscal Year 1985, the FBI processed 864,085 fingerprints for noncriminal justice licensing and employment purposes and collected $9,577,969 in fees.

If the Congress considers it important to require a check of handgun purchasers, we believe that such legislation should take advantage of current procedures. In doing so, the Congress would avoid placing any additional burdens on the 21 states which now have laws and procedures in place which are intended to keep handguns out of the hands of criminals. Further, by mandating a criminal history check based on fingerprints, the FBI would be able to charge for its service. The cost of doing a name check as mandated by H.R. 4332 could not be recovered by fees; therefore, the Bureau's budget would have to be enhanced. Most importantly, by requiring a fingerprint check, law enforcement will know beyond a doubt that the criminal record in fact belongs to the purchaser.

To further illustrate the benefits of a fingerprint check, I am attaching a news article from The Star-Ledger (Newark, New Jersey), dated February 23, 1986. As reported in this article, an Edward Morris, who was wanted for forgery and grand theft in Tallahassee, Florida, had been hired by a Newark bank using the name of Kenneth Taylor. Taylors' fingerprints were routinely taken by the bank and submitted to the FBI Identification Division for processing. The results led to Taylors arrest just in time as he was found to have in his possession $5,000 in cash, a cashier's check in the amount of $57,000, and a new car valued at $13,000. Taylor was charged with bank fraud and embezzlement. A name check would have been worthless in this case.

If the Committee wishes further information on this issue, representatives of the Department are available to discuss current fingerprint processing procedures and to suggest legislative language which would address the concerns identified above.

Sincerely,

JOHN R. BOLTON,
Assistant Attorney General.

IN RECOGNITION OF THE BUSINESS ACHIEVEMENTS OF LEROY OZANNE

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my colleagues attention to an article that recently appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer that traces the career of Leroy Ozanne, an outstanding Cleveland business pioneer, entrepreneur and the owner of the largest black contracting company in the Cleveland area.

Mr. Ozanne's climb to the top of the business world demonstrates that hard work, foresight and a few breaks are essential elements to survival in the highly competitive construction business. The Ozanne Construction Co., represents a success story we are very proud of in Cleveland, and I am pleased to bring it to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

The article follows:

VENTURES PAY OFF—BLACK CONTRACTOR BUILDS REPUTE AND BUSINESS

(By Angela D. Chatman)

More than 30 years ago, Leroy Ozanne saw an opportunity to be what was then a rarity: a black general contractor.

As a city building inspector in the early 1950s, he saw few black contractors come to the Cleveland Building Department for permits and information.

"There was actually no representation in construction and that's what got me interested. I said, 'This is going to be my shot,' " he said recently in his offices on E. 25th St.

He was right.

Thirty years after the Ozanne Construction Co.'s incorporation in 1956. Leroy Ozanne, 59, and son Dominic, 32, run what is identified as the largest, most prominent of the 10 or so minority general contractors in the Cleveland area.

It has in the past been listed among the nation's top 100 Black businesses by Black Enterprise magazine.

Its 1985 workload was in excess of $10 million. During his first 12 years, he was able to put together at most $200,000 in projects in any one year.

In those first 12 years, Ozanne was a sole proprietor. Today, the company employs 14, eldest son Dominic is president, and Ozanne is chairman of a three-person board on which his son and wife, Betty, serve.

The elder Ozanne's first job as a contractor was the conversion of a porch into a real estate office for a friend. Today, the company name is associated with such major projects as housing projects, Martin Luther King Plaza, the Justice Center, the Cleveland Hopkins International Airport expansion, the U.S. Postal Service headquarters on Orange Ave., and Lexington Village.

"They're a strong, aggressive company with a good track record," said Joseph A. McCullough, vice president and operations manager for Turner Construction Co., which does quite a bit of joint venture work with Ozanne.

"They are the area's largest minority contracting company. . . . They are a highly respected company within the construction industry," said Catherine A. Barry, editor of the Construction Register, a publication of the Builder's Exchange, a non-profit trade group for the Ohio construction industry.

It wasn't always that way.

In fact, there was a time when Ozanne considered leaving Cleveland.

The company say some good times and some lean times in its beginnings. Back then, Ozanne's first idea was to get into the remodeling business.

"I spent about three to four years in the Building Department and (I) saw minorities buying into the Hough area and buying into new areas that needed work. My first idea was to get involved in remodeling, converting buildings and that kind of thing," he said.

He was familiar with all building codes and could draw plans. He began doing remodeling on the side in 1954, while he still was employed by the city.

After a short time in the remodeling business, Ozanne decided that he preferred the commercial end of building. So in 1956 and 1957, he looked for commercial work.

His first commercial venture was with the city of Cleveland, building a service station at the old incinerator plant on W. 3rd St. ". . . I built it. I mean I literally built it. . . . They put a metal roof on there and I had to weld it myself," he said. The only thing he didn't do was lay brick, he said.

It was his first time dealing with a bonding company and the first of 16 service stations he would eventually build.

He was bonded for $5,000 for the $4,595 city project.

Once he was able to get bonding, he could go after larger projects. It was then that he went after more service station work, building stations for Gulf Oil Co., Shell Oil Co., Texaco Co. and Cities Service Co.

His next bonded job was a Gulf service station at the corner of Lakeview Rd. and Durant Ave. The bond was for $35,000.

"I think the biggest thrill I ever had in my life was when I got two gasoline stations at once. . . . And, that bond had to be awfully large, $70,000. . . . That was really big stuff. That was just before 1958," he said.

"When you started around the $100,000 mark in those days, you were considered heavy," he said.

In 1959, he successfully bid to build the Brooklyn fire station.

Then there were sudden obstacles. Many times, the company bid unsuccessfully. There were even times when the company was the low bidder, but didn't get the job, he recalled. Such has been the case with many minority-owned firms.

He got more proficient in the work, but the big projects did not come his way, he said.

"We bid a lot of work . . . remodeling work and things like that . . . but new building additions never came to Ozanne Construction or new school buildings never came to Ozanne," he said.

The company had to settle for doing work for the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, and doing other jobs it was able to pick up along the way, he said.

Despite his relatively successful start, he did not add staff until 1968 when he had more than one project going at a time.

That also was the year Turner Construction chose Ozanne as its joint venture partner on the Martin Luther King Plaza project.

When the call came, Ozanne was planning to leave town.

"My bags were packed to move to Denver . . . I'd had enough of it. Cleveland had just gotten me right up to here," he said raising his hand to his neck.

The native Texas had never been to Denver, but was willing to go just "to make a major change," he said.

The call from Turner Construction turned what was a dismal point in his career to a positive turning point, he said.

"That was a turning point and we saw it as an opportunity to work with company like Turner, because they took a complete interest in our people and they exposed us to" building systems and techniques, he said.

The Ozannes are advocates of joint venturing as a way for minority contractors to learn building techniques from other contractors, even though such arrangements aren't always lucrative.

Over the years, Ozanne Construction has done six joint ventures with Turner Construction, among them the Orange Ave. postal facility.

The joint venture lent credibility to Ozanne Construction as a general contractor.

There was no long-term strategy for success, Ozanne said, just aggresiveness.

"You know, it's just like a treadmill. You can't stop it. You have to keep it going . . . The necessity of just having new jobs come in the office all the time required us to bid very ferociously for new work," he said.

He said having his son in the business had helped.

Dominic Ozanne began working with his father on jobs when he was 11 or 12, Ozanne said.

Although Dominic Ozanne has a degree from Harvard Law School and worked for two years with the local law firm of Thompson, Hine & Flory, he always wanted to join the family business, he said.

TESTIMONY OF HON. BYRON DORGAN BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN OPERATIONS

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as a colleague of Representative BYRON DORGAN on the Select Committee on Hunger, I want to call attention to his timely testimony before the Foreign Operations Appropriations Subcommittee. Mr. DORGAN trenchantly makes the case for realigning our foreign aid priorities—away from massive growth in military aid toward greater investments in economic and food aid. His analysis of our aid mistakes in the Philippines warrants particular attention.

I also want to commend our colleague for his thoughtful remarks about the value of investments in child survival programs and universal immunization. As the author of a bill to increase the U.S. commitment to global immunization, I found Mr. DORGAN'S remarks on the subject to be right on target. We can save the lives of millions of children for literally pennies per child and it's time we capitalized on the opportunity.

Mr. DORGAN'S testimony follows:

TESTIMONY OF HON. BYRON L. DORGAN, APPROPRIATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN OPERATIONS

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to testify today on the right kind of foreign aid. I know that you have wrestled with this tiger—often times by yourself—so I know that my remarks do not fall on deaf ears. I want to commend you and members of this Subcommittee for trying to develop a foreign aid package which advances our legitimate interests and also meets the pressing needs of the developing world.

This can be a thankless task. Yet, it's a job which must be done if we are to craft a foreign policy that makes sense. I want to try to illustrate some severe blunders in our foreign assistance program and also to highlight what kind of aid really works for us and its recipients.

A MESS IN MANILA

Rarely do we have a chance to look into the belly of a dictatorship to see how our aid went sour. The collapse of the Marcos regime affords us a great chance to see how our aid can be wasted and squandered, if we don't link it to sound policy and if we don't provide the right kind of aid.

It now seems likely that money which we sent to help poor Filipinos was stolen to buy Gucci shoes, fur coats, gold bullion, stocks, bonds, and Manhattan real estate. Over the past 20 years we have poured in nearly $2 billion in aid to the Philippines—about half of it as military aid.

But did this buy us a more democratic government in a key Pacific ally? Did this ensure a long-term lease for vital U.S. military bases in the Philippines? Did this aid help its people shake loose from staggering external debt and a stagnant economy? We know that the answer to all these questions is NO!

We don't yet know all the reasons why things went so awry. We do know that we waited too long to press for democratic reforms. We also waited too long to monitor carefully how our aid was being used. We further assumed naively that massive amounts of military aid could prop up a dictatorship with clay feet.

On the future, we can do better. We can insist that policy and aid are linked together. We can press for tougher oversight and audits on aid. We can change the mix of aid to developing nations, so that we place greater emphasis on food for the hungry, medicine for the sick, teachers for the illiterate, and technical help for self-sufficiency.

Unfortunately, the Administration is proposing the same tired and fruitless program for FY 87 to the Philippines as before. The White House wants to double military aid, virtually drop food aid, and freeze economic aid. I hope that the rise of the Aquino government will realign our priorities and urge this Subcommittee to grab the bull by the horns if President Reagan does not show some leadership.

I would also encourage this Subcommittee to support appropriate efforts to establish a commission to X-ray our aid to the Philippines. We need to find out how that aid was abused and where it ended up. The Philippine Fraud Commission and our own Foreign Affairs Committee simply don't have the resources to find out how President Marcos, with a $5,400 a year salary, managed to spirit away an estimated $5 to $10 billion into foreign real estate, stocks, and bank accounts. This is no small change; it equals the total foreign debt of the Philippines in 1983.

The American taxpayers and the Philippine people deserve an answer to these questions. I have urged the President to appoint a Special Commission to investigate the Marcos money ring. But I hope your Subcommittee, Mr. Chairman, will consider your own initiatives.

TRENDS IN FOREIGN AID

I cite the Philippines as a specific case of a lamentable infatuation with military aid as a security sweetheart. The appended chart of the Congressional Research Service show that this is no aberration in recent years.

You will see that between FY 1981 and FY 1987 we have seen a sizable 62% growth in foreign aid, including a 12% proposed increase for FY 1987 alone. I want to say that I am puzzled at best to understand how the President can propose this when he simultaneously wants to cut all domestic programs by 6%. If getting our budget house in order is one of the best ways to help developing nations, by reducing their debt service costs through lower interest rates, why not start with restraint in foreign aid? I believe we can freeze total aid at the FY 1986 level, or even make cuts, and still meet our obligations.

I also fail to see the budget sense or foreign policy value in a 100% plus growth in military aid, including an 800% growth in the Military Assistance Program. The growth in the MAP account makes the Pentagon's big spenders look like country bumpkins. But the Reagan Administration sees this account as the salvation of governments like Marcos' Philippines. Well, it did not work in Manila and it's not going to work in Port-au-Prince, Haiti—despite the White House plans to pump more riot control equipment and military aid into a country with the lowest literacy and worst hunger problems in the Western Hemisphere.

What the people in the Philippines, the Caribbean, Africa, and Central America need is a fighting chance—not more chances to fight. They need to arm themselves with literacy, self-sufficiency, and health to defeat their real enemies—the scourges of poverty, hunger, and disease. These are the carrion on which Marxism feeds. I only hope we start funneling our aid into these programs with tough controls, instead of into security aid for dictators which ends up in Swiss bank accounts and Imelda Marcos' wardrobe closet.

I won't take time to tackle the tough issue of aid to the contras of Nicaragua to finance our proxy war to overthrow an admittedly distasteful and repugnant Sandinista regime. Let me simply say that we are threatened in Central America—in Wisconsin, North Dakota, Kansas, and Iowa. We are being threatened with the loss of our family farms and small towns.

So I ask the President to spend some time helping our Central America, the Central America at home, before we send down machine guns and rockets to a band of thugs and murderers. I ask this Appropriations Subcommittee to help straighten out our budget priorities so that we preserve genuine security with a strong economy, a defense that works, and the right kind of foreign aid.

HIGH ON THE HOG

I also would like to underscore my concern about the salaries and perks of employees of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Congress can exercise some control over what I consider a misuse of foreign aid by restraining the U.S. contributions to these development institutions.

Salaries at the World Bank and IMF remind me of James Michener's decription of the fictional missionaries in Hawaii: "They came to do good, but ended up doing very well." Much the same could be said of the international civil servants who staff the Bank and IMF.

For example, where can you find a job in the U.S. Government that pays a $130,000 a year salary and offers 4-5% loans for home purchases and 4% loans for children's education? You can at the IMF. If you are an American IMF employee, you'll find that 40% of all employees earn a pay grade with a midpoint of at least $70,000. Moreover, you and everyone else garners what amounts to a tax-free salary. Nice work—if you can get it!

I wonder how we can square the Wall Street salaries and benefits of IMF staff with the pressing needs of nations too poor to even collect accurate employment and national income data. Shaving 10% off the IMF personnel budget, for example, would not in itself save the IMF from an onslaught of Third World debt. But the savings would have been large enough to cover the 1985 overall IMF loss.

I would like to see some belt-tightening around the middle of the IMF and World Bank—not just around the necks of dairy farmers and wheat growers. If we can keep lining the pockets of international aid elites, why can't we afford to let family farmers earn enough to pay their bills?

I plan to ask GAO to look into the salary and benefit packages at these two financial institutions. I want to know if these salaries are out of line with comparable organizations, our own budget goals, and the stated intentions of the Treasury and State Departments.

I have no interest in undermining the legitimate work of these needed agencies. But I believe that they can only help bridge the development gap if they enjoy the solid support of donor governments. I simply think we need to make sure in Congress that the World Bank and IMF are on the right track.

ON THE RIGHT TRACK

Fortunately, we can also point to some real success stories in foreign aid. We do have a responsibility to help our poorer neighbors and to advance the development of younger nations. The question is what kind of aid is the right kind.

For the most part, I think that it is food aid, health aid, and development. Judicious amounts of security aid can undoubtedly help in the right circumstances; but military aid will not do the job if it is used as a surrogate for building genuine security.

For example, our recent provision of emergency food aid to Africa points to the best in the American tradition of helping others. Without timely delivery of American grain and dairy products thousands or millions more Africans would have perished in the recent famine.

Nor has the need for food aid evaporated, despite the good news of better harvests in Africa. Some 69 food deficit countries will need to import 10 million tons of cereals, beyond commercial import levels in the next year, just to maintain consumption at present substandard levels. To meet adequate nutritional levels, they would have to obtain donations of twice that level, according to USDA's 1986 report on World Food Needs and Availabilities. So I don't support the Administration's plan to cut Food for Peace by 6% next year.

Food for Peace builds bridges which last with aid which brings life. When provided creatively in emergency feeding stations or as part of food-for-work projects, such aid can lay the groundwork for survival and longer-term development. As one commentator observed, "People don't eat in the future, they eat every day."

INVESTING IN IFAD

Naturally, the wrong kind of food aid can create a deadly addiction to outside help and sap the nerve of self-sufficient food production. And this need not happen with well-run programs such as we find with CARE, Catholic Relief Services, Lutheran World Relief and others.

But inevitably, the need for people to feed themselves surfaces. It costs $400 to ship a ton of emergency food aid, but only $200 for the International Fund for Agricultural Development to assist individual farmers in improving yields by a ton every year for a lifetime.

In my view, the International Fund for Agricultural Development provides one of the surest, leanest, and most progressive ways to invest in the self-sufficiency of developing nations. IFAD has a proven record of efficiently promoting self-sufficiency, as shown in evaluations by AID.

Most notable of IFAD's successes is its ability to manage and leverage limited resources. It has financed some 152 projects in 83 countries at a cost of about $8.2 billion through early 1985. Yet, its direct contribution was only $1.9 billion. Even more remarkably, IFAD has achieved a loan repayment rate of up to 99%—the envy of any Wall Street banker—with a staff of 100 and very low overhead.

This also is the right kind of aid. I strongly urge the Subcommittee to fund the regular replenishment for IFAD's next three years—at about $30 million a year—and to willingly consider added funds for a Special Africa Fund.

SAVING LIVES FOR PENNIES

Finally, I would like to urge the Subcommittee's support for the purpose of H.R. 3894, which would make available an added $50 million beyond the FY 1986 level for the Child Survival Program of AID.

Every year about 3½ million children die from six easily preventable diseases. These tragedies need not occur. We have on hand the vaccines to prevent these diseases, but only a fraction of the world's children are immunized. To reach the goal of universal immunization by 1990, the United States will have to join other nations in contributing as generously as possible to this worldwide effort.

It makes good sense. For every $1 invested in immunization, $14 in health costs will be saved. And a coordinated child Survival Program can save lives, too. UNICEF estimates that the rate of 40,000 child deaths per day could be cut in half by advancing a simple, four-point program of proven health techniques for literally pennies per child.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman crafting the right kind of aid is no small task. But it's both possible and workable. I have attempted to shine the caution spotlight on some kinds of aid which don't work, like our runaway pre-occupation with aid that explodes. I have also sought to showcase the right kind of aid: Food for Peace, the International Fund for Agricultural Development, and the Child Survival Program. We can do this within budget limits, if we put some clamps on security aid.

Thank you for your attention and I gladly would try to answer any questions which you and members of the Subcommittee may have.

FOUR HONORED AT MOST DISTINGUISHED GREEK AMERICAN BANQUET

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, the United Hellenic Voters of America, headquartered in Addison, IL, held its most distinguished Greek-American Banquet in March and honored four distinguished Greek-Americans in the fields of medicine, religion, government, and business.

This year's honorees were:

DR. ALEXANDER DOOLAS—MEDICINE

Dr. Doolas is presently a senior attending surgeon at the Rush Presbyterian St. Luke's Hospital in Chicago. He is also a director of undergraduate surgical education at the Rush Medical College and a very respected individual in the Greek-American community.

REVEREND FATHER EMMANUEL M. LIONIKIS—RELIGION

Father Lionikis has served the church in many capacities during his 39 years in the Diocese of Chicago. He has also published a number of church service books. He is well known and respected in the community at large.

STEVEN G. NASH—GOVERNMENT

Mr. Nash was elected to the Senate of the Illinois General Assembly in 1978 and served until 1982, he was then elected to the House of Representatives in the Illinois General Assembly. He is well respected as a legislator and community leader.

TOM ANGELOS—BUSINESS

Mr. Angelos was formerly a newspaper publisher and editor in Greece. He is presently the owner and manager of the successful Ambassador Banquets in Elmhurst, IL.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues join me in congratulating these four distinguished members of the Illinois Greek-American community, and in wishing them continued success.

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, recently our distinguished colleague and my fellow Ohioan, MARY ROSE OAKAR, of Cleveland, was featured in the Washington Post. I include this article in the RECORD for the benefit of this entire body.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 31, 1986]

MARY ROSE OAKAR—A LEADER IN THE HOUSE WHO SPEAKS HER MIND

(By Spencer Rich)

About a month ago, recalls Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio), President Reagan told a "welfare story" at a meeting with congressional leaders. It was about a jobless welfare recipient who phoned the employment service ostensibly to look for work, but who hung up immediately when told it was available.

Oakar, who attends the White House meetings as secretary of the House Democratic Caucus, says she and other Democrats who were there—led by the Speaker of the House—were "livid."

"So I raised my hand and the president said, "Yes, Mary Rose?" I said, 'A lot of unemployed people are very proud and don't want welfare. I know 50-year-old unemployed workers who will not take welfare. It's not true that people prefer welfare.' "

The incident illustrates a lot about Oakar and why she is receiving increasing attention as a tough legislator squarely within the liberal Democratic social welfare tradition.

"She speaks up, that's for sure," said a Republican who asked not to be named. "She stands by her guns and doesn't hesitate to let you know what she's thinking—and she knows what she's talking about," said a Democratic official.

The perception is also beginning to spread that Oakar, 46, a 10-year veteran of the House, is a strong party activist of remarkable energy. She is unusual in serving on four committees: Banking, Aging, Post Office and Civil Service, and House Administration. At the Select Committee on Aging, she heads the task force on Social Security, elderly and women. She also chairs the key Post Office and Civil Service compensation and benefits subcommittee, which handles federal employe pensions, health benefits and pay.

And in recent years, Oakar has risen within her party. A member of the Democratic National Committee, she serves as House congressional liaison to the DNC and as an at-large House Democratic whip. She is starting a political action committee called Economic Security PAC to help female candidates, and she speaks at colleges to help recapture the campuses for the Democrats.

"I think the kids are coming around," she says. Oakar calls herself a "moderate" Democrat, but others call her a traditional liberal. She says that when people hear the specifics of what President Reagan wants to cut in domestic programs, they respond well to the Democrats.

Oakar, first elected to the House in 1976, has won most elections since by huge margins; in 1984 she had no opposition and only 44 write-in votes were cast against her. Representing downtown Cleveland and suburbs that include many white ethnic working-class people, she has built a strong pro-labor record.

Increasingly, Oakar also has become associated with women's issues—pay, pensions and Social Security protection—and with consumer matters. These issues have been in political decline in recent years, but Oakar persists.

On the other hand, while she supports the Equal Rights Amendment and family planning and has sponsored numerous bills on women's benefits, she recognizes that "certain women's groups will never endorse me" because of her stance on abortion. She opposes Medicaid funding of abortions and favors special benefits for pregnant women to provide alternatives to abortion.

The youngest of five children in a Maronite Catholic family, Oakar was born in Cleveland, attended Roman Catholic schools, got her B.A. in English, speech and drama at Ursuline College in Cleveland and her M.A. in fine arts from nearby John Carroll University. Her father, a Lebanese immigrant, was a steelworker, construction worker and stonecutter.

She once thought of working on the stage, but turned to teaching instead—for four years at a high school and for six years at Cuyahoga Community College in Cleveland, where she taught English, speech, drama and fine arts. Although she almost was fired for starting a union at the college, she says, "technically I am still on leave from Cuyahoga."

She began her political career as a neighborhood activist, served on the City Council from 1973 to 1976, and made a bid for Congress when the incumbent sought a Senate seat.

When she came to the House, Speaker Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill Jr. (D-Mass.) kept calling her "Rosemary." When she mentioned this, he explained that he has a daughter named Rosemary and a sister named Mary Rose, and that he's always had trouble keeping the names straight.

Oakar is philosophical about being a leading woman in a traditionally male club. "I really can't say I have suffered discrimination in the House because of being a woman. At times the fellows go out of their way to not leave you out." But she says women in the House do feel a special bond, "because after all, there are only 24 of us."

Oakar has a heavy agenda in the 99th Congress, with a special emphasis this year on banking legislation. Because many banks "only want to cater to large accounts," she is pressing to require banks to give certain free services, to bar a minimum balance requirement and to pay interest on all balances.

She is concerned about interstate banking takeovers in which big banks buy smaller banks and funnel the money from depositor savings to investments in other areas. With Rep. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), she wants to introduce legislation requiring large banks to reinvest money in the local community and to make their portfolios public. The Banking Committee has endorsed the idea.

She also has been pushing (so far without success) for big increases in Social Security benefits for women; more free credits for years of absence from the labor force for child care, better benefits for widows and widowers, and above all, for earnings-sharing—a highly controversial plan to give a person Social Security credits for half the earnings of her or his spouse, thereby entitling these people to Social Security disability or old-age benefits on their own.

She is also a strong advocate of improving private pensions for women—for example, cutting the 10-year vesting requirement, which works to the disadvantage of women who join the work force late or who make time off for child care, to five years.

An Oakar-engineered House bill calling for a broad study of pay equity for women and minorities in the federal pay system awaits Senate action. "Women are now 40 percent" of the federal labor force, she says, "but they're clustered in the bottom four rungs" of the scale.

Oakar also describes herself as "a big advocate of federal workers. This administration is just trying to take everything away from them—gut the retirement system, gut their health benefits and gut their pay, too."

While cutting an increasingly high profile in Washington, Oakar still has that other attribute of successful politicians: she's a big home-town booster. Cleveland, she says, is enjoying a "fabulous regrowth" after being hit hard by the shrinkage of heavy industry. Employers based in the city or nearby include TRW, Standard Oil, Eaton, LTV Steel and the only National Aeronautics and Space Administration center "north of the Mason-Dixon line and east of the Mississippi." Cleveland, she says, "is second only to New York in the arts, with the Cleveland Orchestra, all the museums, magnificent old theaters now being revived instead of turned into parking lots, outstanding health institutions."

In fact, Cleveland's health institutions are such that "one year, five members of Congress had heart bypasses at the Cleveland Clinic. I kept sending them baskets of flowers."

BACKGROUND

Elected to House of Representatives in 1976. Ran unopposed in 1984. Represents Ohio's 20th District, including Cleveland. Serves as secretary of the House Democratic Caucus, House congressional liaison to Democratic National Committee and at-large Democratic House whip, and on four committees. Special interest in labor, consumers and women's issues.

MOSCOW MUST START COMPLYING WITH 1975 HELSINKI AGREEMENT

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, today marks the opening of the Helsinki Review Conference on human contacts in Berne, Switzerland. The United States has sent a strong delegation headed by Ambassador Michael Novak.

To commemorate this occasion, the New York Times has printed two excellent statements on the conference, which I am introducing into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Former Soviet prisoner of conscience Anatoly Shcharansky sent one statement to open the Parallel Helsinki Review Conference. The Parallel Conference is a meeting of nongovernmental organizations which has been organized by the Sakharov Institute and Resistance International. Shcharansky highlights the repression and reprisals taken against the original Soviet Helsinki Monitoring Groups, himself the most visible member, and the intolerable treatment being accorded to Dr. Andrei Sakharov, and calls for the Soviet Union to begin—after 10 years—to comply with the Helsinki agreement.

In his article in today's New York Times, Leonard Sussman stressed the importance of focusing attention on the consistent violations of the Helsinki Accords on the part of the Soviet Union. Sussman points out that we are presently in a position to influence human rights practice, and we should take advantage of this forum to do so.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 13, 1986]

MOSCOW MUST START COMPLYING WITH THE 1975 HELSINKI AGREEMENT

(Anatoly B. Shcharansky, who left the Soviet Union in February, is living in Israel. This statement is to be delivered tomorrow in Berne, Switzerland, at the Parallel Helsinki Review Conference, a meeting of non-governmental representatives designed to coincide with the official Helsinki review conference. The meeting was organized by the Andrei Sakharov Institute and by Resistance International, human rights organizations.)

(By Anatoly B. Shcharansky)

I left the world of the gulag only a few weeks ago, and I am not yet ready to speak in public. Nevertheless, I could not refuse to greet you, if only in a recorded message, because the problems that brought you here today are extremely important to many people fighting for their rights in the Soviet Union and elsewhere in the world.

Ten years ago, several dissidents in the Soviet Union created a public group to monitor Moscow's compliance with the Helsinki agreements. Our idea was that many of the human rights issues that divide the governments of the Eastern and Western blocs could be agreed upon by independent representatives of public opinion—people in both East and West who have a vital interest in the implementation of the Helsinki agreements in their own countries. So we voluntarily took upon ourselves the task of examining how the Helsinki agreements were being implemented in the Soviet Union.

Ten years have passed, and what do we see? The Jewish emigration that began in the early 1970's has been brought to a stop by the Soviet authorities. Several hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews who want to leave the Soviet Union cannot do so for no other reason than that the Soviet Government has decided that they cannot.

I spent nine years in Soviet prisons and camps, and I can certify that the conditions in which political prisoners are detained have been getting steadily worse. I shall mention only two particular problems.

First, a new article of the Penal Code, article 188-1, introduced in late 1983, allows the Soviet authorities to extend almost at will the length of time that one remains in prison or in camp. This measure has already been applied to several members of Helsinki monitoring groups now in prison. It is used by the authorities both to prolong the detention of political prisoners who resist "re-education"—who refuse to comply with efforts to make them change their ideas and convictions—and to intimidate the others.

Second, according to a new official directive introduced barely a year ago in the Soviet Union, political prisoners who start a hunger strike can be immediately thrown into a dungeon—a measure that very much aggravates their sufferings.

These are only two examples of the many ways that the authorities are cracking down on political prisoners in camps. Why is this so important? Because, as a rule, the policy regarding the camps very much reflects the general situation in the country—the disregard for the rule of law and the harshness of the repression.

I would like to attract your special attention to the Sakharov case. I do not need to remind you that Andrei Dmitrivich Sakharov is a hero, a model of a honorable man who continues the very best traditions of the Russian intelligentsia, fighting for the trampled rights—be they national, religious or political—of all the people of the Soviet Union.

Needless to say, his present situation is extremely difficult. He is cruelly and unjustly isolated from his family and friends, barred from scientific work and normal social activities. His state of health inspires growing fears. I consider it vitally important at this moment to raise our voices and call for the Soviet Government to stop its persecution of Andrei Sakharov—to grant this remarkable man the possibility to continue his noble activities in dignity and normal conditions.

Looking back at the first documents issued by our Helsinki group 10 years ago, I must say that the longer I spent in prison, the more accurate they seemed and the more important. I also believe that it is more necessary than ever now for international public opinion to press the Soviet Union on these matters. It is high time for Moscow to begin complying with the Helsinki agreement signed in 1975.

I think that the Andrei Sakharov Institute and Resistance International have made a great contribution by organizing this meeting. I hope this work will be continued and will lead to further contacts, contributing at a real détente and to the establishment of genuine trust between the superpowers. In the long run, however, there will be no trust or détente until both sides show full respect for human rights in the keeping with the Helsinki agreement.

IDENTIFY ALL HELSINKI VIOLATORS

(By Leonard R. Sussman)

President Reagan's statement last month attacking human rights violators on the right as well as the left drew great attention from the American press and public—and it was indeed newsworthy that a President known for chiding the Soviet Union began to chastise right-wing oppressors. But will the press remain interested when the camera focuses once again on the authenticated evils of the Soviet empire?

That test starts today and continues through May 26 as delegations from the 35 counties that signed the Helsinki accords in 1975 meet in Bern, Switzerland, to examine whether each signatory is fulfilling its pledge to improve "human contacts."

The meeting will focus on rather intimate human activities—family reunification, travel within and between countries, broadening contacts among citizens of different countries, marriage of people of two nationalities and cross-border contacts between religious groups, labor unions and other institutions.

It all sounds innocuous enough, but crossing borders—whether for simple travel or to reunite families—can still be a dangerous, even deadly business in Europe. Barbed wire and police dogs still deter any crossings from East Germany that have not been paid for by a Western government supplying ransoms for the reuniting of families. Just last year, Czechoslovak guards shot and killed Frantisek Faktor for crossing to Austria. Yugoslav border police killed another Czechoslovak citizen already on Austrian soil, and several others drowned while crossing between Yugoslavia and Austria.

Most prominent Polish human rights activists do not travel abroad for fear they will not be allowed to return to Poland. And the second largest category of political "patients" in the psychiatric hospitals of the Soviet Union—dissidents make up the largest single group—is composed of people who have attempted unauthorized border crossings.

It wasn't surprising, then, that the Soviet Union and its allies strongly opposed the Bern meeting. They belatedly agreed only when the West insisted on maintaining "linkage" between these humanitarian questions and the security aspects of the Helsinki accords.

Bureaucratic procedures for expanding human contacts may not seem newsworthy, but change could reflect significant improvements in the closed societies of the Eastern bloc. Besides, even without significant change—and it is unlikely that this six-week conference will lead to major openings—the quiet oppression in Soviet-bloc countries is always newsworthy, and providing publicity is the most important thing we can do for the victims in the gulags.

The human rights violations that receive most attention occur in countries with significant public connections to the United States. Yet the worst human rights abuses routinely occur in places where we have little or no connections—Iran, Iraq, Cambodia, Vietnam, Afghanistan, North Korea and Eastern Europe, among others. Because Washington has relatively little official business in these countries, there is little press coverage of violations there, and the public receives a distorted view of where the worst oppressors are headquartered.

Of course, the countries where we have the best connections are also the places where we can do most good, using our leverage—usually the promise of economic or military aid—to influence human rights practices. But we can have an effect even on countries where we have no leverage—by providing persuasive public and private expressions of unflagging American abhorrence of human rights abuses and of our determination to work by all effective means to eliminate them.

That abhorrence will be aired in detail by the American delegation at Bern—and it should be properly reported in the press these next six weeks. The Administration is making an important effort to balance its human rights policy, and it is time for the press to provide similar balance in covering the human rights story.

The Soviet Union has insisted that the Bern meetings be closed to journalists, but the American press and public have a responsibility to attend to the "naming of names" at the Helsinki review conference.

H.R. 3002: EXPERIMENT IN VOLUNTARY SERVICES

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see H.R. 3002, the Executive Exchange Program Voluntary Services Act of 1986 come to the floor of the House. The need for this limited experimental program, which would allow the volunteers to be paid by their private industry employer, makes the point that Federal employees, including managers, do not receive salaries which are comparable to their private industry counterparts.

The second aspect of the bill, as amended by the committee, which is significant is the emphasis on the application of laws and regulations on conflicts of interest, financial disclosure and standards of conduct for Federal employees to the private sector volunteers. This section will need attention if we are to ensure that voluntary placements in Federal agencies are not simply a vehicle for making contacts which will benefit the volunteer and his or her parent company for years to come.

This experiment upon which we embark is an exceedingly limited one. There can be up to 10 volunteers sponsored by their parent companies over the next 3 fiscal years. The limited nature of the experiment makes it possible for me to support it. Let us all monitor this experiment closely lest we find that we have created a new way to preserve revolving doors which have worked against the best interests of the American taxpayer.

THE COMMON BOND OF GENERATIONS

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today, as chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, to call the members' attention to an important report released at the committee's April 8 hearing on the interdependence of the generations. This report, "The Common Stake: The Interdependence of Generations," is the definitive statement on the common bond of generations in the health and economic security of Americans of all ages. Yesterday, I distributed copies of this report to each member of the House on behalf of its author—the Gerontological Society of America [GSA]. Today, I urge the Members to carefully review the report's findings.

The results of the committee's April 8 hearing and the GSA report highlight the emotional and economic interdependence of families across generations and their common stake in programs for both young and old. They also alert the Nation to the serious problem of poverty among children that threatens their and America's future. Most important, they warn against the divisive and destructive notion of "intergenerational conflict" that has been recently popularized in the media.

Clearly, we face a serious challenge in meeting the needs of today's and tomorrow's children, young families and elderly—a challenge that calls for a reassessment of current funding priorities. Where some, however, would pit the generations against one another in funding decisions, the GSA report offers a responsible framework for public policy based, instead, on the interdependence of young and old within the family and in society at large.

Few would deny the common bond that exists among family members of all ages and the benefit to older generations of investing in their own children and grandchildren. Few would deny the relief that programs for the aged provide families on whom the elderly would otherwise depend. Yet, after 5 years of cutbacks in programs for America's vulnerable citizens, rising inflation and a deplorable increase in poverty among children, a notion of "intergenerational inequity" has emerged.

This is a frightening notion that defies the strength of traditional family bonds and draws an artificial, simplistic parallel between poor young and "well-off" elderly. The issue is not whether one generation has been assisted at the expense of another, but whether the needs of all vulnerable Americans will be met now and in the future. To the extent that we have made progress in improving the economic security of older persons—the Nation can be proud. To the extent that older persons and their families remain unprotected against the catastrophic costs of long term illness—the Nation must move quickly to provide protection. To the extent that children are being driven into poverty—the Nation must move immediately to pull them out.

The GSA report provides us with the means for educating ourselves and the public on the common bond of generations. With this report in hand, it is my hope that we can redirect the notion of "intergenerational conflict" toward what, in reality, are serious problems of poverty and health-related financial destitution that strike Americans of all ages and carry a heavy toll for the entire family. I urge you, as Members of Congress and as spokespeople for Americans of all ages, to join with me in this effort.

Mr. Speaker, the attached summary of the GSA's report follows:

"THE COMMON STAKE: THE INTERDEPENDENCE OF GENERATIONS"

PREPARED BY THE GERONTOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA [GSA]

Released April 8, 1986 at House Select Committee on Aging hearing "Investing in America's Families: The Common Bond of Generations"

This fact sheet outlines four key issues that are covered in the Gerontological Society of America's (GSA) report, "The Common Stake: The Interdependence of Generations", and that the Society considers essential to a proper framing of the upcoming policy debates on the growing needs of an aging society.

Responsible use of data

It is undoubtedly true that the elderly population of the U.S. is growing and will continue to increase. This leads some researchers and policy makers to question whether there will be sufficient resources to support a retired baby boom generation and whether future taxpayers will have to shoulder unreasonably heavy burdens. These fears are being used to justify shortsighted policies and are helping to create the very conflict between generations that this group hopes to avoid. However, these arguments are based on "voodoo demographics" and ignore a significant part of the picture. Specifically:

Their assumptions do not take into account the effects of economic growth. Given a realistic assumption of two percent growth, the real costs in 2030 of supporting each dependent could be 5 to 6 times greater than in 1960 without increasing the burden on society.

This view also ignores the fact that the aged dependency ratio is only part of the overall dependency ratio. According to the Census Bureau, the dependency burden—which includes underage dependents as well as the elderly—will remain below the levels of the mid-1960's, even at the height of the retirement of the baby-boom generation.

Lastly, this view fails to account for the increasing proportion of the elderly who work. The aged dependency ratio assumes that the elderly do not contribute to the economy and that all persons 18-64 are productive—obviously not true. One-quarter of men aged 65 to 69 worked in 1984 and, in the future, a larger proportion of the elderly will continue to work.

Interdependence of generations

Fifty years ago the framers of our Social Security Act understood that the generations are interdependent. They realized that "old age pensions are in a real sense measures in behalf of children,"—that societally guaranteed benefits to the elderly benefit children and young adults because those public dollars relieve younger generations of heavy financial burdens. The elderly likewise benefit from programs aimed primarily at the young. Each generation has a stake in social policies targeted at those in other age groups:

Younger generations have two important stakes in programs which assist the elderly maintain a decent quality of life. First, programs which assist their grandparents and parents to remain as autonomous as possible in old age relieve younger families of financial burdens and intra-family stresses. And second, they will be served by those programs when they become old.

By providing cash benefits to older family members, Social Security frees up younger and middle-aged family members to concentrate more financial resources on their children to help them become productive members of society.

Social Security stabilizes family and community life by enabling family members to partially protect themselves from major financial risks.

Social Security provides disability and survivors protection to young families.

The elderly benefit directly and indirectly from education, training, and health programs which help increase the productivity of the workforce. The eventual contributions to economic growth and tax revenue will benefit current workers as they age.

A July 1985 Harris poll indicates that, given a choice between cutting defense spending or cutting Medicare, more than 70 percent of adult Americans respond that they would prefer to see defense cuts.

Family care

Contrary to myth, the elderly have not been deserted by their families. However, current public policies are putting extreme pressure on already overburdened caregiving families. If the government does not respond to these growing pressures many families will be overwhelmed by the stress of providing care to relatives. This could effectively undermine the family and ultimately add to the economic and social costs to the nation.

Families, not the government or social agencies, provide 80-90 percent of the health/social supportive services: medically-related care and home nursing, hands-on personal care, household maintenance, transportation, and shopping.

Only 4.3 percent of the daily services needed by older people are provided by Government or social agency workers. The rest is either purchased or given by the family.

Families nowadays provide more care, and more difficult care, over longer periods of time to more older people than ever before. They also strenuously avoid placing older people into institutions, often exhausting themselves emotionally, physically, and financially before taking that step.

When adults aged 18-64 are asked to indicate which public programs they would support, even if an increase in taxes were required, they overwhelmingly favor income security and health care for the old.

Diversity of the elderly

Stereotypes of the elderly—as either all rich or all poor, all healthy or all ill, all retiring voluntarily or all retiring involuntarily—are inaccurate and do not provide a realistic basis for policy making. The older population is actually composed of many different groups of different ages, with vastly different needs. Just as the old image of all the elderly being poverty stricken and eating dog food was inaccurate, so is it now untrue that they all are rolling in wealth. In fact:

In 1984, more than one-fifth (5.6 million) of all elderly were classified as poor and near poor—that is, below the near proverty thresholds ($6,224 for a single elderly person and $7,853 for an elderly couple).

Well over half (56 percent) of women aged 65 and older are not currently married and therefore are likely to be facing old age alone. In addition, not only do older women have substantially lower incomes than men, but most are not entitled to pension benefits and many have no health care insurance.

Certain groups of the elderly—namely widows, the very old and minorities—have very high poverty rates. About 23 percent of all Hispanic elderly, 36 percent of all back elderly, 24 percent of elderly unmarried white women, 46 percent of elderly unmarried Hispanic women and 63 percent of elderly unmarried black women had below poverty incomes in 1983.

While about four-fifths of the non-institutionalized elderly report their health as "good" or "excellent", the other fifth report being unable to carry on a major activity of daily living.

FORT LEONARD WOOD: BEST BASE IN THE U.S. ARMY

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of personal pride that I rise today to inform my colleagues that the Department of Defense has chosen Fort Leonard Wood, MO—located in my congressional district—as the best base in the U.S. Army. This army-wide award given Fort Leonard Wood, was based on how they treat their people, perform their mission, and wisely use resources. Fort Wood was also praised for having innovative management programs that improve productivity and quality of life.

The commanding general of the post, Maj. Gen. James W. van Loben Sels, will be coming to Washington to receive the Commander in Chief's Award for Installation Excellence later this month.

Along with providing basic training for between 30,000 and 40,000 new soldiers each year, Fort Leonard Wood is in process of becoming the leading military engineer training center in the free world. The decision last year to move the Army Corps of Engineers officers' training school to Fort Wood by 1989, will continue the tradition of excellent instruction at the base that helped win the Presidential award this year.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain all the Members join me in congratulating the men and women of Fort Leonard Wood, and wishing them all the best as they continue to do the most important of jobs—protecting liberty, freedom, and our way of life.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF McGLADREY, HENRICKSON AND PULLEN

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity today to thank the accounting firm of McGladrey, Henrickson and Pullen for demonstrating that good tax policy is consistant with good politics.

Partners of McGladrey, Hendrickson and Pullen ran a tax reform workshop in my district last fall while the tax bill was under consideration by the Ways and Means Committee. This workshop provided me with the opportunity to see how my constituents would fare if various tax reform provisions were enacted.

The workshop was conducted on September 5, 1985 in Dublin, CA. Forty-nine constituents volunteered to bring in their 1984 tax returns for confidential analysis by the accountants. The accountants collected the 1984 tax information and compared how much in taxes each constituent actually paid in 1984 with what they would pay if the President's tax reform proposal were enacted. The accountants who ran the workshop analyzed the effects of proposed changes and explained these effects to the workshop participants. The constituents then received a computer printout of their tax analysis for their personal records.

The tax reform workshop was important to me because it illustrated to my constituents that rate reduction could offset the loss of a tax preference or even a combination of tax preferences.

McGladrey, Henrickson and Pullen adapted their computer analysis as the tax reform bill moved through the legislative process to provide a comparison of the various proposals. With each modification, the majority of the workshop participants received a larger tax cut.

By stripping the code of outdated and inefficient tax preferences and reducing the rates, Congress will enable businessmen to concentrate on the economics of their business decisions without getting waylaid by complicated tax considerations.

Closing corporate loopholes to broaden the tax base and reduce tax rates dramatically reduces the tax burden of individuals. Ninety percent of the constituents who volunteered to have their tax returns analyzed would receive a tax cut if H.R. 3838 were enacted today.

The average tax cut for these individuals was $760.90 a year!

Data like this helps remind us as legislators that although the tax reform process is complicated and painful, the result of our labor, if we let good policy prevail, is sweet and simple—more money in the pockets of most individual taxpayers!

The Senate Finance Committee is grappling now with the same tax reform issues and the pressures of provincial interests seem insurmountable. I am delighted to share the results of the McGladrey, Hendrickson and Pullen tax reform workshop to show the beauty of tax reform.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY HONORS WAYNE COUNTY RADIO STATION

HON. DON SUNDQUIST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted today to bring to the House's attention a very high honor that has been bestowed upon a radio station in my district. WNBG Radio in Waynesboro, TN, under the leadership of Station Manager Lisa Nutt, has been awarded a $25,000 cash prize for its efforts to promote the "Crafted With Pride in the U.S.A." campaign. Of 753 entries nationwide, WNBG placed first for its outstanding promotion of American-made goods, specifically in the textile and apparel industries.

In light of the fact that WNBG won first prize over stations with literally 100 times its wattage, I'm proud of this high achievement. But I'm even more proud of the total community effort from the industries of Wayne and Hardin counties that made this award possible. Lisa and her staff rallied the resources of merchants, workers, political leaders, and concerned residents—from Girl Scouts to senior citizens—to promote American made products.

Stuart Epperson, national chairman for radio broadcasters for the Crafted With Pride in the U.S.A. Council, will formally present the $25,000 this week. "We're talking about more than just a contest," said Mr. Epperson. "We're talking about American jobs. A lot depends on what we do to save the entire manufacturing industry in this country."

Though the Crafted With Pride Council is primarily affiliated with the American textile industry, WNBG used the contest as a vehicle also to promote Wayne and Hardin Counties' shoe and furniture industries.

More than any other area of my congressional district, these counties are impacted tremendously by international trade fluctuations in these industries. And despite all of their successful efforts to produce superior products at the lowest possible price, everyone knows that these industries cannot survive without Federal Government policies and practices that enable our industries to be competitive worldwide.

As chairman of the Republican Task Force on International Trade, I'll continue to work in Congress to create a stable and fair world trading atmosphere in which all of us can compete and prosper.

I get pretty fed up when I hear that American businesses must fail because they are wasteful and can't compete in world markets. That's nonsense. I'm familiar enough with our textile and shoe industries to know that these industries are doing more to modernize and stay ahead of the game than practically any other industries in the world. I'm convinced that Americans can and will produce superior products at fair prices. The efforts that culminated in the award to WNBG Radio demonstrate this commitment.

I frankly can't think of a better cause—a display of pride in our American fiber, textile, shoe and home furnishing industries. WNBG's efforts to promote Wayne County products represents perhaps the finest display of good citizenship and pride I've witnessed from a radio station since becoming involved in public service. Lisa Nutt in particular deserves all the credit in the world for her hard and persistent work on behalf of these industries. I salute WNBG for its outstanding performance.

JOANN BURRIS TO RECEIVE KERN COUNTY'S REGISTERED NURSE OF THE YEAR AWARD

HON. WILLIAM M. THOMAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, May 6, the Kern County Registered Nurse Society will present its annual "Nurse of the Year Award" to Joann Burris.

Joann is most deserving of this prestigious award. Throughout her 19 years of service, she has continually demonstrated the utmost dedication of excellence in her field. As supervisor of a high risk neonatal area at the Kern Medical Center, Joann has implemented many programs to improve the entire area of maternal child health.

In addition to the numerous medical organizations in which Joanne participates, she takes the time to initiate programs to improve the growth and development of her patients and staff. She pioneered the Infant Stimulation Program at Kern Medical Center which teaches both staff and new mothers how to respond to infant signals. She also established the Active Outreach Program which utilizes stabilization techniques to decrease high risks to the newborn. She combines the sharp sense of professionalism necessary for crisis care with a unique sensitivity to the emotional needs of the newborn and their families.

Joann makes continuing contributions to her field by sharing her knowledge and expertise with those around her. She has organized orientation programs, led lectures and demonstrations, and has published significant research on neonatal crisis care. She is consistently innovating so that her work will reach the largest number of people possible and all may benefit from her skills and experience.

Joann is an example of one who is dedicated to improving the lives of others. Her contributions are even more impressive when one considers the delicacy of newborn lives. She is most certainly an asset to her profession, and I consider her a tremendous asset to the Bakersfield community.

I would like to extend my deepest congratulations to Joann and wish her continued success in her flourishing career.

JACK KEMP ON REAL MILITARY REFORM

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague, JACK KEMP, has, in a recent Wall Street Journal essay, closely examined the defense bureaucracy and found it sorely wanting. Too many procurement bureaucrats are zealously watched by too many congressional overseers. Their primary product is confusion and paralysis. This centralized, multilayered complex is Robert McNamara's legacy to a nation facing an enormous budget deficit and a menacing, expansionist Soviet Union.

JACK KEMP'S proposed remedies are eminently sensible; many of them are currently at work in America's best-run corporations. Central staffs must be cut; accountability must be restored; internal competition must be encouraged, and innovation must be rewarded. But for these reforms to work, Congress must also curb its voracious appetite for micromanagement. The ultimate result should be greater efficiency in meeting and defeating the Soviet military challenge. I urge all my colleagues to read carefully the following essay by Representative KEMP.

The article follows:

MILITARY REFORMERS, TAKE A CUE FROM BUSINESS

(By Jack Kemp)

Last fiscal year more than $250 billion was spent on defense. Now for the quiz: Name just one item that the Defense Department bought with your money.

If my recent conversations about the defense budget are any guide, about half of you will give the following answer:

A $700 toilet seat.

In 1985 that "toilet seat" became the symbol of the defense-reform debate. To would-be reformers it offered a memorable caricature of everything wrong with our "military-industrial complex." To their opponents it demonstrated not just a disregard for the truth, but even worse, a willful distraction from the serious business of restoring America's defenses.

Both sides have a point. Most Americans have heard only a misleading account of the $700 toilet seat. But the true toilet-seat story also supports the case for defense reform—reform of quite a different kind than Congress is now pursuing.

"SEAT, WATER CLOSET"

Back in fall 1983, the inventory of spare part P/N 941673-101 for the Navy's fleet of P-3 long-range patrol aircraft fell to its replenishment point. Now, the Navy doesn't just go out, negotiate a price for his item, and buy it. Instead, this and most similar purchasing is done centrally for all the services by the Defense Logistics Agency (DLA).

So DLA put in the order for item P/N 941673-101: "Seat, Water Closet," proposed Lockheed price $618.

The junior purchasing clerk at DLA may have scratched his head at a $618 "Seat, Water Closet." But it was not his job, nor, most likely, did he have the technical expertise, to evaluate what a P-3—whatever that is—required. Probably the thing was a lot more complicated than it sounded. And so it was. Part P/N 941673-101 is actually the large molded plastic assembly that holds a $10 toilet seat.

Was $618 a reasonable price for this item? Federal law, as passed by Congress, and federal regulations, as administered by another central defense agency, the Defense Contract Audit Administration (DCAA), are quite specific about how contractors set their prices.

In this case, everything appeared to be in order. So the purchase was approved—with a $100 DLA surcharge tacked on.

The "$700 toilet seat" later caused a stir because it was misleadingly labeled. What should have drawn attention, however, was the $700-plus price tag on an item that the Navy's "price fighter team" subsequently concluded should have cost, even with substantial overhead charges and the DCAA-approved profit margin, about $350: half the DLA price.

The Navy analysts also calculated the price using DCAA-approved charges. They estimated that direct labor and materials would come to $140 per unit, while overhead charges, all fully authorized, would come to $356, or more than twice the direct costs. Add on a few other allowable charges, plus profit, and the Navy calculated the DCAA-recommended price at $626: about what Lockheed charged.

In many ways, this is already a tale of defense reform. Central purchasing by DLA was instituted in the 1960s to enforce uniform purchasing policies among the services, and to take advantage of economies of scale. Regulated, "by-the-book," pricing was established to ensure consistency, to combat fraud, and to simplify review. Centralization, rationalization: These were the goals of dedicated people struggling to bring our huge, diffuse defense establishment under control.

To American business, this story will sound familiar. The multiple administrative layers and swelling headquarters staffs, the overambitious pursuit of economies of scale through centralization, the by-the-book decision-making, the erosion of line operators' authority and accountability: Today these are all well-recognized management problems.

Twenty years ago, of course, they were popular management solutions. And no one represented that approach better than Ford's Robert McNamara, who imposed it vigorously on the Pentagon.

Numbers tell part of the story. Between 1962 and 1968 the total of civilian and military personnel employed by the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Office of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and other central agencies such as the newly created DLA grew from 32,000 to 89,000: Today it is close to 95,000. With this vast growth in the central agencies came more consistency and central control. With it, too, came more administrative layers, more paper work, less responsibility and accountability at every level. And as each new agency or office gained the opportunity to delay decisions or add pet requirements, weapons and equipment grew more and more expensive and took longer and longer to reach the field.

Today America's businesses are busy applying lessons from the past. In a new wave of corporate reform, companies are cutting central staffs, restoring accountability to line operators, fostering innovation, even encouraging internal competition. The need for strong central direction is no longer interpreted as a call for centralization. Rationality is no longer confused with rigid regulation and uniformity.

Unfortunately our government, seldom learns so quickly. Many of the reforms being urged by Congress today would actually produce not less but more centralization and regulation.

In defense procurement, for example, there has been little effort to explore, much less clear, the vast jungle of laws and regulations. At a time when budgets are shrinking, the services themselves would have a powerful incentive to get more for their money—if they were allowed more flexibility in negotiating contracts, or saw success rewarded with something other than an immediate subtraction of any savings realized from the relevant line item in the budget.

But instead of restoring incentives and accountability to the military services, Congress has made itself one more administrative layer: a kind of giant corporate staff that second-guesses and micro-manages every defense program. In 1970 Congress made changes to 180 line items in the defense budget. In 1985, we made 1,315. Even the current legislative proposals to inject more competition and market discipline into defense contracting are mostly just more procurement rules.

This preoccupation with centralized control shows up, as well, in proposals for reorganizing the Defense Department. For example, legislation now before the Senate Armed Services Committee would concentrate power in the hands of the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS). The chairman would replace the corporate JCS as the principal military adviser to the secretary of defense, and would also gain control over the JCS staff, which prepares strategic plans for the U.S. military. While this "reform" would give our civilian leaders more uniform advice—indeed, the advice of a single uniform—it would also help suppress the competition of ideas and encourage civilian leaders to abdicate their responsibility for making hard choices about our nation's defense policy.

Yes, our defense establishment needs reform—a different kind of reform. Rather than further concentrating control in the hands of central Pentagon bureaucracies or a single military adviser, we should be reducing red tape, eliminating bureaucratic layers and restoring responsibility to our line operators—the military services—while making them more accountable for their results. My colleagues Jim Courter (R. N.J.) has taken the lead in many of these issues. For a start we should cut back the size of the central defense bureaucracies. The Hudson Institute, a respected defense think tank, has proposed a 20% reduction. Navy Secretary John Lehman told the House Armed Services Committee last summer that the bureaucracy could be halved—so long, he added, as it didn't have to continue devoting over 700,000 employee-hours a year to answering congressional queries.

Nor should the services escape the knife. Their own bureaucracies have grown large and cumbersome, partly in response to the need for central "coordination" with the rest of the department.

For the most part, the work of the Packard Commission has reflected these concerns. President Reagan's directive to the Pentagon last week to implement virtually all of that panel's recommendations on reorganization and cuts in the bureaucracy should provide the impetus for progress. Now Congress should begin reexamining its own contribution to the chaos. Instead of rushing to pass new laws regulating defense procurement, such as Rep. Les Aspin's bill up before a House Armed Services subcommittee this month, we should first take a long, hard look at what's already on the books. Instead of trying to direct every small decision made by the Defense Department, we should spend more of our time looking at the overall direction of defense policy.

MORE REALISTIC EXPECTATIONS

Finally—and this is not going to be a very popular suggestion—we must develop more realistic expectations about what any defense reform can achieve.

We may have a bloated defense bureaucracy. We do not have a bloated defense budget. The gross inefficiency of the Soviet Union's centrally planned economy has not prevented a leadership willing to impose great sacrifice on Soviet citizens from accumulating enormous military might. Greater efficiency on our own part will not let us escape the consequences of that Soviet buildup. President Reagan's defense program has started us down the road toward regaining our strength. We must seize the opportunity for significant defense reform: but we must not allow reform to become a smokescreen for returning to the policy of weakness that threatened peace and freedom just a few short years ago.

THE LAND OF FREEDOM

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the future of our Nation rests in the hands of the young people of America. And we should be proud that there are many bright, hard working, dedicated young people today who are willing and able to carry the torch of freedom in the years ahead.

I'd like to share with my colleagues the thoughts of one young woman from my State of North Dakota. Penny Knutt, a 16-year-old attending Rock Lake Public School in Rock Lake, ND, is the State's winner of the annual Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States' "Voice of Democracy" context.

Penny makes several vital points in her winning entry which follows:

Past generations of Americans look back on their younger years and say, "Oh, those were the good ole' days." They seem to look at society and see no hope for the young people of today. They just look back on how good things were. But they are overlooking one small detail. They have to see the advances that have been made in the last 75 years or even in the last 10.

Who would have ever dreamed during World War I and II that someday wars might be fought in outer space. Or that man could even walk on the moon and explore our solar system. Or who would have ever thought that the human heart could completely be transplanted or man could live with a man made heart.

The advances and discoveries made in the last century have opened many doors and new opportunities for the young of today; that makes it very difficult to choose a field or profession. With all the opportunities just knocking at our door, all it takes is a little initiative and encouragement, and there's a whole world of things just waiting to be explored.

One thing that being an American gives me is pride—pride in being from such a great country and pride for being part of the American people. As we've seen in recent events, the people of this great country seem to pull together in a great crisis, The overtaking of the TWA flight in which many American hostages were taken is an example. Or all the people in the country pulling together to help their brothers abroad and within the country with their financial difficulties is another. When one is hurt, everyone feels. When one is in trouble, they try their best to help him out of it. It's a sense of brotherhood that makes American people so unique. This gives us, as the future of America, a reason to do everything we can to keep that alive.

When people from other countries look at the United States, they see the land of freedom. From way back in the early history of our nation, people took their chances on the long treacherous voyages to seek freedom in the new world. They wanted freedom of speech and religion. Some came desperately seeking to save their own lives. In many countries today, the people still don't have the freedom that Americans do. In many countries the youth are not allowed to choose a career and pursue it. They are either chosen for them, or they are not allowed to or are unable to continue their education. This should inspire the young people of today even more to take advantage of all that America has to offer them—to make them realize that they really can "be all that they can be".

Because of this freedom, America's youth can strive to do the best at whatever direction in life that they choose. It is our duty to do all we can to make a better today and brighter tomorrow for our children and the generations to follow. I know that because of what America is today, I will be a better persons, and I too will someday be able to say "Ah, yes, those were the good ole' days".

VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCRIPTWRITER CONTEST WINNER

HON. RONNIE G. FLIPPO

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, the Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program was initiated 38 years ago with the endorsement of the U.S. Office of Education and the National Association of Secondary School Principals. Sponsorship was provided by the National Association of Broadcasters, Electronic Industries Association, and State Association of Broadcasters.

Starting in 1958–59, the program was conducted in cooperation with the Veterans of Foreign Wars with the broadcasters still serving as sponsors. In 1961–62, the Veterans of Foreign Wars assumed sole sponsorship responsibility.

During the past 24 years under VFW sponsorship, the annual national scholarships have been increased to six, totaling $32,500, with the first-place winner currently receiving a $14,000 scholarship to the school of their choice. To date, over 5 million students have participated nationwide with the winners receiving more than $3 million in scholarship awards.

The winning script for the State of Alabama was written by Chever Hardin Kellogg of Huntsville, AL. Chev is a senior at Randolph School. He is an Eagle Scout, has served as president and vice president of the Student Government Association, and has received numerous awards for academic achievement.

This year's contest theme was "New Horizons for America's Youth." I want to congratulate Chev Kellogg on his thoughtful and insightful script, and I ask that his winning composition be reprinted here.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

(By Chev Kellogg, Huntsville, AL)

The sun. Every morning it rises, spraying its warm light over the dark earth. Every morning it rises, awakening people to a new day and new deeds. All over the nation it rises, a daily testament to the eternal hope and glory of mankind, and all over the nation the hopes and dreams of America's youth rise with it.

This dawn, like all the ones that came before and all that will follow, symbolizes the mission of American youth. Although the essence of a sunrise remains the same from day-to-day, the constantly changing contours and colors create a distinctly different effect each morning. Just as the sunrise accomplishes its age-old duty in a different way each day, American's youth constantly searches for a perfect solution to the problems that face our country today.

I am reminded of a story I once heard. It involved a man whose home lay through a maze of tiny streets and finally past a nearby junkyard. Because of these complicated directions, the man's journey to and from his home was always an arduous task and no guests could be directed to his house. This problem was solved, however, when the man became lost on his way home one day. In this lost condition the man drove through a few short streets and finally stopped at a peacock farm for directions. As he angrily stepped from his car the man suddenly saw his home in the distance and realized that he had found both a shorter and because of the peacock farm, more beautiful way home.

Just as this man found a more effective and more satisfying path to his home, the new horizon for America's youth lies in the search for new and better answers to old problems.

This search for new solutions is readily apparent in the solution of modern environmental problems. Parts of America are currently vexed by a major smog problem. In an attempt to stop this pollution of our environment, several cities raised the heights of their smokestacks. This height increase diffused the smoke higher into the atmosphere, where it was subsequently spread over a vast area, ending the smog problem. Unfortunately this diffusion of smoke contributed to another problem: acid rain. America is now seeking to solve both the smog and acid rain problems without further damage to the environment.

Just as America is seeking a solution to the constant problem of pollution. America's youth must use new ideas and new technologies to solve problems that, in the past, have seemed insoluble. Although the youth of America will rely on the same patriotic devotion to America, they must seek new routes to solve such problems as social security funding and the high crime rates nationwide. Just as a tree, always growing upward, must send its branches in all directions to survive and grow, America's youth must search for new solutions to America's problems, and through the solving of these problems the nation will be made stronger.

The sun is setting now, with mere wisps of fleeting daylight left to remind us of its presence. But this sunset is not an end. It is instead a symbol of the unending promise that tomorrow holds for the new horizons of America's youth.

GEORGE BUSH'S MISTAKE

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, the saga of GEORGE BUSH's mission on behalf of higher oil prices is one of the most intriguing we have seen unfold in awhile. Despite some obfuscation, it does seem clear that Vice President BUSH thought it appropriate to lobby in various quarters—including Saudi Arabia—for higher oil prices. The fallacy of that policy has been cogently laid out in two recent articles which I ask be printed here.

Lester Thurow in the April 8 Boston Globe points out that while it is reasonable to have an element in national policy that deals with a particular economic distress that certain sectors of the economy encounter, that ought to be done in an explicit and open fashion and not by lobbying foreign nations to charge all Americans higher prices for a vital commodity.

And an editorial in the April 28 New Republic provides a very thoughtful and balanced analysis both of the problems and advantages presented to us by rapidly dropping oil prices, and proposes intelligent policies to take advantage of the opportunities and diminish the problems. Lobbying the Saudis to keep oil prices high is not one of the policies proposed.

The articles follow:

[From the Boston Globe, April 8, 1986]

AN INAPPROPRIATE TRIP

(By Lester C. Thurow)

Last week's newspapers reported that Vice President George Bush was off to Saudi Arabia to persuade the Sheiks to hold up the price of oil. The announced reason for this mission was to prevent oil firms and their associated service industries from going broke in the oil patch—Texas, Oklahoma and Louisiana—and to lessen the probability that Third World oil-exporting countries would go broke.

If treason is defined as a betrayal of American interests, then such a mission should be viewed as something close to economic treason. The United States imports approximately one-third of its oil supplies. Any country that is a net importer of oil unambiguously benefits from a fall in the price of oil. Americans have to spend less of their money buying energy and as a result they have more income left over to buy other goods and services.

Any vice president interested in the welfare of America would be working to lower the price of oil—not raise it. For America, higher oil prices are bad, lower oil prices are good, and there are no circumstances that reverse this conclusion.

This does not mean, however, that every American benefits from falling oil prices. That, of course, is not true. America produces about two-thirds of its own oil and those associated with the oil industry are going to suffer much lower incomes—some of them will, in fact, go broke as the price of oil falls. But the income losses imposed on those in the oil industry will be smaller than the real income gains harvested by the rest of America.

If America produced all of its own oil, a $15 dollar per barrel fall in the price of oil would neither raise or lower the average American income. Some American oil consumer would have $15 extra since he could buy oil for $15 less, but some American oil producer would have $15 less to spend since he was selling his oil for $15 less.

But if America imports one-third of its oil, the American consumer gets a $15 gain when the price of oil falls, yet only two-thirds of the loss ($10) is suffered by American producers. The rest of the loss (the other $5) accrues to oil producers in the rest of the world.

It is perfectly appropriate for the Reagan government to want to do something to prevent massive bankruptcies in the oil patch. But to go to Saudi Arabia to ask them to hold up the price of oil is perfectly inappropriate. It is perfectly inappropriate since it is the most expensive way imaginable to help those in the oil patch. If help is to be given to the oil patch, there are much cheaper home-grown alternatives.

The cheaper domestic alternative is to tax the oil consumers whose real income is rising with an oil tax and use the revenue from this tax to give income subsidies to those in the oil patch whose income has fallen. Even if this were done to the extent that those in the oil patch suffered no income reductions (they were given 15 extra dollars for every barrel of oil they produced), the American consumer would still be left with an extra $15 for every barrel of imported oil.

If Saudi Arabia raises the price of oil, the American oil consumer is effectively being taxed by Saudi Arabia and he loses not just the income that must be taken away from him to subsidize those in the oil patch, but also the income that must be taken away to subsidize those who sell imported oil—Saudi Arabia. If Americans are to be taxed to help those in the oil patch, an American tax beats a Saudi Arabian tax every time.

Given this reality, why then is Vice President Bush off to Saudi Arabia to ask the Saudis to raise their taxes on Americans? One does not have to be completely cynical to understand the rationale.

To tax American oil consumers overtly to subsidize American oil producers is a political non-starter of the first magnitude. Far better to have the Saudis raise the price of oil and covertly tax the American oil consumer to subsidize the American oil producer. In addition, President Ronald Reagan has promised not to raise American taxes. A Saudi tax increase is not a technical violation of his "no new taxes" pledge.

If one is only slightly cynical, other factors come into play. The oil industry is a major source of campaign financing for the Republican party and that no candidate for the presidency, especially one from Texas, could really run for the presidency without oil money. One gets such money by asking for higher oil prices. In addition, if too much of the oil industry goes broke, the oil industry will have no money to contribute to any campaigns—no matter how much they may love him.

Personally, I have some sympathy with adopting domestic public policies to prevent a total collapse of the oil-patch economy—it is part of America—and America should be willing to come to the aid of its different regions when they are in trouble, although I admit Texans don't make it easy to be sympathetic. But I have no sympathy with the vice president's mission to Saudi Arabia. It is a wrong policy at a wrong time in a wrong place.

(Lester C. Thurow is the Gordon Y. Billard professor of economics and management at MIT.)

[From the New Republic, April 28, 1986]

OIL DRIP

The ideal price for oil would be $0 a barrel. As Henry George explained more than a century ago in Progress and Poverty, the cost of natural resources is nothing more than a tax on the productive elements of the economy—labor and capital. The $15 plummet in the price of oil during the past few months—from about $27 to about $12 a barrel—has been like a $90 billion annual tax cut for the American economy. The policy question is what we should do with our $90 billion.

Vice President Bush thinks we should give part of it back. Well, who knows what—or if—George Bush really thinks. During the first week in April, Bush said regarding the proper price of oil: (a) that he was going to urge the Saudis "that we not just have a continued free-fall . . . without a parachute"; (b) that "our answer is market, market—let the market forces work"; (c) that whereas the Saudis want higher prices, the United States "ought to be pleased" by low prices; and (d) "I don't know." He continues to imply, though, that there is some danger to the nation if prices get too low. Others say it outright.

The ostensible danger of low oil prices is fourfold. First, prices could go up again if we allow ourselves to get too dependent on foreign supplies. Second, apart from price, we need the guaranteed supply of oil that only a large domestic industry can provide. Third, low prices are devastating the energy-producing regions of the country, with potential ripple effects, mostly involving the collapse of banks. And fourth, Mexico and other Third World producers are also being devastated, with potentially explosive consequences, both political and economic.

The United States is a net energy importer. Therefore, it is a mathematical certainty that the nation as a whole is better off, not worse off, with lower prices. As with any dramatic economic change, there are winners and losers, but that's capitalism. When oil prices were going up, an equally dramatic and far less desirable change, those now complaining the loudest felt very strongly that the government shouldn't interfere. As for the ripple effects, banks in trouble are forever holding themselves hostage and demanding ransom. We're skeptical. But even if a bailout were required, doing it directly would be far cheaper than showering the oil regions with money in the hope that some of it will land where it's needed.

The foreign policy consequences of cheap oil are also generally favorable. Yes, it's bad for Mexico. But it's also disastrous for the Soviet Union. Cheap oil may cost the Soviets a third of their hard-currency earnings. It's a blessing for the very poorest nations—those with no oil of their own. And it's bad for the terrorist international, whose formerly oil-rich patrons will be watching their pennies in the future.

The national security argument for maintaining a domestic oil capacity cannot be laughed off. Nor can concerns of a future OPEC rip-off if we lower our guard too much now. What can be laughed off are most of the estimates of how the domestic industry would dry up with lower prices. For one thing, prices are not likely to stay as low as they are now. If they settle at $15 to $18 a barrel, most of the most productive wells will still be profitable, and so will continued exploration. In addition, there's a countervailing factor at work. If a steel plant shuts down, you don't have a steel plant. If an oil well shuts down, you may not have an oil well, but you do have the oil—in fact, you have more of it, in more accessible locations, than if you kept pumping away full speed. When and if prices go back up, you can reopen the well. (Yes, it's not quite that easy. But it's also not as hard as oil industry apologists would have you believe.)

Of all the policies being proposed for dealing with these problems, real and imagined, the most insane is Bush's original suggestion, echoed by Secretary of Energy John Herrington, that we should talk the price of oil back up, or at least try to prevent it from falling further. To start with, this would negate all the foreign policy benefits of lower oil prices worldwide. (And surely direct aid to Mexico would make more sense than indirect aid to Mexico, the Soviet Union, and Libya.) Financially, every dollar extra we pay for oil is a 30-cent gift to foreigners and a 70-cent subsidy to domestic oil producers.

An import fee is only marginally more sensible. At least in this case the foreigners' share of the take would go to the U.S. Treasury instead. But since an import fee will raise the price for domestic oil by an equal amount, it is in effect a huge and utterly unjustified handout to domestic oil producers. A ten-dollar-a-barrel import fee, for example, would raise about $20 billion for the government and transfer another $40 billion from oil consumers (including businesses) to producers.

A gasoline tax or other broad-based energy levy would prevent this unjustified windfall. In terms of preventing renewed overdependence on foreign oil, guarding our achievements in conservation is at least as important as continued domestic production. A gas tax would have the same effect in encouraging conservation as an import fee, but for any given burden on consumers and businesses, it would bring three times as much revenue to the government. The rule of thumb is that every penny increase in the gas tax would bring in a billion dollars of revenue. A 20-cent gas tax increase, for example, would be an easy $20 billion. Gasoline prices would still be below where they were six months ago, way below what consumers pay in almost every other country, and—in real terms—even below where they were at the beginning of the energy crisis.

How to use the money? Part of it should be used to fill up the Strategic Petroleum Reserve and, if possible, to create new reserves while oil remains cheap. Huge stockpiles of quickly available oil are our best defense against either a huge price hike or a sudden shutoff by foreign producers. Buying the oil from foreigners now at $12 a barrel makes a lot more sense than paying our own producers $27 a barrel in the hope that they'll still be producing at that price when and if we need them.

The rest of the money could be used to reduce the deficit which isn't going to go away even with all this good news. If that's intolerably sensible, it also could be used to finance a reduction in the FICA (Social Security) tax, the most regressive and economically destructive of all federal taxes, and one that has increased dramatically during the supposedly tax-cutting Reagan years.

Oh. And a few dollars might profitably be invested in a copy of Progress and poverty for George Bush.

A LETTER FROM AMBASSADOR FENWICK

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of our colleagues, a letter which I received from our former colleague—Ambassador Millicent Fenwick. Ambassador Fenwick graciously wrote to me regarding a report on Social Policy by the House Wednesday Group, which I currently chair.

Mr. Speaker, I know that you and our colleagues have great respect and admiration for Millicent. Not only does she perform admirably in heading the U.S. mission to the U.N. Agencies for Food and Agriculture, but she still takes time to share her important views about the things happening on this side of the Atlantic.

Her letter, like the Wednesday Group report, speaks to issues affecting families and child care, welfare policy, health policy, and civil rights. In the area of welfare policy, she points out that it is "unwise to give independent welfare status to a very young teenager * * *. The hope of an independent apartment and income, of medicaid and food stamps, constitute an escape from many a crowded welfare household. But, more importantly, no escape from the welfare syndrome."

Mr. Speaker, I know that I speak on behalf of all our colleagues when I say how much we appreciate Millicent continuing to share her wisdom with us on these vital issues.

I am pleased to include a copy of her letter for the RECORD:

UNITED STATES MISSION TO THE UNITED NATIONS AGENCIES FOR FOOD AND AGRICULTURE,
Rome, Italy, March 6, 1986.

Hon. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.,
Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR BILL: The Wednesday Group agenda, "Social Policy," arrived here in Rome Tuesday. It is an excellent document and, as always with Wednesday Group proposals, I am stimulated to write concerning a few ideas that might be useful, or worth considering:

FAMILIES AND CHILD CARE

1. I think repeal on the tax on marriage would be a great boom to all two-earner families. My bill in the House had 160 cosponsors, as I remember it. It received a slight nod of acceptance while I was still in the House, but some States have a simple, direct form we really should copy.

2. Trying to do something about child care when I was still in Congress, I found an excellent system devised by the Chicago Telephone Company, which had an overwhelming majority of women as employees. It was organized by one competent social worker, employed by the company, who presented this plan to the women: "If you need child care, get together with some of these employees who live near you and are mothers. Choose a woman in your area to whom you would be happy to confide your children while you are at work. Five children would be the maximum for any one such child care center, operating in the home of the one you have chosen. The company will interview and, if necessary, give the necessary training to this foster mother." The foster mother may be a low-income—or even a welfare recipient—who has the confidence of the working mothers. The working mothers pay her a very small sum each week. The expense to the company is the high-powered social worker that they provided to organize the whole system, and to check the ability of the one the mothers have chose. There was also a very good child care system in Maryland, and another in Maine but I don't remember the details.

3. I am convinced—by the California experience—that preventive care for mothers and children is the wisest of all investments. But I cannot see why WIC and MCH are not merged. Unless the regulations have changed, a pregnant woman can go to WIC for advice on nutrition. So can her child, for 5 years. The mother, however, is limited to one year's services of WIC after the birth of the baby. So we have two sets of books, practical inconvenience for the mother, and an uncoordinated system. I proposed this merger to the Labor and Education Committee and the key witness against my proposal was a professor from Johns Hopkins. I was forced to go to a Foreign Affairs meeting scheduled at the same hour and missed the professor's appearance. When I telephoned him to inquire about his testimony I found that his main and only objection was that maternal and child health had no nutrition specialist. I asked if he would approve the merger if maternal and child health were required to include nutritional counseling by a qualified person. And the answer was "Well, we are all set up this way." Here we have a ridiculous situation—inconvenience for the mother; lack of continuity in health care; useless duplication and expense for the taxpayer.

WELFARE

1. The Plainfield Chapter of the Red Cross under Mabel Sias' direction, runs a program whereby welfare mothers are trained as Home Helath Care Practitioners. Over 90% of them receive jobs in private employment. I believe Charlie Rangel is the author of this legislation—in any case, when funds were threatened, Mrs. Sias asked me to put her in touch with Charlie, and apparently it worked.

2. Another point was made in a most interesting article in the New York Times written by Francis Cline, the sociologist. The article strongly suggested that it was unwise to give independent welfare status to a very young teenager who was still under the necessary protection of the child labor laws. The hope of an independent apartment and income, of medicaid and food stamps, constituted an escape from many a crowded welfare household. But, more importantly, no escape from the welfare syndrome. Cline quoted the teenager he interviewed as saying, "My girlfriend told me all about how to do this." This will perpetuate what Ken Auletta has called the permanent underclass.

HEALTH

1. The HMO process has always interested me. I worked hard with organized labor in New Jersey to encourage and facilitate the establishment of an HMO and I cannot see why the system has not developed more quickly and more widely.

2. Home health care, and long-term medical care, need to be completely reoriented, I think. Our New Jersey nursing homes, in order to get a license, had to take a certain number of indigent patients paid for by the public. The cost was roughly half or a little more than half what rich people paid. For example, at a time when average nursing homes cost $70.00 a day, the indigent was cared for at $40.00 a day (the State nursing home costs over $80.00 a day!) My hope was to give the patient—or the family—half the nursing home cost in a home health care subsidy. My interest in all this was sparked by a pitiful letter, and subsequent telephone call, from a woman whose mother was in the hospital and was threatened with being transferred to a nursing home. Both mother and daughter were horrified by the prospect, and the doctor, too, thought it would be most damaging. The therapy the mother needed could have been paid by a home health care subsidy which could go directly to the daughter. All that was needed from the State was a bimonthly visit to make sure that the patient was happy and the therapist was being paid. (The sad sequel to this is that I could not arrange home health care. The mother went to the nursing home and died of "transfer trauma" within three weeks). These sums are probably out of date but the point is this: when doctor, patient and family urge care at home and when the payment to the family covers the cost of the necessary therapy at half the cost to the taxpayer, it seems ridiculous to continue an expensive, anti-human system. HEW Secretary Califano greatly approved this idea and tried it, he said, in Texas in a rural and in an urban district. But I found after repeated checking that the money was not given to the family but instead to a variety of organized therapists. (For example, an elderly Mexican-American woman was being given speech therapy when her family and she were quite accustomed to the communication system they used for many years).

3. Another point can be made when one considers that in many areas hospitals are overbuilt and have empty wards. These wards could be used for nursing home care at less cost than nursing home prices. The only reason they are not used in this way, as one hospital administrator explained it to me, is the Federal regulation which stipulates that Federal support for the care of the indigent will be "at cost." This means factoring-in CAT scans, ultra sound and other expensive equipment. The simple solution to the problem would be to change the regulation to read "at cost or less."

CIVIL RIGHTS

1. The description of the lack of civil rights in the housing field is absolutely disgraceful. Page 7 of your paper reads ". . . if an alleged violator of Title VIII refuses to participate in such proceedings, there is little HUD can do." That is outrageous and I agree that with the last paragraph on page 15 which suggest corrective as well as punitive sanctions. Most people just want a house, and justice under the law, and would rather get a house than be involved in a court fight.

2. I have also been very much interested in affirmative action programs. I would like to suggest that all Federal and State agencies, particularly those located in core-cities, should form teams of their employees, to go into the high schools and tell the students what the requirements are for each of the occupations, in which the employees are involved. For instance, I see a white truck-driver, a black doctor, a female administrator, a Puerto Rican or Asian nurse who—without mentioning race—would by their very presence, and composition as a group, make clear the goal of equal opportunity. Companies in the area should be encouraged to do this to.

Bill, I know you will turn this over to one of our wonderful staff members but I hope some of it will be useful.

All the best to you, as always.

Sincerely,

MILLICENT H. FENWICK,
Ambassador.

OPENING OF THE BERN HUMAN CONTACTS EXPERTS MEETING OF HELSINKI SIGNATORY STATES

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to remind my distinguished colleagues that today marks the opening in Bern, Switzerland, of the Human Contacts Experts Meeting of Helsinki signatory states. As Co-Chairman of the U.S. (Helsinki) Commission, I can point with some institutional pride to the convention of the 6-week conference, which is the brainchild of the Helsinki Commission. The Commission, under the leadership of Representative DANTE FASCELL, developed the idea in 1979 as it worked with the State Department to prepare for the Madrid Review Meeting of Helsinki signatory states. The Commission strongly believed that holding a human contacts meeting as well as other human rights forums were necessary to counterbalance the expected post-Madrid security conference.

The U.S. delegation, under the direction of Ambassador Kampelman, and other Western delegations to the Madrid Conference, eventually adopted the Commission's idea and, after 3 long years of tenacious negotiation, achieved agreement with the East to hold the human contacts conference.

Bern is coming at the midpoint between summits when prospects for East-West relations will be a matter of intense popular speculation and comment. As Anatoly Shcharansky pointed out in his message to representatives of nongovernmental human rights advocacy organizations meeting in Bern: "I hope this work will be continued and will lead to further contacts, contributing to a real détente and to the establishment of genuine trust between the superpowers. In the long run * * * there will be no trust or détente until both sides show full respect for human rights in keeping with the Helsinki agreement." Mr. Speaker, I respectfully request that the entire statement by Anatoly Shcharansky as reported in The New York Times on April 13 appear in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The overriding humanitarian theme for the United States at the Bern meeting is the expansion of people-to-people contacts across East-West borders, on an individual basis or by groups, whether for the purpose of emigration, family reunification, repatriation, or travel for personal or professional purposes.

The U.S. Helsinki Commission has urged the U.S. delegation to begin from the premise that Europe is unnaturally divided by force. Artificial barriers to the free flow of people having extensive common ties and interests have been erected. Physical barriers, such as the Berlin wall, have been built. In addition, legal, procedural, and financial obstacles are imposed and methods of intimidation are applied by East bloc governments in order to dissuade would-be emigrants or travelers.

In the decade since the accords were signed, the West has chronicled some steps forward as well as a litany of Eastern human rights violations. In the human contacts field, for example, there have been some welcome easements in the emigration and travel policies and practices of some East bloc countries and a net increase has been registered in East-West travel. Yet, despite their Helsinki commitments, a number of the participating states continue to maintain policies stringently limiting and controlling the movement of their citizens. Helsinki monitors, human rights activists, religious believers, unofficial peace group members, and free trade unionists continue to be prosecuted for their efforts to maintain independent contacts with Eastern and Western counterparts.

In itself, the Bern meeting will not provide any guarantee of Soviet or East European compliance with the human contacts section of the final act and of the Madrid document. It will, however, provide an excellent and timely mechanism for examining how human contacts provisions have been implemented and will be a useful forum to encourage greater compliance with them in the future. In light of Eastern violations, it would be detrimental to the Helsinki process if the exchanges at the conference were limited to technical discussion. The freer flow of people across East-West borders should be forthrightly raised as the overriding humanitarian theme of the Bern meeting.

I, therefore, encourage my colleagues in Congress to lend their active support to the U.S. delegation in Bern, ably led by Ambassador Michael Novak, in a common effort to draw international attention to existing human contacts violations and to seek practical solutions to humanitarian problems in this field.

MOSCOW MUST START COMPLYING WITH THE 1975 HELSINKI AGREEMENT

(By Anatoly B. Shcharansky)

I left the world of the gulag only a few weeks ago, and I am not yet ready to speak in public. Nevertheless, I could not refuse to greet you, if only in a recorded message, because the problems that brought you here today are extremely important to many people fighting for their rights in the Soviet Union and elsewhere in the world.

Ten years ago, several dissidents in the Soviet Union created a public group to monitor Moscow's compliance with the Helsinki agreements. Our idea was that many of the human rights issues that divide the governments of the Eastern and Western blocs could be agreed upon by independent representatives of public opinion—people in both East and West who have a vital interest in the implementation of the Helsinki agreements in their own countries. So we voluntarily took upon ourselves the task of examining how the Helsinki agreements were being implemented in the Soviet Union.

Ten years have passed, and what do we see? The Jewish emigration that began in the early 1970's has been brought to a stop by the Soviet authorities. Several hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews who want to leave the Soviet Union cannot do so for no other reason than that the Soviet Government has decided that they cannot.

I spent nine years in Soviet prisons and camps, and I can certify that the conditions in which political prisoners are detained have been getting steadily worse. I shall mention only two particular problems.

First, a new article of the Penal Code, article 188-1, introduced in late 1983, allows the Soviet authorities to extend almost at will the length of time that one remains in prison or in camp. This measure has already been applied to several members of Helsinki monitoring groups now in prison. It is used by the authorities both to prolong the detention of political prisoners who resist "re-education"—who refuse to comply with efforts to make them change their ideas and convictions—and to intimidate the others.

Second, according to a new official directive introduced barely a year ago in the Soviet Union, political prisoners who start a hunger strike can be immediately thrown into a dungeon—a measure that very much aggravates their sufferings.

These are only two examples of the many ways that the authorities are cracking down on political prisoners in camps. Why is this so important? Because, as a rule, the policy regarding the camps very much reflects the general situation in the country—the disregard for the rule of law and the harshness of the repression.

I would like to attract your special attention to the Sakharov case. I do not need to remind you that Andrei Dmitrivich Sakharov is a hero, a model of a honorable man who continues the very best traditions of the Russian intelligentsia, fighting for the trampled rights—be they national, religious or political—of all the people of the Soviet Union.

Needless to say, his present situation is extremely difficult. He is cruelly and unjustly isolated from his family and friends, barred from scientific work and normal social activities. His state of health inspires growing fears. I consider it vitally important at this moment to raise our voices and call for the Soviet Government to stop its persecution of Andrei Sakharov—to grant this remarkable man the possibility to continue his noble activities in dignity and normal conditions.

Looking back at the first documents issued by our Helsinki group 10 years ago, I must say that the longer I spent in prison, the more accurate they seemed and the more important. I also believe that it is more necessary than ever now for international public opinion to press the Soviet Union on these matters. It is high time for Moscow to begin complying with the Helsinki agreement signed in 1975.

I think tht the Andrei Sakharov Institute and Resistance International have made a great contribution by organizing this meeting. I hope this work will be continued and will lead to further contacts, contributing to a real détente and to the establishment of genuine trust between the superpowers. In the long run, however, there will be no trust or détente until both sides show full respect for human rights in the keeping with the Helsinki agreement.

THE REAGAN NICARAGUA POLICY: A PRECONCEIVED, PARANOID, OBSESSIVE SCRIPT

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, a most intelligent article titled "Reagan's Nicaragua Obsession Puts All the Hemisphere at Risk," by Mexican novelist and former diplomat Carlos Fuentes, appeared in the April 6, 1986 Los Angeles Times. I want to share it with my colleagues.

The author writes, in part:

Ronald Reagan's failed Central America policy is less of a danger to Nicaragua, which is geared to defend itself for a long, long time, than to the United States' friends on the continent and, eventually, to the United States itself, acting in this matter as its own worst enemy * * *

A great deal—the respect and credibility of a whole continent; a whole range of political opportunities—is being sacrificed to very little—a preconceived, paranoid and obsessive script.

Mr. Speaker, giving money to the Contras will undermine our relationship with all of Latin America, and will in no way advance our own national and security interests. Mr. Fuentes' article, which follows, articulately explains why, and I urge our colleagues to read it. Thank you

The article follows:

APPROACHES TO THE AMERICAS—REAGAN'S NICARAGUA OBSESSION PUTS ALL THE HEMISPHERE AT RISK

(By Carlos Fuentes)

The real political choice for the United States in this hemisphere is between the contras and the governments of Latin America. Perhaps in all its history, Latin America has never before been governed by such an exceptional group of men: capable, honest, democratically oriented and internationally educated individuals. To name not all: Argentina's Raul Alfonsin, Uruguay's Julio Sanguinetti, Brazil's Jose Sarney, Peru's Alan Garcia, Mexico's Miguel de la Madrid, Guatemala's Vinicio Cerezo, Venezuela's Jaime Lusinchi and Colombia's Belisario Betancur (as well as his probable successor, Virgilio Barco) form a constellation of heads of state offering the United States an unparalleled opportunity for cooperation and the solution of problems.

These men appear on the scene, however, during a period of harrowing economic and social dilemmas. It is far from certain they will find solutions. Too many intractable forces—a disillusioned middle class, a mob of urban marginals, a deeply dispossessed working class, a blighted agricultural proletariat—are seething under the veneer of stability. The democratic gains of the last few years, so fervently hailed by those who did nothing to bring them about, run the gravest risks of becoming mere swallows caught in a sudden winter storm. The military, unwilling to administer the crises, are nevertheless waiting in the wings.

One dreams of what leaders such as Franklin D. Roosevelt or John F. Kennedy would have done together with a comparable group of Latin Americans. Certainly not offer them a contra war in Central America, distracting attention from the really important questions of economic survival, draining energies from the internal to the international stage, dividing national opinion and threatening, in sum, the feeble stability of the continent. The last thing that De la Madrid, Alfonsin or Sarney need is an escalating conflict in Latin American territories, leading inexorably to generalized war—by accident, by slippage or by will.

Ronald Reagan's failed Central American policy is less of a danger to Nicaragua, which is geared to defend itself for a long, long time, than to the United States' friends on the continent and, eventually to the United States itself, acting in this matter as its own worst enemy.

For example: During almost half a century Mexico has offered the United States the most precious of gifts: a secure southern border. In effect, the United States is that rarity in universal history, a great power with only two neighbors, both weaker than itself. But the Reagan Administration seems willing to create havoc in Mexico by forcing the contra war and, eventually, the American war on Nicaragua. Mexico, a nation of 80 million, will not be drowned by a red tide flowing from Nicaragua. In fact, well before reaching Harlingen, Texas, any venturesome Sandinista battalions would be blown apart at the Honduran, Salvadoran or Guatemalan borders.

But Mexico would be politically ripped apart by pressures to take sides in an American conflict in Central America as either enemy or satellite of the United States. The Mexican government, seriously damaged by economic, moral and physical problems, would probably lose its strongest claim to legitimacy—the sovereign conduct of its foreign policy—if it caved in to Washington's demands. But it would also suffer grievously, for other reasons, if it seemed to undermine the security of the United States for refusing to follow Washington's lead in Central America. The result would be turmoil on the border, but not for the reasons Reagan paints in his TV graphics.

A great deal—the respect and credibility of a whole continent; a whole range of political opportunities—is being sacrificed to very little—a preconceived, paranoid and obsessive script. Brazil has had to ask—twice—that it not be painted red on Reagan's maps. President Betancur of Colombia has had to denounce publicly, on more than one occasion, the State Department's penchant for saying that he says one thing in private and another in public. Betancur's latest correction: "All of Latin America opposes the Reagan proposal [of aid to the contras]."

Former President Carlos Andres Perez of Venezuela has warned that all of Latin America would rise against the United States in the event of an invasion of Nicaragua. President Garcia of Peru has declared before the Argentine Congress that his country would "break relations with the aggressive power" if Nicaragua were invaded and "do everything in its power to defend the brother country." And the newly elected president of Costa Rica, Oscar Arias, has wryly suggested that the $100 million in proposed contra aid be given to the Central American countries for economic development. Farmers, scientific researchers, the roofless and quite a few U.S. schoolchildren must feel the same way.

Latin America cannot be faulted for critizing while abstaining. Latin governments have repeatedly offered rational political and diplomatic solutions to what they consider a very minor international crisis in Central America—although it is a major economic and social crisis for those extremely weak countries, more and more dependent on foreign military and financial aid, wherever it might come from.

Why not listen seriously for once to the Latin American solution? It takes care of the security concerns of the United States better than Reagan's theater of horrors. By now everyone knows that the solutions include ending external support for any guerrillas; freezing the acquisition of arms and then diminishing them gradually suspending international military maneuvers; reducing and finally eliminating foreign military advisers and bases.

Since it is now evident that the Reagan Administration, caught in its own web of fictions, will not give the Latin American solution that serious try, I believe Latin America should take a bold initiative to negotiate with the five Central American governments and offer Latin Americans—the four Contadora nations and the four countries forming their support group—as guarantors of the peace agreement. This is a Latin American problem and it deserves a Latin American solution. "Left to ourselves," a former president of Costa Rica told me recently, "we Central Americans would solve this problem in a few weeks."

If any of the Central American governments then faulted on the agreements freely arrived at with the Latin American community—if, say, Honduras were to offer continued sanctuary to the contras, or Nicaragua a base to the Soviet Union, or if El Salvador were to turn against its traditional foe, Honduras—then all hell would break loose. But the solutions and eventual sanctions would all be inspired by Latin America, guaranteed and headed by Latin America; the United States would be spared the divisive contests, the debasing rhetoric, the ignorance in high places that have seriously damaged it during these past few weeks.

Men such as Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass), Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and Rep. Michael D. Barnes (D-Md.) have saved the honor and the voice of the United States for a better, more rational day. The contras cannot win, but the United States and Latin America can lose. It is time to stop playing games, physical or rhetorical, and take serious diplomatic initiatives. The time is now, in the hiatus between voting on contra aid in the Senate and the House. The stakes are indeed high, but not for the reasons Reagan offers. Most of the new Latin governments have the legitimacy to carry through the harsh solutions needed for economic recovery. If they consent to American adventurism in Central America they will end by losing this legitimacy. Economic disaster, erosion of the social fabric and political upheaval will ensue, from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn.

Where will the security of the United States be then?

NATIONAL CEMETERY NEEDED IN OHIO

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in order to pay homage to the hundreds of thousands of men and women who have defended their country to preserve our freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, it is because of these sacrifices that I introduce H.R. 4594 a bill that would require the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to conduct a study for the purpose of locating sites in the State of Ohio suitable for development as cemeteries in the National Cemetery System.

The veterans in my district have urged my support for a new national cemetery. Presently, Ohio has only one cemetery which is located in Dayton. This cemetery is expected to be filled by the year 2001. Another regional cemetery, located at Fort Custer, MI, is 260 miles away from northeast Ohio. Statistics indicate that 538,000 veterans are living within a 50-mile radius of Cleveland and 790,000 within a 100-mile radius of Cleveland. By the year 2000, it is expected that 260,000 veterans within Ohio will die.

Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that it is our duty to establish a final resting place for our veterans within a reasonable distance, so that friends and family will be able to visit. According to Paul T. Bannai, Chief Memorial Affairs Director for the Veterans' Administration, "the Veterans' Administration recognizes that an aging veteran population may have significant impact on the National Cemetery System in years to come. Cleveland, with its large veteran population, is included in our long range planning."

It has been my pleasure to work closely with the Veterans Affairs Committee under the leadership of my good friend and colleague SONNY MONTGOMERY. We have worked together on issues concerning health benefits, distinguished service, memorials, and medical care for veterans. Now, we must recognize the need to establish this cemetery because of the even-increasing size of the aging veteran population in my district.

A TRIBUTE TO MARK SEBASTIAN PALERMO

HON. RON PACKARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to honor Mark Sebastian Palermo, a member of my district. Mark has been chosen as the California State winner in the Voice of Democracy contest sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

During the past year, over 250,000 students participated in this contest nationwide. I would like to commend the Veterans of Foreign Wars organization for sponsoring this contest which helps to instill patriotism in the heart's of young Americans.

As a fitting recognition of his achievement in this contest, I wish to enter Mark's winning speech into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

You know, I've heard some people say, "What kind of adults are America's youth going to be? Things are so different now. Our kids face population explosions, new diseases, energy problems, pollution problems, the constant threat of war. What kind of future is that?" But is our future all that bleak?

Couldn't I just as well say, "What a terrific future our children have! With advancements in medicine, transportation, communication, energy, space exploration, and pollution control, our kids will have the best lives any human being has ever seen!"

When you were young, there were plenty of folks that thought your generation would simply flounder in its tracks. But did it? No! Even a horror like war can't stifle the livelihood of Americans. The fact that the VFW is sponsoring such a youth oriented, thought provoking event like this, shows the strength and comradery of its members, and the hope they have for our future. They see that right here, in America's youth, is that same strength and comradery.

The problems today's youth face are really no different than those of any other age. Poverty is an inherent problem. Somebody will always be considered impoverished; however, we will continue to put out our hands to the less fortunate. What about medical problems? Just about everything is a carcinogen these days, and we have a deadly new threat in AIDS, but these afflictions have always been around. We are now aware of them, and looking for their cures. The questions we are faced with about energy sources and pollution control are the same as they've always been. Each age simply provides different answers. New scientific advancements made by the youth will provide the solutions to today's energy and pollution problems, just as you did to yours. As a generation, we know the importance of solving our international differences peacefully, but we also know the importance of national defense, and protecting our rights and our heritage. Today's youth is striving to make a better life for all Americans.

As we grow up and start families, move into the workforce, and contribute to politics, our new minds will bring new ideas and new technological advancements. We will help our impoverished brothers. We are discovering more cures than we are new medical mysteries, and more ways to produce energy than use it. We are bent on controlling pollution, and working toward its irradiation. We will do our best to negotiate through political differences, but if our nation calls us to arms, America's youth will not let you down. We will stand by this nation and defend its ideals, our families, and our freedom. Technology, advancement, better standards of living, national pride, politics, and families, these are the new horizons for America's youth.

THE PRESIDENT HAS ACTED EFFECTIVELY AGAINST LIBYAN TERRORISM

HON. BOB STUMP

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, the President's action against military and terrorist targets in Libya demonstrates a new resolve to defend Americans against the scourge of terrorism. The President's action in defense against terrorism shows that America has both the capability and the will to counter threats to the safety and well-being of Americans here at home and around the world.

As a member of the Intelligence Committee, I must not discuss the content of matters which come before the committee in executive session. I can say, however, that the President is absolutely correct that the evidence linking the Qadhafi regime of Libya to terrorism against Americans is clear, direct, and irrefutable.

Given the Libyans' state-sponsored terrorism directed at Americans, the United States has the right—indeed, the duty—to act to reduce the capability of the Libyan regime to wage terroristic war against the American people. Before employing force in self-defense, the President clearly and repeatedly warned the Libyans that their continued terrorism would bring a tough United States response. In developing that response, the President consulted with leaders in the Congress. The President also consulted with our allies around the world, including the United Kingdom, whose support for the United States action deserves the special thanks of the American people. After issuing warnings and after extensive consultations, and in accordance with international law, including article 51 of the United Nations Charter, the President chose a carefully measured, proportionate response involving use of force in self-defense against the Libyans.

The President has sent a clear message to terrorists around the world: The United States will not stand still while terrorists wage war against the United States. The United States will protect its citizens from terrorism, including when necessary by direct application of military force. The United States of America will protect its citizens around the globe.

IN MEMORY OF THE "CHALLENGER" ASTRONAUTS

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Common Council of the City of Syracuse has passed a resolution requesting the mayor of Syracuse to lower the flags at all city installations on each January 28 in memory of the brave women and men who died aboard the space shuttle Challenger: Dick Scobee, Mike Smith, Ron McNair, Ellison Onizuka, Judith Resnik, Greg Jarvis, and Christa McAuliffe. I respectfully request that the text of the resolution be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

RESOLUTION NO. 133-R

RESOLUTION—REQUESTING THE MAYOR TO CONSIDER LOWERING FLAGS AT ALL CITY INSTALLATIONS TO HALF-MAST ON EACH JANUARY 28TH IN HONOR OF THE MEMORIES OF THE CHALLENGER ASTRONAUTS

Whereas, on January 28, 1986, at approximately 11:39 a.m., the horrendous and calamitous explosion of the space shuttle Challenger that took the lives of the seven brave men and women aboard, completely shattered the tranquility and confidence of all Americans, the flaming wreckage spewing untold grief and utter disbelief throughout this entire proud and mighty nation; and

Whereas, since that time, the pain and horror of that day has begun to ease, explanations concerning the cause of this terrible tragedy are being brought to light and investigated, and Americans are once again beginning to bring themselves to look toward the future; and

Whereas, although no one will ever be able to forget this shocking and painful event in our history, time heals, answers will help to lighten the overwhelming burden we have been carrying within our hearts and minds; and

Whereas, members of this Common Council have been requested by Mr. Jerry Effron, a World War II veteran presently hospitalized at the Veterans Administration Hospital in Syracuse, to ensure the date is prominently remembered; now therefore be it Resolved, That this Common Council, on behalf of the citizens of the City of Syracuse, hereby joins with Mr. Effron in seeking to preserve the memories of the Challenger Astronauts by respectfully requesting Syracuse Mayor Thomas G. Young to consider lowering the flags at all City installations to half-mast on each January 28th.

PROFILE OF HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call to the attention of my colleagues a profile on MARY ROSE OAKAR, secretary of the Democratic caucus, which appeared in the Washington Post during the Easter district work period. This article details the exceptional record and strong tireless leadership of our friend and colleague, MARY ROSE OAKAR. The article is as follows:

MARY ROSE OAKAR—A LEADER IN THE HOUSE WHO SPEAKS HER MIND

(By Spencer Rich)

About a month ago, recalls Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio), President Reagan told a "welfare story" at a meeting with congressional leaders. It was about a jobless welfare recipient who phoned the employment service ostensibly to look for work, but who hung up immediately when told it was available.

Oakar, who attends the White House meetings as secretary of the House Democratic Caucus, says she and other Democrats who were there—led by the Speaker of the House—were "livid."

"So I raised my hand and the president said, 'Yes, Mary Rose?' I said, 'A lot of unemployed people are very proud and don't want welfare. I know 50-year-old unemployed workers who will not take welfare. It's not true that people prefer welfare.' "

The incident illustrates a lot about Oakar and why she is receiving increasing attention as a tough legislator squarely within the liberal Democratic social welfare tradition.

"She speaks up, that's for sure," said a Republican who asked not to be named. "She stands by her guns and doesn't hesitate to let you know what she's thinking—and she knows what she's talking about," said a Democratic official.

The perception is also beginning to spread that Oakar, 46, a 10-year veteran of the House, is a strong party activist of remarkable energy. She is unusual in serving on four committees: Banking, Aging, Post Office and Civil Service, and House Administration. At the Select Committee on Aging, she heads the task force on Social Security, elderly and women. She also chairs the key Post Office and Civil Service compensation and benefits subcommittee, which handles federal employee pensions, health benefits and pay.

And in recent years, Oakar has risen within her party. A member of the Democratic National Committee, she serves as House congressional liaison to the DNC and as an at-large House Democratic whip. She is starting a political action committee called Economic Security PAC to help female candidates, and she speaks at colleges to help recapture the campuses for the Democrats.

"I think the kids are coming around," she says. Oakar calls herself a "moderate" Democrat, but others call her a traditional liberal. She says that when people hear the specifics of what President Reagan wants to cut in domestic programs, they respond well to the Democrats.

Oakar, first elected to the House in 1976, has won most elections since by huge margins; in 1984 she had no opposition and only 44 write-in votes were cast against her. Representing downtown Cleveland and suburbs that include many white ethnic working-class people, she has built a strong pro-labor record.

Increasingly, Oakar also has become associated with women's issues—pay, pensions and Social Security protection—and with consumer matters. These issues have been in political decline in recent years, but Oakar persists.

On the other hand, while she supports the Equal Rights Amendment and family planning and has sponsored numerous bills on women's benefits, she recognizes that "certain women's groups will never endorse me" because of her stance on abortion. She opposes Medicaid funding of abortions and favors special benefits for pregnant women to provide alternatives to abortion.

The youngest of five children in a Maronite Catholic family, Oakar was born in Cleveland, attended Roman Catholic schools, got her B.A. in English, speech and drama at Ursuline College in Cleveland and her M.A. in fine arts from nearby John Carroll University. Her father, a Lebanese immigrant, was a steelworker, construction worker and stonecutter.

She once thought of working on the stage, but turned to teaching instead—for four years at a high school and for six years at Cuyahoga Community College in Cleveland, where she taught English, speech, drama and fine arts. Although she almost was fired for starting a union at the college, she says, "technically I am still on leave from Cuyahoga."

She began her political career as a neighborhood activist, served on the City Council from 1973 to 1976, and made a bid for Congress when the incumbent sought a Senate seat.

When she came to the House, Speaker Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill Jr. (D-Mass.) kept calling her "Rosemary." When she mentioned this, he explained that he has a daughter named Rosemary and a sister named Mary Rose, and that he's always had trouble keeping the names straight.

Oakar is philosophical about being a leading woman in a traditionally male club. "I really can't say I have suffered discrimination in the House because of being a woman. At times the fellows go out of their way to not leave you out." But she says women in the House do feel a special bond, "because after all, there are only 24 of us."

Oakar has a heavy agenda in the 99th Congress, with a special emphasis this year on banking legislation. Because many banks "only want to cater to large accounts," she is pressing to require banks to give certain free services, to bar a minimum balance requirement and to pay interest on all balances.

She is concerned about interstate banking takeovers in which big banks buy smaller banks and funnel the money from depositor savings to investments in other areas. With Rep. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), she wants to introduce legislation requiring large banks to reinvest money in the local community and to make their portfolios public. The Banking Committee has endorsed the idea.

She also has been pushing (so far without success) for big increases in Social Security benefits for women: more free credits for years of absence from the labor force for child care, better benefits for widows and widowers, and above all, for earnings-sharing—a highly controversial plan to give a person Social Security credits for half the earnings of her or his spouse, thereby entitling these people to Social Security disability or old-age benefits on their own.

She is also a strong advocate of improving private pensions for women—for example, cutting the 10-year vesting requirement, which works to the disadvantage of women who join the work force late or who take time off for child care, to five years.

An Oakar-engineered House bill calling for a broad study of pay equity for women and minorities in the federal pay system awaits Senate action. "Women are now 40 percent" of the federal labor force, she says, "but they're clustered in the bottom four rungs" of the scale.

Oakar also describes herself as "a big advocate of federal workers. This administration is just trying to take everything away from them—gut the retirement system, gut their health benefits and gut their pay, too."

While cutting an increasingly high profile in Washington, Oakar still has that other attribute of successful politicians: she's a big home-town booster. Cleveland, she says, is enjoying a "fabulous regrowth" after being hard hit by the shrinkage of heavy industry. Employers based in the city or nearby include TRW, Standard Oil, Eaton, LTV Steel and the only National Aeronautics and Space Administration center "north of the Mason-Dixon line and east of the Mississippi." Cleveland, she says, "is second only to New York in the arts, with the Cleveland Orchestra, all the museums, magnificent old theaters now being revived instead of turned into parking lots, outstanding health institutions."

In fact, Cleveland's health institutions are such that "one year, five members of Congress had heart bypasses at the Cleveland Clinic. I kept sending them baskets of flowers."

BACKGROUND

Elected to House of Representatives in 1976. Ran unopposed in 1984. Represents Ohio's 20th District, including Cleveland. Serves as secretary of the House Democratic Caucus, House congressional liaison to Democratic National Committee and at-large Democratic House whip, and on four committees. Special interest in labor, consumer and women's issues.

A TRIBUTE TO MARTY ROSE

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, a testimonial dinner was held in Oswego, NY, on April 5 for a very close personal friend of mine, and one of the most dedicated labor leaders I have known in my 24 years in Congress—Martin (Marty) Rose.

Marty Rose symbolizes to me the very best of the labor movement in the United States. He is a man dedicated to his fellow workers, to his community, to his State of New York and to our Nation. His personal dedication has been translated into a lifetime of service. And for that outstanding record of service, I and more than 400 of his friends attended the April 5 testimonial in his honor.

Marty Rose knows the problems of workers and of Americans generally. He knows their desires and their dreams. He understands the desire of men and women to earn a decent wage, to afford their children the opportunities of education, to create a quality of life and standard of living that befits our Nation and the principles for which it stands. Marty is from Oswego County, which is in my congressional district, and which is part of Upstate New York that is suffering from economic flight.

Oswego County and upstate New York in general, could not have a more aggressive advocate than Marty Rose. He is concerned about his community and the union he represents. He is tireless in his efforts to attract and assist businesses located in, or seeking to locate in, Oswego County and upstate New York. His efforts have brought many results. Oswego County is an area of growth and growth potential, thanks in no small measure to Marty's work. Operation Oswego County, Onward Oswego, his work on a number of particular projects, his unfailing commitment to his union membership, all contribute to the area. These accomplishments and his record of service are all especially impressive when one considers that Marty Rose is blind. However, loss of sight has diminished neither his spirit or his ability to get a job done and done well.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a biography outlining the career and record of service of Martin (Marty) Rose:

Martin Rose was elected as a delegate to The Oswego Federation of Labor-A.F.L. in 1942, respesenting the International Ladies Garment Workers Union. The O.F.C.-A.F.L. Central Body recommended the I.L.G.W.U. was the appropriate Union to represent a group of workers who were seeking to be organized. Consequently, three shops were successfully unionized.

The I.L.G.W.U. workers received a charter for Local 396 on August 14, 1941.

Marty has been a continuous delegate and served as chairman of many committees in the Central Body. Also he has served as an assistant Secretary, Vice President and has been President since 1957 of that Central Body.

Marty served as Vice President to the Upstate New York and Vermont District Council and when the then President of the District Council accepted a State job, Marty was elected President of the Upstate New York and Vermont District Council.

The "Antiprofessional Strikebreaker Ordinance" was entered into the record books of the City of Oswego, spearheaded by Marty and a committee of labor leaders, which was approved by the then Mayor of Oswego John O.C. Conway and successfully passed through the Common Council. Attempts to place the similar legislation in the City of Fulton failed after being presented in two common council meetings with Presidents of various local labor unions assisting in the presentation.

He was appointed by President George Meany as a member of the National AFL-CIO Volunteer Organizer Corps.

He was the AFL-CIO Community Service Councilor.

He was appointed to the committee on International Year For Disabled Persons by Governor Carey.

Marty was appointed by the N.Y. State AFL-CIO President Edward Cleary as honorary Chairman of the 1984 N.Y. State Convention.

Marty represented the Union Label Department and the International President of the I.L.G.W.U. at a convention of the Aluminum Workers in Messina, N.Y., also at the Switchmen of North America Convention, held in Buffalo, N.Y.

Marty has addressed many organizations in behalf of advancing the purchase of Union Label, and Garment Workers. He also urged respect for Union Label goods and services in the family of Trade Unions.

He served many years, and continues to serve as the Vice President of the Union Label & Service Trades Department of the State of N.Y., AFL-CIO.

Marty served on CETA, Private Industry Council, currently serving as member of Oswego County Job Training and Partnership Act.

He served as the first Secretary Treasurer of Labor's League for Political Education. He currently serves as the Chairman of the Oswego County COPE. In addition he serves as a member of the N.Y.S. AFL-CIO COPE Advisory Board.

Marty serves as a member of the Advisory Board of the Central N.Y. Labor Studies of Industrial Labor Relations School at Cornell, and has been utilized to speak at graduations and serve on panels.

Marty was the Director of the Oswego County March of Dimes in 1975.

Marty served on Onward Oswego. He served eight one year terms on the Commercial and Industrial Relations Commission of the city of Oswego. He was appointed by Sal Chaikin and David Gringold, Associate Directors of the North East Department of the I.L.G.W.U. as a Union Label Representative in 1960.

Following the separation of Vermont into the newly created New England States District, Marty was elected President of the Upstate New York District Council of the New York State District of the I.L.G.W.U. and as President of Local 280.

ARTIE WALLACE RECEIVES GOD AND COUNTRY AWARD

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my colleagues of a young man's accomplishments from my congressional district. Artie Wallace of Oberlin, PA. will be receiving the Boy Scout God and Country Award on Sunday, April 20, 1986, at the Salem Lutheran Church.

Artie, a fifth grader at the Tri-Community Elementary School has been involved in scouting for the past 2 years and is presently a member of Boy Scout Troop 95 in Enhaut. He started working toward this award 5 months ago as a Cub Scout, and has worked extensively with the pastor of the Salem Lutheran Church. He has also kept a daily prayer log and completed a service project at the church. Artie is a member of the midget baseball team in Enhaut.

I would like to congratulate Artie on his fine work and wish him continued success in all his endeavors.

APRIL 15 MARKS THE OPENING OF AMERICAN AIRLINES HUB IN NASHVILLE

HON. WILLIAM HILL BONER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. BONER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, Nashville is on the move.

Today, April 15, marks the expansion of major air service to and from Nashville. Today, American Airlines begins hub service in Nashville, thereby linking Nashville and middle Tennessee by direct air service to more than 35 cities in the East and Midwest.

Middle Tennesseans have worked hard for this day. City officials, airport authority officials, businessmen, women and labor leaders, everyday Nashvillians, as well as officials here in the Federal Government, have all worked to attract the American Airlines hub to Nashville. This investment of personnel and equipment not only promises future growth for Nashville and middle Tennessee but, just as importantly, it indicates the confidence that American Airlines has in Nashville's business and labor community to provide the support necessary to maintain a major airline hub.

I join my fellow Tennesseans in welcoming American Airlines' expanded service to and from Nashville. And I congratulate the officials, business men and women, and labor leaders in landing the hub at Nashville. I am proud to have played a role in these efforts and I look forward to continuing this partnership.

I am including an article from the Nashville Banner describing the importance of the hub to the continued growth of Nashville and middle Tennessee, and several articles from today's Tennessean commemorating the beginning of expanded service.

HUB PROVEN KEY TO AREA'S GROWTH

(By Mary Hance)

Cities across the country are increasingly aware that having a hub—having good air service—is a critical link to economic development and community growth.

With this week's startup of the American Airlines hub, Nashville joins cities like Atlanta; Charlotte, N.C.; Dallas/Fort Worth, all of which have prospered and attribute much of that prosperity to the superb air service that a hub makes possible.

In Memphis, for example, where Republic Airlines last year established a hub, "Republic added overnight $55 million in payroll," said Larry Cox, director of the Memphis International Airport.

"They added 1,200 employees. And as far as sales and purchase of goods and services, I would say the impact was between $25 million and $30 million."

Republic, which already had a sizable presence in Memphis with 55 daily flights, increased that to 159 daily flights when it launched its hub in April 1985.

"It has exceeded all of our expectations," Cox said, adding that the proposed merger of Republic with Northwest Orient would mean even more service.

David Cooley, president of the Memphis Chamber of Commerce, described the airport as "a very significant economic factor" for this region.

He said recent figures show the total economic impact of the Memphis airport is $1.5 billion for 1985, the airport employs 17,000 people, and it has a total payroll of $450 million.

In June 1985, American made its announcement that it would establish a hub here—a hub representing an investment of $115 million dollars, a hub that would increase the number of daily flights to 103 from its current 15. From there American would build the hub to as many as 200 daily flights.

The hub, which is being developed in phases, begins with the first phase that kicks in Tuesday.

The hub, which already has created 500 American jobs here, is expected to create as many as 1,350 jobs directly under American Airlines and thousands of associated jobs.

American began looking for an eastern North/South hub location about 18 months ago—and selected Nashville and Raleigh/Durham, N.C., from about 20 perspective airports.

"The hub city is clearly the element that benefits from the hub," said Wes Kaldahl, director of corporate communications for American, "—not only the non-stop service to an increasing number of points, but an incredible economic benefit because of the traffic."

In Atlanta, where there are 2,100 daily flights, including more that 350 a day each from Delta and Eastern, the impact is even more significant.

"I'm not aware of any economic measurement of what it has done," said Gerald Bartels, director of the Atlanta Chamber. "But the airport is absolutely the single most important factor in Atlanta's historic development.

"It is Atlanta's biggest asset," Bartels said. "That is sort of universal opinion among thinking people."

Meanwhile, other cities—cities like Birmingham, Ala., and Louisville, Ky.,—are struggling to get full hubs, minihubs, regional hubs—any variation that means better air services.

In Louisville, the situation has gotten to the point that Greyhound Bus Lines not long ago launched an advertising campaign to shuttle Louisville travelers from the Greyhound Bus Terminal to the Greater Cincinnati Airport, where the prices and the variety of flights are vastly superior.

"It is actually cheaper to drive to Cincinnati (about two hours away) and catch a plane there," said Terry Feathers, director of government affairs for the Louisville Chamber of Commerce.

Louisville has the disadvantage of being located closed to very active airports in Cincinnati and in Indianapolis, Ind. In addition, it does not have enough room to add a parallel runway—and almost mandatory element in a full hub operation.

Bob Michael, director of Standiford Field at Louisville, said even without the runway, his airport could handle considerably more traffic than it does now. And that is what airport officials, Louisville Mayor Jerry Abramson and the business community are going after.

"There is a perception of poor air service, and we want to turn that around," Michael said. "We have a deficit that is impeding our economic efforts."

In Birmingham, where air service is perceived as notoriously bad, the mayor and business community have also taken an aggressive approach to improving the air traffic situation—the Alabama House of Representatives has passed a bill granting certain tax exemptions to airlines establishing large daily flight schedules or hub operations at the Birmingham Airport.

"It (inadequate air service) is a terrific disincentive to people and businesses wanting to locate here," said Ed LaMonte, executive secretary to Birmingham Mayor Richard Arrington.

"It is an albatross around our neck in an otherwise effective economic development campaign," LaMonte said.

Delta Airlines, and to a lesser extent Eastern Airlines, are credited with creating the hub-and-spoke concept about 25 years ago.

Nashville's road to becoming a hub city started in the late 1970s—after it was clear that deregulation was sure to make trouble for airports the size of Nashville's.

Sam Bartholomew, attorney to the Metro Airport Authority, said the first strategy of deregulation was the "save what we have" game plan.

"We realized that with deregulation we would have a big time problem," he said. "So what we decided was that we would have to keep our airlines happy—keep the airlines who were serving Nashville from pulling out. That was the game plan."

It was then that they established programs like the Airline Executives Conference to bring the airlines' top management here to see Nashville first hand and build personal and professional relationships with the city and its leaders.

"In 1981, we looked at it and said, 'hey, we've been successful. What do we do now?'

"In 1981 John Tune (chairman and one of the founders of the authority, who died in 1983) and I sat down and realized that if we were ever going to be a major city we would have to have a hub.

"A new phase of hubbing was developing and we saw that if we missed out on this second phase of hubbing, we would never be able to attract any corporate headquarters," Bartholomew said.

American's Nashville Hub Opens

American Airlines is celebrating the opening of its new Nashville hub today with a special package of introductory, unrestricted discount fares of $49 each way to feeder cities and $98 each way to Los Angeles.

The fares provide discounts ranging up to 83% and apply to all 23 points American will serve from the Nashville hub, except Dallas/Fort Worth. They also will apply to all 11 markets to be served from Nashville by American's commuter airline partner, American Eagle, during the start-up period.

The fares are available for purchase through next Tuesday and will apply to travel to, from or through the Nashville hub today through May 15. They will apply to all coach seats on all Nashville flights at all hours of the day or night.

At a news conference at the Nashville City Club, Donald P. O'Hare, American's southeastern division president, said the discounts are the airline's way of saying "thank you" to the Nashville community for its support and encouragement.

"Nashville has given its heart to the American Airlines over the past several months," O'Hare said, "and now we are giving the community a special 'thank you' in return.

By offering the low fares to people in the feeder cities, American hopes to more quickly familiarize them with the Nashville hub."

O'Hare also announced at the news conference that Robert L. Crandall, American's chairman and president, will conduct the hub's opening ceremonies today and that Crandall will be joined for the event by Gov. Lamar Alexander, Mayor Richard Fulton, Metro Nashville Authority Chairman Robert Mathews, and Gen. William Moore, the airport director.

Led by Crandall, the board of directors of AMR Corp., parent company of the airline, will hold its regular monthly meeting in Nashville tomorrow as part of the overall hub celebration.

In addition, over 500 key travel agents and convention and meeting planners from throughout the American Airlines system are being flown to Nashville during the inaugural week to see the hub operation firsthand and to learn more about what Nashville has to offer major events like national conventions.

The special "thank you" fares were put on sale April 7 through American's SABRE reservations system.

Savings with the fares are substantial. For example, the $49 "thank you" fare is a 76 percent discount from the normal one-way coach fare of $210. The $49 price is 83 percent less than the normal Boston fare of $290 and 73 percent below the regular New Orleans fare of $182. To Los Angeles, the $98 "thank you" fare is a 76 percent savings from the regular fare of $418.

By June, when the first phase of the hub is fully developed, American and American Eagle together will operate a total of 106 flights a day to 37 destinations. American will have 60 daily flights to 23 points, and Eagle will offer 46 flights a day to 14 cities.

O'Hare said advance bookings for the hub have been strong and that American expects to board an average of more than 100,000 passengers a month during the first several months of operation. The airline anticipates that for its first full year of hub operations, its total boardings will exceed 1.1 million passengers.

The Nashville hub is being established as a north-south connecting center. As a result, the cities American and American Eagle will serve from Nashville will be about evenly divided north and south.

To the north of Nashville, American will have daily service to 12 points: Boston, Mass; Buffalo, NY.; Chicago, Ill.; Cincinnati, Cleveland and Columbus, Ohio; Detroit and Grand Rapids, Mich.; Newark, N.J.; Philadelphia, Pa.; New York's La-Guardia Airport, and Washington's National Airport.

To the south, American will have 10 destinations: Baton Rouge and New Orleans, La.; Birmingham, Huntsville and Mobile, Ala.; Chattanooga, Tenn.; Jackson, Miss.; Little Rock, Ark.; Dallas/Fort Worth, Texas, and Memphis, Tenn.

Additionally, there will be non-stop service to Los Angeles in the west.

American Eagle's cities to the north will be Terra Haute and Evansville, Ind.; Springfield, Mo. ; Lexington and Paducah, Ky.; Tri Cities and Knoxville, Tenn.; Asheville, N.C., and Roanoke, Va.

To the south, Eagle will serve Tuscaloosa and Montgomery, Ala.; Albany, Ga., and Columbus and Tupelo, Miss.

American will serve the hub with 142-seat Super 80 twin-jet, one with 115 seats and a larger version with 150 seats. American Eagle will fly its Nashville schedules with 17-seat Metros and 30-seat Brasilias.

Flight Approval Sought to Mexican Resort Cities

American Airlines has asked the U.S. Department of Transportation for authority to begin daily non-stop jet service between Nashville, and Cancun and Cozumel in Mexico's Yucatan peninsula.

If approved, the route authority would give American its first international service for the hub at Metro Nashville Airport, which opens today.

Donald P. O'Hare American's southeastern division vice president, said the airline would like to begin the Mexico service "as soon as possible."

"With creation of the hub," O'Hare said, "American will be in an excellent position to serve Cancun and Cozumel from Nashville. We will be the largest carrier at Metro Nashville Airport, and the existence of the hub will benefit passengers in feeder cities with convenient connections to the Yucatan."

O'Hare said American has received strong indications that the Mexican government "would look favorably on a request from the U.S. government to allow Nashville-Yucatan service." Cancun and Cozumel are popular resort destinations, and the Mexican government is eager for increased tourism throughout its country, O'Hare said.

In its filing with the DOT, American said it would service the Nashville-Yucatan market with 142-seat Super 80 jets. The southbound flight would leave Nashville at 10:10 a.m. and arrive at Cancun at 11:37 a.m., and at Cozumel at 12:41 p.m.

The northbound flight would leave Cancun at 12:20 p.m. and Cozumel at 1:25 p.m., arriving at Nashville at 4:58 p.m.

AMR BOARD SETS MEETING FOR OPENING

The visit to Nashville this week of the board of directors of AMR Corp. reflects American Airlines' strong commitment to the new Nashville hub, officials say.

The board of AMR, parent company of the airline, meets here tomorrow as part of a full week of gala inaugural events and activities in connection with the formal opening of the hub.

"It is a distinction we can be proud of," said Donald P. O'Hare, American's southeastern division vice president, "and it illustrates the enormous importance American has attached to the success of the Nashville project."

The official ceremonies begin at 10 a.m. today in the new lounge area for Gates 1A-B-C. Other events scheduled this week include:

A special black-tie gala event for key community leaders at Opryland Hotel today that will feature a performance by the Nashville Symphony Orchestra, with Maestro Kenneth Schermerhorn conducting.

Tomorrow, Thursday and Friday, a series of special Nashville "Product Fairs" at Opryland Hotel that will tell the story of Nashville and its new hub to more than 500 of the nation's leading travel agents and meeting and convention planners.

O'Hare said the Product Fairs will be attended by some of the most important travel leaders in the country.

"They represent the very elite of travel decision-makers in the country—the people who actually select cities and hotel properties for major meeting and conventions," he said. "The decisions these people make can pump millions in the local economy."

O'Hare said the Nashville hub will be the largest single startup of new service in American's history and will constitute for American and the community "a giant leap into a stronger and more dynamic future."

American is making a total financial commitment of about $115 million for the long-term development of the Nashville hub. Phase One is the interim hub that opens today in an expanded nine-gate facility in the existing terminal building.

Phase 2 of the hub will begin in January 1988 when the airline moves into a 15-gate concourse in the airport's new terminal complex. At that point, American will increase its Nashville service to as many as 85 flights a day serving 50 cities, and American Eagle will increase to 75 flights a day to 25 cities.

The ultimate potential of the hub, called Phase 3, envisions American operating about 135 flights a day and American Eagle operating an additional 100 flights. At that point, American will be serving 60 cities from Nashville and American Eagle will be serving 28 for a total hub operation of 235 flights and 88 cities.

American estimates that when the hub reaches full potential, the airline alone will have added more than 1,350 new jobs to the Nashville economy.

A TRIBUTE TO JOHN A "SNOOKS" KELLEY

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to John A. "Snooks" Kelley, a true all-American, who was called from us Thursday, April 10 at the age of 78.

Snooks Kelley was a legend throughout New England for his contribution to the sport of hockey and the hundreds of young student-scholars he inspired while serving as Boston College hockey coach for nearly four decades. This man was known as the architect of the Boston College hockey program, now one the Nation's finest amateur athletic organizations.

Snooks believed in America and he believed in Americans. As patriarch of a hockey program that could have catered to outstanding foreign talent, Snooks always looked to this country's youth first for hockey talent and then taught them as much about life as he did about skates, slap shots, and forechecking.

This man, a New England sports legend, was the first college hockey coach to win 500 games. He did this while compiling an astounding record of 501–243–15 during his 36 years at Boston College. Only three other college hockey coaches can boast of 500 or more wins.

This was not the only record Snooks achieved. During his distinguished career, he coached nine teams to the national championships and that record stands to this day. Snooks, a BC alumnus himself, coached his first team to victory and continued winning from that point on.

Snooks Kelley was also a founding father of the now famous Beanpot Tournament and led eight of his own teams to victory in the celebrated New England hockey fest. The awards and distinctions he received during and after his career are far too numerous to list but bear testament to the commitment he made to a sport that is truly part of New England.

His record is not one that will soon be matched and I have no doubt he will long be heralded for his accomplishments by the students and athletes whose lives were changed by his persevering optimism.

Beyond hockey, Snooks Kelley stood for education and development of sound, well-rounded American youth. He taught at Cambridge High and Latin School for 30 years, giving young scholars the same encouragement and insight he instilled on the hockey rink. This was a man who cared about people, a man who developed young minds and bodies to their fullest potential while maintaining the good heart that his friends and associates will remember him by.

Snooks Kelley, member of the National Hockey Hall of Fame, member of the Boston College Hall of Fame, friend, coach, pioneer, and above all Great American, will be sorely missed.

IN HONOR OF GEORGE BARKS

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor George Barks, who will retire from the Hermosa Beach City Council after 12 years of dedicated service.

George is a native of Hermosa Beach, CA, and attended neighborhood schools including South Valley Vista, Pier Avenue, Redondo Union High School, El Camino College and UCLA.

He is a property owner and has owned a small business in Hermosa Beach. In addition, he teaches adult school auto shop at Redondo Union High School.

George has two children, Georgia, and George, Jr.

As the congressional representative for Hermosa Beach, I have enjoyed working with George during the two terms that I have been in office. After serving the community of Hermosa Beach for 12 years, I know George will be missed. I ask that my colleagues join me in wishing him the best of luck in all his future endeavors.

IN RECOGNITION OF ANTHONY G. PENNUCCI

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the commitment and dedication of Mr. Anthony G. Pennucci, who is a business representative of the Carpenters Union Local 620, in Madison, NJ. I hope that by my statement, my fellow Members will appreciate the years of service that Tony has given to the Occupational Training Center for the Handicapped.

In 1959, Tony Pennucci recognized a need. He knew the importance of reaching out to all people in the community and the importance of providing opportunities for all. More importantly, Tony recognized the responsibility that we all have to see that those who are less fortunate than we have an opportunity to live as active and productive members in our communities.

Twenty-seven years ago, Tony Pennucci made a personal commitment to the Occupational Training Center, and as a result the center has become an unsurpassed resource in our county. The center builds bridges that help everyone. Its network provides access and opportunity. Most importantly it provides promise.

Much of the success of the Occupational Training Center is the result of the activities of Tony Pennucci, and people like him.

Mr. Speaker, we all speak of voluntarism. We all try to encourage and foster voluntarism. Tony Pennucci is a volunteer of the highest order. He has given selflessly of his time and effort, and we have all reaped the benefits of his service.

I want to take this opportunity to thank Tony, and to urge my fellow Members to learn from his example.

Thank you.

PENSIONS: RETIREMENT SECURITY FOR AMERICA'S WORKERS

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, today I'd like to take a moment to praise American industry and its effort to provide workers with a secure future through pension plans.

Often times we focus solely on the benefits of Social Security, and rightly so, as it is an essential part of a retiree's life these days. However, there are other aspects to a retiree's income, sometimes overlooked, yet just as important. I'm speaking here of pension plans.

Thanks to advances in labor law and labor agreements, most American workers are covered by some form of pension plan on their jobs. These plans vary from basic, straight cash paybacks to complicated cash-stock-investment portfolio plans, the so-called "cafeteria plans," 401k benefits. But no matter what the composition, pension plans are set up by employers, along with the employees, and their unions to help workers plan reasonably and logically for the future.

Though pension plans are generally regarded as providing only income to retired workers, pension plans do much, much more. Funds collected from present day workers not only serve to pay pensions to retirees, but they avail pension plan members of a whole host of services. Many pension plans offer investment services, health benefits and educational opportunities for their members. In fact, the Sheetmetal Workers International Association, in the very spirit of this service, has erected a new pension building solely devoted to the purposes and promotion of the American worker.

I make this statement because I believe it is, and always will be, part of the American work ethic to work toward one's own financial independence. Retirement should be the culmination and achievement of that independence. The Sheetmetal Worker's building is a monument to the effort. For this reason I have introduced a resolution calling on the President to proclaim National Pension Day. I feel strongly that efforts by industry and by labor to improve the retirement prospects of the American workers should be duly recognized and that my resolution, House Joint Resolution 600, is one small way to doing so. I encourage and welcome all my colleagues to join me in this tribute to the American laborer—backbone of American industry.

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF ARMSTRONG'S BRAINTREE, MA, PLANT

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, 1986 marks the 50th anniversary of Armstrong World Industries' Braintree, MA, plant, and I would like to take a moment to congratulate the employees, management, and retirees on this milestone.

The Armstrong Cork Co., as it was known then, purchased the facility from the Stedman Rubber Flooring Co. in 1936 to add rubber floor tile to the company's product line.

In the half century since, the Braintree plant has shifted from making flooring to producing industrial rubber and insulation products, but the facility remains an important component of the region's economy, providing about 500 jobs.

Armstrong's Braintree plant is located on one of the oldest manufacturing sites in the Western Hemisphere. In 1643, Braintree's early settlers established an iron works at the same location, along the Monatiquot River. In 1776, a saw and grist mill was set up. In 1820, the metalworking firm begun by patriot Paul Revere acquired the site for a copper and bell foundry.

The site was purchased in 1909 for a newly formed Monatiquot Rubber Works Co., which evolved into the firm purchased 50 years ago by Armstrong.

During those five decades, Armstrong and its employees have made a continuing, important contribution to the life of the community. We, their neighbors, congratulate them on their 50th anniversary and we look forward to a long continuation of our association with them.

WHY MILITARY AID TO HAITI?

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, are we set to slide down the same slippery slope in Haiti which embarrassed us in the Philippines? It looks like the White House wants to pump in military aid to Haiti's new military council, just as we did for so many years for the Marcos bunch in the Philippines. I am very concerned that we provide the right kind of aid to help Haiti on the road to recovery and stability.

Haiti has not ranked high among our military aid recipients. But last month, the administration approved some $383,000 worth of riot control gear. Now it seems poised to provide unconditional security training for a new police force to fill the vacuum left by the demise of ex-dictator Duvalier's hated militia, the Tontons Macoute.

I sincerely hope that we will not be arming and training another instrument for the repression of the Haitian people. Any such aid must include strict human rights conditions to ensure that it is only used to stomp out the vestiges of the Duvalier system, not to entrench new military power.

As one Haitian Catholic priest remarked, "Until we get rid of the Duvalier system, we will continue to say no, no, no." No doubt the people will say no until democracy arrives, just as the people of the Philippines pressed their cause to purge the Marcos system.

I support the administration in its provision of emergency food aid, I submit that food and other emergency economic support is the kind of aid most needed by Haitians—not shotguns, teargas, and birdshot. Even nonlethal aid should be provided with great care.

The following articles describe recent aid developments in Haiti and I call them to the attention of my colleagues.

CRIES FOR CHANGE LOUDER IN HAITI

UNTIL DUVALIER SYSTEM GOES, PRIEST SAYS, "WE CONTINUE TO SAY NO"

(By Edward Cody)

PORT-AU-PRINCE, HAITI.—Suddenly released after 29 years of repression, demands for political change are sweeping over Haiti like a Caribbean hurricane too powerful and unpredictable to control.

Thousands of youths, emboldened by success in driving Jean-Claude Duvalier from power, are reveling in a discovery that for the first time they can challenge authority and not only get away with it, but also force a response.

So far, they have proved to be the country's main political force in a chaotic array of competing power centers.

More than six weeks after Duvalier's fall, their power in the streets has yet to be harnessed by civilian political leaders able to channel the demands for change and deal with the military officers who inherited authority when Duvalier fled.

The result has been an explosion of political activity with little, if any, direction * * * groups, causes, or aspiring presidential candidates. The one cause most street youths appear to have agreed on recently is a growing call for the military to step aside for a provisional civilian government even before elections can be organized.

"Bum palais-la, burn Palais-la," they chanted in Creole during a recent demonstration challenging the military's right to rule. "Turn over the palace turn over the palace."

Lt. Gen. Henri Namphy, who heads the National Council of Government, fired two council members and a key adviser on March 21 who were associated in the public mind with Duvalier's abuses. Namphy's action came in response to weeks of demands by demonstrating youths. But by the time he moved, the popular demands had expanded to include his own removal.

Diplomatic and Haitian sources said some military officers, uncomfortable with the disorder, have discussed the possibility of moving against Namphy. These sources said the contacts, among a small group of colonels and majors, appeared so far to be tentative and inconclusive. But they were enough to send rumors of a coup d'etat percolating through Port-au-Prince a few days ago.

The extent of a U.S. influence over these officers has remained unclear. The Haitian military, abiding by tradition, has mostly kept silent. Neither U.S. Ambassador Clayton McManaway nor his military attache has been available to reporters to discuss U.S. contacts in the military.

Publicly, however, the Reagan administration has offered strong support for Namphy. Within one month of Duvalier's departure, Washington flew in $384,000 worth of riot gear including 150 shotguns with 10,000 rounds of birdshot, 5,000 tear gas canisters and some radios and bullet-proof vests.

In addition, a ship bearing $2.3 million in emergency U.S. wheat donations arrived two weeks ago.

Haitian youths have complained angrily that the United States also sent in the hard rubber truncheons used March 21 to beat a number of protesters in Port-au-Prince. U.S. Embassy issued a statement calling this an "unfounded allegation." But young men burning tires during disorders March 24 said they did not believe the denial.

Aspiring political leaders have said in interviews that such youth often has unrealistic demands and attitudes because of inexperience and lack of education. The political figures appeared unanimous, for example, that the military must remain in power for a time until elections are held because no civilian could manage the country under present conditions. This assessment was in direct contradiction to demands shouted by the demonstrating youths.

"A civilian government without the military, what is that worth?" said Gerard Gourgue, who resigned March 20 as the council's longtime anti-Duvalier leader.

Gourgue and other civilian figures have been in contact in an effort to work out a civilian leadership coalition as a moderate counterweight to the military, said Lafontant Joseph, one of those involved. But Hubert de Ronceray and Gregoire Eugene, both presidential candidates, said they would not be part of the group and urged instead that the military work faster to organize elections.

"Everyone is a presidential candidate," said DeRonceray. "What kind of association can we form?"

Rene Theodore, the Haitian Communist Party leader recently returned from exile, has suggested instead a "national debate" to select a replacement for Namphy's National Council of Government. In a public document, he urged that each of Haiti's nine regions delegate a spokesman for the debate.

The Roman Catholic Church, which played a leading role in toppling Duvalier, has pulled away from the present confusion, apparently to leave the way clear for political leaders. Activist priests have remained close to the street demonstrations, however.

One, The Rev. Jean-Bertrand Aristides, led a small demonstration recently in which students sang for peace and changes in the government at the same time. "Until we get rid of the Duvalier system, we will continue to say no, no, no," Aristides told reporters.

Aristides said the will of the people has to be respected; if they say the military must leave the government, that is the solution.

Other demonstrators have been similarly rigid. A group of taxi drivers demanded improvements in a crowded street recently, for example, and added in a message to the government:

"We will wait only eight days for the Department of Public Works and Transport to make known its plan to carry out [improvement projects]. If not, we will consider the department is no longer competent and will take the appropriate measures."

U.S. To Give Haiti More Military Aid

(By Marlise Simons)

Port-au-Prince, April 3.—A high-ranking American official said today that the United States intended to increase military and economic assistance to Haiti and also to help it recover some of the vast riches stolen from the country by the Duvalier Government.

The official, Elliott Abrams, Assistant Secretary of State of Inter-American Affairs, made the announcement at the conclusion of a two-day visit here.

He was accompanied by Brig. Gen. Fred Gorden, director of the Inter-American region at the Defense Department.

SMALL LEFTIST GROUPS CITED

The visit appeared to reflect the growing United States concern with the stability of this impoverished Caribbean nation of six million people that has remained poltically and economically stagnant in the two months since the flight Feb. 7 of Jean-Claude Duvalier.

Haiti's military dominated ruling council has quickly lost its popularity because of its general lack of achievement. In recent days, United States and other diplomats have begun to cite the presence of small leftist groups as a source of growing concern.

In a news conference before his departure, Mr. Abrams said: "We have increased the amount of aid we are giving to Haiti and we hope to increase it more."

The size of the aid increase, he said, would depend on Congressional action. Newly approved emergency food shipments will bring the amount of United States assistance to Haiti to close to $60 million this year.

Mr. Abrams said that Haiti's most pressing needs were for food and jobs. "But if you want to maintain order in the country, then the military is going to have to modernize and professionalize, which it wishes to. Obviously a new democratic Haiti will need a new professional force to maintain order."

TRAINING IS DISCUSSED

Mr. Abrams declined to specify if more military equipment would be sent to Haiti. "But certainly training, yes. I think the Army wants training. This is something we can offer and that I think will be very useful for the armed forces here."

Both the Haitian military and police forces, according to officials, will begin a recruiting program this month to fill the vacuum left by the Duvalier militia known as the Tontons Macoute. This feared paramilitary force of some 15,000 armed men and some 300,000 members was widely believed to have been the vital instrument for maintaining stability. Its members performed often arbitrary police duties and served as a nationwide political spy network.

Since it was disbanded, Haiti's security forces consist of 7,800 mostly poorly trained men, which include the fire brigade, a small Navy and Air Force and about 1,000 police in the capital.

ON STOLEN FORTUNE

Long low on the list of United States military and recipients, Haiti's allotted portion of $500,000 of aid was spent largely last month, when the United States sent $383,000 worth of riot control gear here.

Asked if the United States Government would help Haiti recuperate part of the fortune stolen by the former president and his associates, Mr. Abrams said: "Yes, we want to and we will in every way we can. We will work with the Government of Haiti on the information that is needed." He said the issue had been discussed with the President, Gen. Henry Namphy. But referring to similar attempts to recover Ferdinand E. Marcos's holdings, Mr. Abrams said that the case of Haiti was much more difficult. "We had the Marcos documents and we could give them to the new Government of the Philippines," said Mr. Abrams, "we don't have the Duvalier documents."

To Haitians, who are not used to such concentrated attention from the outside world, the procession of American politicians during the last two weeks has been variously a source of punishment or concern. Haitian politicians repeatedly question foreigners on what they believe to be the American design behind the high-level attention from Washington. Besides today's delegation, in the past week Haiti also has had visits from Peter McPherson, the administrator of the United States Agency for International Development, from State Department officials and five American Congressmen.

"We have never seen such a constellation of stars of the American system," said one pro-American presidential candidate who asked not to be named.

DAVID PACKARD SPEAKS OUT ON SCIENTIFIC BRAIN DRAIN

HON. DON FUQUA
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, last October, I introduced H.R. 3480, the Science and Technology Revitalization Act, to authorize alternative personnel management systems for scientific and technical personnel in the Federal Government. I introduced this bill because, in my capacity as chairman of the Committee on Science and Technology, I have observed an alarming decrease in overall quality of personnel beginning careers at our Federal laboratories.

At a recent hearing held by our Subcommittee on Science, Research and Technology, we heard from Hon. David Packard, who chaired the White House Science Council's Federal Laboratory Review Panel. Mr. Packard dramatically highlighted this alarming trend for the Science Committee, and called our attention once again to the contribution of Federal personnel management systems to the problem. Simply stated, the current system is just not working to attract and retain the high quality Federal scientists and engineers we need.

Mr. Speaker, I believe what David Packard is saying is of the utmost importance if we are to maintain the traditional quality of work at our Federal labs. Not only do our national prestige and our international competitiveness rest heavily on that quality, but even more important, our national security is heavily dependent on maintaining a technological lead. For this reason, I would commend the following article by Mr. Packard to the Members of this body, and to everyone who is concerned that we obtain quality work in science and technology for our Federal tax dollars. The article appeared in the spring 1986 edition of Issues in Science and Technology, the public policy journal of the National Academies of Sciences and Engineering, and the Institute of Medicine.

THE LOSS OF GOVERNMENT SCIENTIFIC AND ENGINEERING TALENT

(By David Packard)

PROLOGUE: From AIDS research to plant biotechnology to the Strategic Defense Initiative, the federal laboratories are entrusted with much of the nation's vital R&D. In 1985 the laboratories received $17 billion, or one-third of the federal R&D budget, and federal support is increasing. But, David Packard warns, the government is skimping on the laboratories' most essential element: scientists and engineers.

Because of low salaries and noncompetitive fringe benefits, the federal laboratories are having difficulty attracting, retaining, and motivating high-caliber scientists and engineers, says Packard, who headed a White House review of the laboratories. Here he outlines several measures to correct these problems and to reduce the general rigidity and inertia of the federal personnel system. He urges Congress to act quickly to halt the erosion of scientific talent before the vitality of the laboratories is seriously undermined.

David Packard is chairman of the board of Hewlett-Packard Company, which he founded with William Hewlett in 1939. Packard received a B.A. in 1934 and an M.S. in electrical engineering in 1939, both from Stanford University. From 1969 through 1971 he served as deputy secretary of defense. In 1982 Packard chaired a White House Science Council committee to review the performance of the federal laboratories, and in 1985 President Reagan appointed him to chair the President's Blue Ribbon Commission on Defense Management.

Research and development are key to both our national security and industrial competitiveness. In the past 10 years both federal and private support for R&D in the United States have been increasing in constant dollars, and in 1985 this support reached an all-time high of $107 billion, about 47 percent of which was federal. Ironically, with more national emphasis on R&D than ever before, the federal government's inability to attract and retain qualified scientists and engineers has become a major problem.

A significant part of the nation's R&D is performed in government-owned laboratories, a system of over 700 institutions that includes not only the National Bureau of Standards, National Institutes of Health, Beltsville Agricultural Research Center, and Naval Research Laboratory but also less familiar ones such as the National Severe Storms Laboratory, Environmental Monitoring Support Laboratory, and National Space Technology Laboratories. About one-third of the federal government's annual R&D budget is allocated to the federal laboratories; the rest goes to universities and industry. In 1985 the federal laboratories received roughly $17 billion, or about 16 percent of total federal and private expenditures on R&D.

The accomplishments of the federal laboratories, from the development of radar to frozen orange juice to nuclear power, have had an impact on every American. Today these laboratories are tackling such challenges as AIDS research, plant and animal genetics, secure computer systems, optical fibers for telecommunications, and night vision devices.

During the past 10 years, however, the federal government has had increasing difficulty in recruiting and retaining people of the caliber needed to conduct and manage its R&D activities. These problems have generally not affected the 27 federal laboratories that are run under contract to universities and industry, such as the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Jet Propulsion Laboratory and the Energy Department's Argonne, Los Alamos, and other atomic energy laboratories. Rather, the problems are concentrated in the laboratories operated by the government and thus subject to government salary and personnel regulations.

At the heart of the problem is pay, with rigidity and inertia of the personnel administration system being a less important but contributing factor. The pay disparity between government and industry began to grow with the last cycle of inflation, when increases in federal salaries failed to keep pace. The problem is particularly acute in the scientific and engineering fields, where industrial pay scales have risen faster than the rest. Congress has exacerbated the problem by insisting on linking congressional and civil service pay. Because Congress is reluctant to raise its own pay, civil service salaries have been capped for at least six years; in 1986 the salary ceiling is $72,300. The result is not only lower federal salaries but also severe salary compression at the senior levels, which penalizes some of the most highly trained and experienced people entrusted with critical responsibilities.

In 1984 the General Accounting Office found that federal engineers' salaries were 47 percent lower than those in the private sector at the entry level and 25 percent lower at the more experienced (GS–11) level.[1] A recent Air Force survey showed that for computer scientists, federal civilian starting salaries are 30 to 40 percent lower than those in industry. Data from other agencies tell the same story:

The National Bureau of Standards found in recent recruiting actions that the top federal salary offers to Ph.D. scientists, engineers, and mathematicians in high-technology fields averaged about $10,000 per year less than industry and university salaries.

A recent survey of unsuccessful recruiting actions at the Naval Research Laboratory revealed that 93 of 102 candidates who turned down federal job offers did so because of low federal salaries.

The acceptance rate for NASA's offers to new engineering graduates dropped from 62 percent in 1981 to 46 percent in 1984.

The Agricultural Research Service has had difficulty recruiting and retaining Ph.D.'s in high-technology fields, where university and industry salaries are as much as 40 percent higher.

At the National Institutes of Health, salaries for senior Ph.D. scientists are 25 percent lower than those in the private sector, and salaries for clinical surgical specialists are 300 percent lower.

There has also been an alarming increase in resignations among the Air Force's civilian scientists and engineers. From 1981 through 1984 the number of resignations increased by 164 percent; resignations now constitute the major source of attrition in the technical work force. The predominant reason given for leaving government service is inadequate pay. Another disturbing trend is that resignations, which used to be most common at the junior middle management levels, are now spreading to the less experienced levels as well.

Faced with problems in recruiting, federal agencies often have to choose between accepting a less qualified candidate or leaving a position vacant. Defense Department data show that the aptitude scores of newly hired scientists and engineers are declining relative to national norms. This situation illustrates that the nation is getting only what it is willing to pay for.

Not only are federal salaries noncompetitive but fringe benefits are eroding as well. Although the federal pension plan is still relatively generous, it has been affected by recent budget cuts and is often matched or exceeded in the private sector. Federal health and life insurance provisions and annual and sick leave allowances are far less generous than those offered by many private companies and universities.

Salaries in the contractor-operated federal laboratories are more attractive than salaries in the government-operated institutions. Indeed, the government originally decided to have contractors run some of its laboratories during World War II to avoid many of the difficulties inherent in government operation and the civil service. The contractors have more flexibility in salary administration, and the salaries they typically offer are competitive with those in industry and universities. Certainly, many of the problems in government-operated laboratories today, particularly in the personnel area, could be solved by converting to contractor operation. That approach, however, brings other problems. Contractors may have a lesser commitment to the sponsoring agency's mission, and they may appear to have a conflict of interest in the R&D projects they undertake. In addition, legal difficulties occasionally arise because the contractor-operated laboratories are not purely federal or private.

In 1982 I chaired a White House Science Council panel established to review the federal laboratories and recommend actions to improve their use and performance. The panel concluded that the inability of many federal laboratories—especially those under civil service restraints—to attract, retain, and motivate qualified scientists and engineers limits the productivity of the laboratories. If not corrected, this situation will seriously threaten the vitality of the institutions.[2]

In examining the various factors that contribute to these problems, our Federal Laboratory Review Panel compared administrative practices in government-operated laboratories with those in industrial R&D organizations. We found that industry typically places more administrative control over technical personnel in the hands of technical supervisors than do government-operated laboratories. In the federal system, personnel administration is handled by a more or less autonomous bureaucracy focused on procedures and standardization rather than on technical achievement. The federal government also commonly imposes personnel ceilings as well as budgetary controls on the laboratories, whereas the general industrial practice is to use budgetary control alone. Our panel recommended that government-operated laboratories also use budgetary control alone.

Another problem of federal personnel administration, and one that differs from customary practice in industry, is the emphasis on length of service rather than quality of performance in determining salary increases. Thus, a federal employee who has a clean service record is assured of a step increase at regular intervals regardless of productivity. Conversely, the process of rewarding high performers is administratively cumbersome, and most bonuses and promotions are difficult to get through the system. Thus, the federal system plods along for the most part, fostering mediocrity and lacking the means to attract or encourage the genuis needed for technical inspiration and organizational leadership.

A greater exchange of scientists and engineers between government and academia would provide new ideas, not only to laboratories but also to federal R&D program offices. Unfortunately, the current structure and rigidity of the federal personnel system inhibit the mobility of technical personnel between government and universities. Pay comparability would do much to improve the situation, as would additional flexibility in pension accounts. There is no reason, for example, why academics who join a federal organization should not have the option of retaining their own pension plans rather than being required to join the federal one.

The Navy is attempting to rectify some of these personnel management problems in a demonstration project started in 1980 at two of its California laboratories, the Naval Weapons Center at China Lake and the Naval Ocean Systems Center in San Diego. An alternative personnel management system has been created at each facility that, among other things, aggregates the numerous civil service grades into broad pay bands, links pay to performance, and simplifies personnel administration. The broad pay bands give supervisors more flexibility in making initial salary offers and giving subsequent in-grade raises; they also permit more generic job descriptions and greater latitude in rewarding deserving individuals without having to promote them. In contrast, the existing civil service system, with its many narrowly and rigidly defined grades, makes if difficult to match markets rates for scarce talent. This system also forces supervisors to rewrite job descriptions, thereby justifying promotion to higher grades, in order to give employees pay raises.

After visiting China Lake and reviewing the improvements these changes had made in the quality of the facility's professional staff, our panel recommended that government-operated laboratories be allowed to establish a new management system for scientific and technical personnel, patterned after the Navy's demonstration project.

A bill now pending in Congress includes the panel's recommendation. The Federal Science and Technology Revitalization Act, introduced in both the Senate (S. 1727) and the House (H.R. 3480), proposes changes in personnel management that incorporate both provisions of the Navy's personnel system at China Lake and additional features intended to alleviate the specific problems pertaining to scientists and engineers. The proposed legislation would permit federal agencies to adopt this alternative personnel system, although adoption would not be mandatory, it would base pay on performance rather than service time, create broad pay bands, and simplify job classification. It would also allow the pay cap to be waived for up to 5 percent of the covered positions, although this waiver would be limited to specially qualified scientific and technical personnel. Finally, the bill would provide greater flexibility in retirement programs and would permit agency heads to classify positions and fix compensation to make positions competitive with rates and practices outside the federal government. These changes would apply to all of an agency's scientists and engineers other than presidental appointees requiring Senate confirmation.

Aside from the obvious improvements in the compensation system, the proposed legislation would give each agency flexibility to design a personnel management system to fit its own distinct needs. It would also give more control over technical personnel to technical supervisors rather than to personnel administrators. Passage of this bill would go a long way toward improving the federal government's ability to manage and conduct R&D.

Another potential benefit of this proposed act should be recognized. Increasing the attractiveness of federal R&D jobs will improve the job market for all scientists and engineers, thereby attracting more young people into science and engineering careers. Greater involvement of our most promising talent in R&D activities is essential if we are to retain technological leadership in an increasingly competitive international environment.

It will take some time for legislative remedies and enlightened administrative measures to restore our federal R&D capability to an acceptable level. Within today's constrained budget environment, salary reforms will have to be spread out over time. Eventually, however, these reforms should stop the talent drain and make it possible to rebuild the quality of the federal scientific and engineering work force. Now is the time to act before it is too late. It is in every American's interest to see that the quality of our federal R&D establishment not decline because of neglect of its most essential element—people.

IN HONOR OF GARY BRUTSCH

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of Gary Brutsch, a city councilman in Hermosa Beach, CA, whose term will expire on April 15, 1986. As the Congressional Representative of Hermosa Beach, I have had the privilege of working with Gary throughout most of his term and it is an honor for me to share a few of his many accomplishments with my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives.

Gary will be remembered as one local official who continually advocated improvements in the quality of life for all residents of Hermosa Beach. This included leading the city toward a planned program of replacement for its deteriorated sewers, advocacy of new storm drains for the downtown area and a nurturing of economic and commercial development in the city. During his 4 years on the city council, he was in the forefront of urging a clean up of the entire Santa Monica Bay and in addressing reduced density/traffic congestion in Hermosa Beach.

Gary and I have always shared a passion for the Santa Monica Bay and have worked together to keep the bay free from oil rigs. Last summer Gary cochaired a local group in order to rally support for an agreement I and other members of the California delegation had negotiated with Secretary Hodel. This agreement would have offered most of the bay long-term protection from offshore oil drilling until the year 2000.

Although I regret that Secretary Hodel backed away from this agreement, we have resumed negotiations with Hodel in Washington, and again Gary has organized a local effort to demonstrate additional support.

Gary authored a successful initiative, which came before voters in the April 8 elections, asking residents if they believed the Federal Government should lease for oil in the Santa Monica Bay. An overwhelming majority of Hermosa residents voted "no" for the measure, thus sending a clear message to the Interior Department that local residents in Hermosa Beach are opposed to current leasing plans.

As someone who has been involved in ongoing efforts to protect this precious resource, the success of Gary's initiative means a great deal to me and I appreciate all of his hard work on behalf of the bay.

A native of southern California, Gary has lived in Hermosa Beach for 14 years. He received a bachelors degree in business administration and a masters degree in communications from Pepperdine University. In addition, Gary did graduate work in management at the University of Virginia. Gary spent 20 years of outstanding service with the Los Angeles Police Department, and was appointed by the chief of police to train with the FBI National Academy. Gary retired from the police force in 1985, and has recently founded Gary Lee Brutsch and Associates, a public relations and lobbying firm. Gary is married to Kena and they have a 6-year-old daughter Shanden.

Gary established an impressive record during his 4 years in office and his presence on the city council will be greatly missed. On a personal note, I want Gary to know how much I have enjoyed working with him and I hope he will continue to remain in close touch. I will always welcome his imput on matters of mutual concern.

It is a pleasure to highlight Gary's fine record with my colleagues in the House of Representatives. I ask that Members of this body join me in wishing Gary the best of luck in all his future endeavors.

OUR FIRM RESPONSE TO TERRORISM

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, the actions of our Government over the last 24 hours in response to acts of terrorism that resulted in the deaths of Americans around the world deserve our support today.

I think from the comments of my colleagues here today, that support is broad and deep. It is bipartisan and it is representative of all parts of this country.

It is always difficult, when you are dealing with sensitive intelligence gathered from many sources, to publicly proclaim the source of terrorism in our world today.

But, in this case, we have the evidence linking events of recent weeks to the country of Libya. We have proof that other events were planned which would have resulted in further deaths and greater destruction.

We have reports, including this morning's column by Jack Anderson, of further links between Libya and acts of terrorism dating back several years or more.

We have deliberated and we have studied these many reports.

And, most importantly, we have acted.

Our national commitment to fight state-sponsored terrorism has been greatly strengthened by our actions yesterday.

In the past, we have tried economic force. We have tried moral force. The supporters of terrorism around the world now know that we are capable of using the type of force that they understand to answer their acts of terror.

Our actions were directed and initiated for one purpose and one purpose only—to send a clear and unmistakable message to those who would undertake state-sponsored acts of terrorism that this country will not tolerate continuous and unanswered acts of violence.

Our actions came after careful review of the evidence and a full review of our options in this case. I anticipate that the same review process will be used in the future, as well.

We will respond to protect American citizens. We will also respond to clearly documented evidence of intimidation directed at the United States or our allies by any nation using premeditated acts of random violence.

And, most importantly, we will stand by the strength of our commitments.
